The REV. BERTRAM LISTER, in presenting the Report, necessarily curtailed owing to the need of economy, referred with regret to the fact that the Committee has been obliged to defer, for the present, the publication of the series of practical pamphlets on questions of interest to teachers which they had planned, and that Young Days will not be published after the present year. It has been felt that in view of the outlay which the publication of Young Days involves, especially at the present time, and the fact that the needs of the children are so well provided for in similar magazines—which was not the case when Young Days was started in 1876—its continuation is no longer justified. The warmest expressions of gratitude are tendered to the Rev. J. J. Wright, who has edited it for twenty-three years, of late under very great difficulties owing to his illness, and it is recognised that the young people of the congregations are greatly indebted to him for his long-continued labours on their behalf. The Rev. F. K. Freeston's 'Pioneers and Planters,' a series of short biographical studies, will be welcomed, and preparations have been made to publish a short history of the Unitarian faith and movement by the Rev. A. W. Fox. An admirable arrangement has been made with the Beacon Press, U.S.A., for an interchange of books, which has resulted so far in three American volumes being added to the lending library. The visits to schools and societies in different parts of the country which have been made by representatives of the Association have had very beneficial results, and this branch of the Association's work could be extended with much success if financial support were forthcoming. The Committee is steadily preparing for increased activities in the future as soon as circumstances permit, and the programme of reconstruction has already been so well considered that when peace comes the members will be in no uncertainty as to what they must do.

The PRESIDENT, in moving the adoption of the reports, reminded the teachers that when they were in want of books on certain subjects they should write to the Association (a thing they never seemed to think of doing), when they would probably find that the very thing they needed had been published by it. He hoped that those of them who lived in the North would do their best to make the appeal for funds known when the time came. The seeds of the reconstruction movement had been sown, and the Committee were desirous of making it possible for the Association to do for the Sunday schools throughout the country what the British and Foreign Association was doing for the churches.

The election of officers for the ensuing year was proposed by the Rev. A. H. Dolphin, who made the welcome announcement that in selecting a new President the choice had fallen upon Mrs. Blake Odgers. Warm thanks were given to Mr. Fox for his services during the past year, coupled with a welcome to his successor. Miss Harriet Johnson seconded the motion, which was carried with great cordiality. Mr. Fox briefly responded, and Mrs. Blake Odgers, in a short speech, said she undertook the task with extreme diffidence, as she was not qualified for it, like the President she was succeeding, by long experience in Sunday school work; but she was apt to wax enthusiastic over any movement into which she was drawn, and she yielded to none in the very warm interest which she took in the welfare of the churches. Their future depended so much, she believed, upon the training which was given to their young people, and she would do her best to further the good objects which the Committee of the Association have in view during the next twelve months.

MR. FOX, in opening the Conference, which followed the annual business, said he derived much encouragement in these times from the Sunday school. In one of the numerous letters which he received week by week from the lads away at the front the following words occurred: "Second to my home, the Sunday school and the Church have played the greatest part in my life." That was one of the things that made him regard as of extreme importance the simple and old-world method of teaching which brought the teacher into closest contact with his or her class, and allowed the light to shine into their lives. There was scarcely one of these letters, from France, from Salonika, or wherever it might be, that did not send "love to the class"—a thing the writers would never do in ordinary times and under ordinary conditions—and this showed that the influence which had been received there was felt to be of value in the great crisis of these boys' lives. In his own school, Mr. Fox continued, if the attendance had dropped, it was only because so many of the elder scholars were away at the war, but their absence had given him a new experience of the younger lads, who must be trained to be good and manly in order that they might fill the places of those who had gone. They must not spend their time in looking at the clouds. The clouds were there, and the storms were roaring about them; but, as Emerson had said, "all these things are the product of the great sun which is shining behind," and they could be quite sure that the sun of righteousness was shining behind the tempest. The future would be more glorious than the past, and they only needed patience, prayer, strength, courage, and love to meet it.

MISS FRANCIS, of Stamford Street Mission, gave a bright and sympathetic account of a year's work in a boys' class, and showed how much can be done to influence lads at the most difficult age if you have a love of teaching, an understanding of the young mind, and a keen sense of humour. The great secret of influencing boys, which is to give them opportunities to develop their own personality, had clearly been grasped by the speaker, and very instructive were the particulars given as to the way in which the members of her class were encouraged to take their own share in the simple service, to suggest their own subjects for discussion, and to bring their own problems forward under the guidance of the teacher. All these boys were now in the Army and Navy, and although she could not say that they ever became Church members, she did know that they became thoroughly manly men, and that they appreciated thoroughly all that was done for them in the Sunday school.

The REV. C. C. WRIGHT, speaking in a similar way of his own practical experiences as a superintendent, said that he found one of the best ways of getting orderly behaviour and a sense of reverence in the school was by the use of a simple liturgy, which made provision for that instinct of the child to do something which is regarded as most important by the psychologist. They used the services at the end of 'Hymns and Choral Songs' at Mansfield, and they also recited the familiar Confession of Faith: "I believe in the Fatherhood of God, the brotherhood of Jesus," and so on. This formed the basis upon which to build a sound superstructure of faith and belief. He was not at all afraid of definite teaching, as some people were, and the argument often advanced that they must not prejudice the child's mind in the matter of religion did not weigh with him in the least. They prejudiced the child's mind in regard to dancing, and music, and history, and geography, and if they believed what they said they believed then they ought not to be afraid to teach it. In conclusion Mr. Wright gave some figures relating to the tremendous decline in Sunday school membership in all denominations, and quoted the words of one writer on the subject, who said that if this decline were not arrested it would mean the practical extinction of the Sunday school in about ten years' time, the main cause for this being the neglect of the Sunday school by the Church.

Before the meeting closed Mr. Fox took occasion to warmly congratulate the Rev. H. Enfield and Mrs. Dowson, who were present, on the attainment of their jubilee at Hyde Chapel, Gee Cross, and the celebration of their golden wedding, and to refer to Mr. Dowson's interest in everything which related to the welfare of their schools, their churches, their country, and all mankind. Mr. and Mrs. Dowson both responded, the former testifying to the permanent influence in his life of the teaching which he had received as a boy in the Sunday school at the Octagon Chapel, Norwich.

AFTERNOON MEETING.

The chief feature of the afternoon meeting, which was held at 2.30, was an admirable address by Mr. T. M. Chalmers on 'Child Religion and the Future Sunday School,' in which he laid great emphasis on the vital importance of guiding the child's mind, without destroying its freshness and individuality, as a gardener guides the growth of the flower. The idea that the Sunday school should be regarded as a sort of institution from which the choir, or the dramatic society, or any other branch of Church activity might be fed, or as a sort of investment from which the Church might draw interest, was one which he strongly deprecated. The ideal Church expected nothing from its Sunday school, and, as a matter of course, got everything. The whole of their work must be brought into relation with the children themselves, and in this respect great advances had been made within the last few years. Their method of presenting the truths they wished to teach had changed, and they were bringing in everything they could think of that would make their message more attractive to the child in the best sense. The old method of teaching worked out rather like a sum in addition. On the one hand they had the young, unregenerate boy, and on the other a certain sum of doctrines. You added the two together, and you got your good boy. They now knew that the thing was not as simple as that. Children go through several stages in religious evolution, similar to the changes which mankind has gone through since prehistoric times, and if, when they are in the earlier stages, they are taught adult religion, this simply has the effect of hindering the development of their own personality and of smothering their own ideas, while making them dislike religion because it is utterly unreal and repellant to them. There were, roughly, three stages which most children go through: (1) the stage in which, between five and seven, the child looked upon God as primitive man did, as a big man up in the skies; (2) the stage in which the child is trying to force his individuality upon his surroundings, and to get his own way, which usually resulted in the surroundings being changed by his being packed off to school. His idea of God at this period was usually connected with power, separated from justice, and what they had to do then was to introduce the idea of God's love and justice as apart from his power. (3) After that came the stage when the boy, at about 12 years of age, showed a tendency to form into bands and to follow some leader, a tendency for which the Scout Movement provided so well. Here, obviously, the opportunity should be taken to emphasise the idea of leadership, and the following of Jesus Christ or some other great master. After 15 years came the beginning of the ordinary adult religious consciousness as we know it to-day. A great many children, however, never went through these stages at all, and there were, apparently, people who grew up without any development of their ideas beyond the primitive stage, either for lack of teaching or as a result of bad teaching. If teachers disregarded this law of gradual development the results might be disastrous, and no doubt the dislike of many young people to religion was due to the fact that some form of teaching had been given to them at different stages in their evolution which at those particular stages they were incapable of understanding. Mr. Chalmers urged that in all their teaching they should allow for this law of growth, which, of course, at once made the idea of the general lesson for the whole school from top to bottom impossible. Psychology—which was simply the boiled down experience of a large number of parents and teachers—had not nearly enough material to go upon in regard to children, and it would be an extremely useful thing if all who were interested in the subject would take note of these things and collect information for the use of their Association. The larger problem of the decline of Church membership was bound up with this question of the young people, for it was usually found that when the children were brought to church nothing was provided for their needs. How could the churches "attract" young people when they gave them nothing? Was it too much to ask that their religion should be made rather more fresh and young, and that it should deal less with abstract ideas and more with life itself?

An interesting discussion followed, in which the President, Miss Clephan, the Rev. Morley Mills, Mr. Slater (President of the Manchester District Sunday School Association), Miss Tarrant, the Revs. J. Ruddle, Morley Mills, A. H. Biggs, and others, took part. The speeches, especially that of Mr. Morley Mills, who spoke with great sympathy of the new developments in child psychology, and of the great importance of remembering that the child is (not that he has) a soul, were marked by much earnestness, and a deep sense of the importance of loving guidance and understanding in dealing with the young mind.

BRITISH AND FOREIGN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

ANNUAL MEETING,

The Annual Meeting of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association was held on Wednesday, May 30, at Essex Hall at 11 o'clock, Dr. Carpenter, the President, in the chair. The Reports of the Committee and the Treasurer were submitted formally by the Secretary, the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie, who announced that the Treasurer, Mr. Howard Chatfeild Clarke, was unable to be present owing to his continued illness. A letter had been received from Sir Edgar Chatfeild Clarke expressing his brother's keen regret at his inability to be present. He was looking forward to taking up his duties as Treasurer on his restoration to health.

The President, in moving the adoption of the Report, said that the work had inevitably been depressed and curtailed owing to very obvious causes, and since the outbreak of the war the income in subscriptions and collections had fallen by very nearly £500. This loss was very serious, but they must hope that in spite of the innumerable appeals that were being made to them the Association would be able to recover its former position. Still more serious was the preoccupation with the war caused partly through the calling away of so many of their young men, and partly by the increased burden of service laid upon those who remained behind. One of the most significant activities was the continuous publication of the "Modern Handbooks of Religion." In this connection Dr. Carpenter called special attention to the work by Dr. Mellone, 'Eternal Life Here and Hereafter,' and referred with very special pleasure to the fact that Dr. Drummond had submitted to them the MSS. of three new books on the New Testament, which would be published later on. These, he said, would be his final legacy to them, and they rejoiced that they would have the privilege of publishing them. Dr. Carpenter also called attention to the booklet 'Freedom and Right' and to the special issue of The Inquirer, which had been so much appreciated by the men on active service. Mr. Tarrant's booklet 'For Those Who Mourn' had also been very highly valued. After referring to Mr. Spedding's unwearied activities in visiting the Home Camps and Hospitals, and to the successful appeal made on the initiative of Mr. R. M. Montgomery on behalf of the Hostel now established at Lawrence House, Dr. Carpenter concluded by expressing the gratitude of the Association to the American Unitarian Association for the help which they had poured in for the Churches in Canada, without which it would have been impossible for the latter to maintain their cause.

The Rev. C. J. Street, in seconding the motion, referred specially to the work which ministers were able to do through the intimate correspondence they kept up with men on active service. He was perfectly certain that this was the best piece of ministerial work he had done for many a year, though it involved considerable strain at times, owing to the great numbers who were away at the front. But it was well worth it, not only because it cheered the young fellows in so many ways, but because he and others were learning so much as a result of the letters they received in return. The souls of these young men were being opened as the result of their experiences. The war had given them new visions and ideals in their lives. One man who had written to him said: "I have seen more true religion here than ever in my life before." A new and a deeper faith was also coming, Mr. Street continued, just because of the severe trials through which we were all called upon to pass, but what they were facing now was nothing to what awaited them. How were they preparing for the men when they came home? These men would assuredly want a freer, more human life than had been possible for them before, and they would certainly want a faith which harmonised with reason and experience. Nothing less would satisfy them. No religion which was not free and generous and full of common sense would have any influence. A new democracy was arising, and they must see that that democracy became a Brotherhood.

After a short discussion, in which Mr. Arnold Lupton, Dr. Mellor, and others took part, and some exception was taken to the paragraph in the Report expressing satisfaction at the entry of the United States into the war on the side of the Allies, the resolution was carried.

At this point the Chairman announced that the Theological Faculty of Meadville, U.S.A., in recognition of the services which Mr. Bowie had rendered to the cause of Unitarianism during the past twenty-five years, and in gratitude to him for the friendly relations which he had uniformly maintained with the American Association, had decided to confer upon him the degree of Doctor of Divinity. In addition to this, Dr. Carpenter said, they wished to commemorate in another way the conclusion of twenty-five years' service which Mr. Bowie, as Secretary of the Association, completes this year. In order to mark the general appreciation of his work, the following address had been drawn up:—"To the Reverend William Copeland Bowie,—On the completion of twenty-five years of your service as Secretary of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, your friends desire to express to you their warm appreciation of your many labours in extending the scope and promoting the efficiency of its work. During a quarter of a century many changes must needs take place. Beloved and familiar figures have passed away, but the influence of the Association has been steadily increased on broad and generous lines. Your experience for many years as an active member of the London School Board has enabled you greatly to improve its business organisation; you have extended its publishing operations; you have actively assisted its Missionary objects; you have given frequent and thoughtful counsel to ministers and congregations; you have been a most valuable link in our friendships beyond the sea, and the ever kindly helper in our international gatherings. In times of anxiety your faith has never flagged; and you have never placed a narrow interpretation on our Unitarian name. We trust that the good hand of our God may be upon you for many years in which to continue the efforts which have been so fruitful in the past, and with every assurance of affectionate confidence and goodwill, we are dear Mr. Bowie, Your sincere and grateful friends and fellow-workers, ——." The Address had been written out in gold by Mr. Graily Hewitt, one of the leading artists in decorative work of this kind, and was followed by pages of signatures, the whole being bound as a quarto volume, in blue morocco with gold tooling by Miss Macrae of the Westminster Technical Institute.

MR. RONALD JONES, who had been responsible for all the arrangements connected with the presentation, said that as there were about 1,500 subscribers to the Association the task of circularising them had been found too formidable, and it had been decided, therefore, to confine the signatures to a representative group consisting of Past Presidents, Members of the Executive Committee, the Council, and Colonial and Foreign Correspondents and the Local Treasurers, amounting in all to over two hundred. With the exception of a few of the foreign correspondents, whose replies have doubtless been lost at sea, practically all the members mentioned had responded, so that the volume would be an interesting and unique autograph album representative of present-day Unitarianism. Several pages had been provided in the book for the signatures of other friends attending the Whit-week meetings who might wish to append their signatures.

The REV. W. C. BOWIE, who was received on rising with prolonged applause, expressed his very cordial thanks for the appreciative words which had been spoken, and for the beautiful address. He said he thought it was more difficult to endure praise wisely than to suffer criticism. He felt, however, that the honour which had been bestowed upon him by Meadville College, to which he had no claim as a man of learning, was an honour paid to the Association itself. When a man had passed sixty years of age he had learnt his limitations and was less proud of his achievements. He had inherited a certain amount of latent energy, and had acquired some aptitude for business, and he had served to the best of his ability an Association which had treated him from beginning to end with the greatest generosity and appreciation. Mr. Wells, in his latest book, had spoken of the danger of religious organisations being run by their secretaries and officials, but he went on to show that this danger was obviated if an Association remained true to the spirit of freedom of thought and action and did not impose restrictions upon its members. That Association had never tried to be an ecclesiastical body or to impose its doctrines upon others. It bore the Unitarian name, but that name had always been one that had stood for sincerity, freedom, and veracity in religion, and had been linked in its past history with efforts to ennoble and uplift human life. So long as it remained true to these principles, so long would it be of service to humanity. He could not remember a single instance in which the Committee withheld a grant because the minister was either an old-fashioned Unitarian or a new-fangled something-else. It had simply tried to do its work in the interests of truth and freedom, and it had been a privilege and a joy to him to serve it during the last twenty-five years as its secretary.

Mr. R. M. MONTGOMERY, K.C., moved a resolution of thanks to Dr. Carpenter for the services rendered by him as President during the past twelve months and his reappointment to the office for a second year. In Dr. Carpenter, he said, they had one of the very few men who could be considered adequate to the times, a distinguished scholar of world-wide reputation who had a faith in the future which only a great knowledge of the past could give.

In seconding, the REV. V. D. DAVIS warmly endorsed all that Mr. Montgomery had said, and alluded to the fact that Dr. Carpenter belonged to a family whose name was honoured in their history for devotion to the welfare of mankind. They knew how completely Dr. Carpenter gave himself with absolute simplicity and self-devotion to the service of others, not sparing himself, and they were thankful that he would be the strengthener of their faith through the awful struggle in which they were engaged during the coming year.

DR. CARPENTER in his reply said that he hoped he would be able to visit many places during the next twelve months which he had not been able to visit during the past year, and whatever he could do for the Association he would endeavour to do with cheerfulness and diligence.

A vote of thanks to the Council, Officers, and Committee for their services during the past year, and their reappointment for the ensuing year was moved by the President, seconded by the Rev. J. C. Ballantyne, and passed. The one note of regret was struck in the announcement that the Rev. C. J. Street had been compelled for reasons of health and the pressing claims of other duties to resign from the Executive.

MR. PRESTON moved a vote of thanks and condolence with Mr. Howard Chatfeild Clarke in his illness, expressing the hope that he would soon be restored to health, which Dr. Carpenter seconded; and Mr. Bowie was requested to send a message to that effect.

Two more resolutions, one extending the sincere thanks of the Association to the local treasurers for their efforts in obtaining subscriptions, and to the congregations for the collections made on behalf of the missionary work of the Association; the other warmly welcoming the Revs. Kenneth Dunbar, J. H. Ewbank, H. C. Horsley, and Albert Whitford, who have entered upon their duties in our religious community since the last Annual Meeting, were moved by the President and carried. The Rev. H. C. Horsley (Acton) replied to the latter.

A sixth resolution, expressing the thanks of the members of the Association to the Rev. W. H. Drummond, the preacher of the Anniversary Sermon, to the congregation at Essex Church, and to friends in London who have extended hospitality to delegates and ministers, was also submitted by the Chairman and carried unanimously. Mr. Drummond in reply said he had been over to France eight times in the last two years and he had seen the war, not only in some of its most terrible forms, but also in its most human and kindly aspect as well. In spite of what had been said about our losses, a great many of the men in the army would come home again, and there was going to be a new spirit among them. It was quite extraordinary how the old divisions had crumbled—they had been crumbling for a long time, but now they had gone with a crash, and the dividing lines between men of different ways of thought had become very thin in France, if not in England. Those who were doing religious work over there did not want to come back to a country in which those divisions were maintained. For himself, he had learned that many of the differences which grow stronger in argument melt away in the sunshine of human fellowship and goodwill.

The last resolution was submitted by the Rev. W. G. Tarrant and carried. It was explained by the Chairman that Lieut.-Col. C. S. Bullock, who was to have responded, was prevented from attending the meeting by Government work, and would probably take another opportunity of speaking to the members. The resolution was as follows: "That this Meeting, gratefully recognising the invaluable support rendered to the cause of freedom and right by the constant and ever-deepening sympathy of American Unitarians since the beginning of the war, warmly appreciates the message of fraternal reassurance and goodwill sent by Dr. Eliot, President of the American Unitarian Association, on the occasion of the entry of the United States into the war on the side of the Allies; cordially endorses the greetings and aspirations expressed by Dr. Carpenter, President of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, in his reply; and profoundly hopes that the combined efforts of the Allies may speedily bring about a just and lasting peace throughout the world."

Mr. Tarrant said he moved this resolution with some trepidation, not because there would inevitably be differences of opinion in regard to some part of the wording—though he felt sure that nobody present would doubt the sincerity of those with whom any one person might not be in agreement—but because there was something so inexpressibly precious, so valuable beyond all estimate, in the fact that it conveyed, that no words of his were adequate to express it. He referred to the deepened sympathy and affection of their American brethren which had come out of this terrible experience, and which—although they had been aware of it before—had not been able to vent itself previously with quite so much warmth of feeling. He recapitulated the various communications which had taken place between the British and American Unitarian Associations since the outbreak of war up to the time when the United States joined the Allies, and quoted the last paragraph from the Introduction to the Report by Dr. Carpenter, which speaks of their entering into the war as "a prophetic act, a splendid vindication of the great truth of the brotherhood of man."

LIVERPOOL DOMESTIC MISSION.

The Eightieth Annual Meeting took place on Tuesday, May 22, the President, Mr. H. R. Rathbone, C.C., J.P., in the chair, and was well attended by subscribers and supporters, among those present being Councillors Lawrence D. Holt, E. Haigh, F. C. Bowring, J.P., Sydney Jones, J.P., W. Bowring Stoddart, J.P., Mrs. Rathbone, Mrs. Mulleneux, Mrs. Steele, Mr. and Mrs. Jos. Coventry, Mr. and Mrs. F. Robinson, Miss Florence Melly, and the Revs. Collins Odgers, F. K. Freeston, Dr. Mellor, and J. L. Haigh. The reports of the Committee and the Treasurer's Statement of Accounts were read by Mr. Harold Armstrong (Hon. Secretary) and Mr. Lawrence D. Holt (Hon. Treasurer). The President, in moving their adoption, said they were all very satisfactory, especially those of the Missionaries, whose labours during the last two years had been very hard. He drew attention to the fact that some 150 of the elder scholars and workers had volunteered for active service, and to the great depletion thus caused in the staff of voluntary helpers, and expressed his deep satisfaction that owing to the increased efforts of those who remained all the activities of the Mission had been maintained and one more added. On behalf of the subscribers he offered their hearty thanks and congratulations to the workers, and hoped they would be able to carry on the work with equal success during the coming year. Unfortunately, they had again to deplore the loss of several supporters and among them one whom it had been a privilege to have seen and known, a man of such great character as Sir William Bowring. He had left behind him a noble example of generosity and public service; he had the means and used them in a most wise and helpful manner, in relieving distress and supporting every movement for the welfare of his poorer fellow-citizens, and was always the champion of every unpopular cause for the advancement of justice, freedom, and mercy. Mr. E. Haigh, in seconding, said that as an old Mission boy he felt it one of the proudest moments of his life when he became a member of the Committee and was asked to speak that night. He felt it a privilege and pleasure to do what he could for the Mission which had done so much for him.

The Rev. F. K. Freeston moved a resolution of confidence and sympathy with the Missionaries and thanks and congratulations to the workers, and said as Secretary of the London Missions he deeply felt their indebtedness to those who did the work all the year through and under such special difficulties at the present time. There was a danger of making too great a distinction between a church and a mission, between rich and poor, and not to feel the common humanity which binds us all together. It was really only a difference of administration in the functions of a minister and a missionary, although a definite meaning was attached to the latter when Dr. Tuckerman took religion into the homes of the people. But whatever criterion we might take he would resent anything that put a mission in any subordinate position to a church. The first and last work of the Domestic Missionary was the personal appeal, so eminently exemplified in the labours of John Johns, the first minister to the poor in Liverpool. He concluded by congratulating the Missionaries on their work and in having such a splendid list of supporters. Mr. W. Bowring Stoddart seconded. The Revs. T. Lloyd Jones and Jos. Anderton in responding thanked the Committee and subscribers for their unfailing kindness—their actions always preceded their words. Mr. Richard Robinson proposed, and Miss Florence Melly seconded, the election of the Committee. The meeting closed with cordial thanks to the President, moved by the Rev. Collins Odgers and seconded by Mr. A. Chaplin.

NATIONAL UNITARIAN LAY PREACHERS' UNION.

It has become an established custom for the Lay Preachers to be first in the field in Whitweek, though they have to sacrifice some of the leisure of a Bank Holiday in order to do so. An earnest band of men and women gathered in the Council Room at Essex Hall on Monday evening. There were many gaps this year as the various local Unions had found it impossible to send delegates, but greetings were received from all of them. After tea a religious service was held conducted by the Rev. T. P. Spedding. The preacher was Mr. E. R. Fyson. His sermon, based on the text "Say to the children of Israel that they go forward," was a call to optimism and faith in view of the fresh needs and opportunities of the time in which we live. Subsequently Mr. H. G. Chancellor, M.P., presided over the annual meeting for business, the officers and committee being re-elected. The annual report, which was read by Miss Francis, was in the following terms:—

Although the year has been a trying one for the Local Unions owing to depletion of numbers, it has been marked by exceptional loyalty and devotion to duty on the part of those left behind. Local meetings for mutual encouragement and help have, in some cases, had to be entirely suspended; in others, seriously curtailed. This is to be deplored since a renewal of the spirit is essential to continued effort by individual workers. We hope that this state of things is only temporary, and that in happier times of peace the meetings for worship, for fellowship and enlightenment will be resumed with an even deeper appreciation of their value than before the war. But, if the members have themselves suffered they have not let the churches suffer. There is only one record of a call left unanswered. Every local Union can show a gratifying record of services taken, greatly in excess of the usual number. In several churches the work has been entirely carried on by laymen, and much unrecorded institutional work has only been possible through their labour of love. Owing to the demands of the times and the difficulty of travelling, your Committee has not met frequently, but with quiet persistent effort they have managed to "carry on," either through the post or by members' visits to special localities. Particular mention must be made of a generous gift of books by Mrs. Bartram, which enabled the Union to make a grant of several volumes to each of six local Lay Preachers Unions, for which letters of appreciation and thanks were duly received. The Central Postal Mission has also presented the Union with twenty-five volumes from the late Mrs. Reid's library which will be allocated in the immediate future. The best thanks of the Union have been conveyed both to Mrs. Bartram and the Committee of the Central Postal Mission. The volumes will form a nucleus for, or an addition to, the Local Lay Preachers' Libraries. The Union has been in touch with the British Women's League, whose branch of work is heartily commended to members of the National Lay Preachers' Union. Sermons from members have been received for criticism and advice, and an extension of this work is desirable. Finally, it is extremely encouraging to find local Unions coming into line with the recommendations of the National Union, especially in regard to the payment of Lay Preachers' fees. The work of the National Union is quiet, steady, persistent: it is not ostentatious, it is permeating. We go forward with hopeful hearts and renewed zeal for the Cause of Truth, Love and Liberty.

WE commend to the generous help of our readers the following appeal which has reached us from Captain Ronald Bartram: "I am at present in charge of a Corps Laundry in a village in which there is no place to which the men can go to read or write. I am, therefore, proposing to start a recreation room, but what I am in want of most is magazines and books with which to start a library. I am writing you, therefore, to ask you if you would put an appeal in your paper for some of these for this purpose. I can assure you that they will be greatly appreciated by the men, and if occasional parcels can be sent from time to time, I shall be most grateful. Parcels should be addressed, Officer in Charge, XV. Corps Laundry, A.P.O. S. 45, B.E.F."

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Horsham: the late Mr. J. B. Price.—By the death of Mr. Price, which took place on Monday, May 14, at his residence, 12, Worthing Road, the Free Christian congregation at Horsham has lost its oldest member, and the community to which he belonged a remarkable and striking personality. Born at Portsmouth in 1826, among his early memories was the landing of Don Carlos at that port, and of his disappointment at being unable to procure a Spanish-English dictionary at the stationer's shop of which Mr Price's father was proprietor A few years ago he was delighted to discover, through an article in The Fortnightly Review, that the George Meredith who was a close neighbour and at whose house he, with his sister and brother, visited, was the novelist whose fame has spread through the English-speaking world, and it was a keen pleasure to him that he was able to supply the writer of that memoir with particulars which supplemented the somewhat scanty information available regarding that author's early life. Another celebrity with whom his associations were intimate was the good old man John Pounds, to whom many of the Portsmouth poor owed their scanty education and their first lessons in virtue. Mr. Price's aunt, Ruth Jeffery, helped to provide the old cobbler with books, and encouraged him to bring his bairns to the High Street Chapel, and, after he died, Mr. Price, senior, wrote the little pamphlet, which his son always maintained was the most authentic record of his life. He was in business at Horsham, in partnership with Mr. Agate, as draper in the Carfax. He was appointed secretary of the Worthing Road Chapel, and filled that office for about three years, emigrating to Australia in 1864. Here he became deeply interested in the Temperance movement, joining the Good Templars, and later was appointed Grand Worthy Secretary to the lodges of New South Wales. An illuminated address, presented to him in 1903, speaks of his great services to the Order, and calls him "our veteran brother." He was also for many years President of the Unitarian Church in Sydney. About fourteen years ago he returned to England, and, settling near Hackney, joined the New Gravel Pit Church there. Some three years later he came to Horsham, where he spent the evening of his long life. In 1916 he was greatly gratified by receiving a congratulatory address on attaining his ninetieth birthday, signed by fifty members and friends of the Free Christian Church, Horsham. He entered his ninety-second year in full possession of all the faculties of his mind, and considered himself rich in the possession of many friends, and the love of little children, in whom he always took the greatest interest. His failing eyesight was the less a deprivation through the kindness of one friend, who nightly read him the news of the day, and discussed with him the political situation. The funeral service was conducted by the Rev. N. J. Hawthorn Jones, who, in an appreciative address, spoke of the many qualities of heart and head which had won the regard of a wide circle of friends, of the strong religious feeling and fine optimism which had characterised the late Mr. James Brent Price, and of the services he had rendered to the church to which he belonged, especially in regard to the renovation of the organ.

Manchester.—The Annual Whitsuntide Festival in connection with the Sunday schools of the Manchester district was held on Sunday, May 27, in Cross Street Chapel. The schools of the district were well represented. The ground floor of the chapel was reserved for teachers and scholars, and it was packed by happy children, to whom Whit Sunday means a day of happiness, and a day to be remembered. The galleries of the old chapel were filled to overflowing with adults The preacher was the Rev. Herbert Barnes, of Oldham Road. Mr. Oliver Heys was at the organ and Mr. S. H. Whittaker conducted the singing.

Liverpool.—At meetings of the congregation of Hope Street Church specially called for the purpose, after both morning and evening services on Whit Sunday, the following resolution was carried, in the morning nem. con., and in the evening unanimously. The resolution was moved at both meetings by the Rev. Dr. Mellor; it was seconded in the morning by Mr. R. H. Armstrong, and in the evening by Mr. Joseph Lucas, of the Liverpool City Council. At both meetings the attendance was large and representative: "That, in view of the urgent need now existing for the utmost economy in conserving the resources of the nation, and in view also of the admitted dangers connected with the drink traffic at present, and certain to arise during the period of demobilisation, this congregation earnestly appeals to the Government to take steps immediately to prohibit, during the continuance of the war and for some time thereafter, the sale and the manufacture of alcoholic liquors."

Liverpool: Ullet Road Church.—A farewell letter to the congregation from the Rev. J. C. Odgers, who terminates his ministry at the end of the month, appears in the Ullet Road Church Calendar for June. Towards the end of the letter, Mr. Odgers says: "I cannot conclude my duties as your Senior Minister without acknowledging once more my warm appreciation of the great kindness that has been shown to myself and my wife on so many occasions during our life in Liverpool. As I said in my letter of December last, it is not possible to suppress regret that I have not been able to accomplish more than I have done for the Church and its permanent welfare. I suppose no man ends his public career without a similar feeling of non-fulfilment of what he had hoped to achieve. If I can bring to my aid any consoling thought it is this, that a minister can only do what he believes to be faithful service in his own way and according to his own ability, and trust that God may bless his efforts, if not now, then in the after-time. With the closing of this chapter of my life, I feel how strong and sacred are the ties of regard and affection which have bound us all together, and the remembrance of these will help to cheer me in the years that may yet remain."—The Rev. Harmon Tayler, the assistant minister, will soon be obliged to give up the Superintendentship of the Sunday School. He is, at present, giving his services as house-surgeon at the Children's Infirmary, and it is possible that more important work may be assigned to him shortly by the Government. He will be greatly missed, especially by the teachers and members of the Adult class, with whom he has been very closely connected.

Leytonstone.—Those who attend the services held in this district by the London District Unitarian Society have for sometime been experiencing a growing self-consciousness as a body of religious believers with a unity of aim and purpose. The war has delayed their progress somewhat, but the spirit of harmony and aspiration has, nevertheless, been increasingly manifest. After the evening service last Sunday a conference was held under the guidance of the District Minister, the Rev. J. Arthur Pearson, when a unanimous desire was expressed that the congregation be formed into a definite self-governing church. On Saturday last a small party of sixteen indulged in a congregational ramble at Loughton, and the event proved exceedingly enjoyable. The Leytonstone friends are looking forward to seeing many Unitarians from other churches in London district at the conference to be held next Saturday (June 9) at their meeting place, Haydn House, 63, Fairlop Road, when after a service at 4 and tea at 5 o'clock, "The Religious Needs of the People" will be discussed at 6, under the presidency of Mr. H. G. Chancellor, M.P.

Portsmouth: the late Mr. E. J. Cooper.—With deep regret the Committee of the John Pounds Home, Southsea, announce the death of their hon. treasurer, Mr. E. J. Cooper, who for nearly twenty years has faithfully and unselfishly given his services to the Home. For some months his health had been failing and he continued his work with difficulty. In March he took a severe chill which later developed into pneumonia, and he gradually sank, passing away on May 14. A Unitarian of life-long standing, for many years he and his family were regular attendants at the High Street Chapel, Portsmouth, of which he was the treasurer and a willing helper in all its activities. In 1907 he left Portsmouth for a house in the country, when the distance prevented his attendance on Sundays and obliged him to give up his active work, but he retained his interest to the end. To the John Pounds Home his loss seems irreparable, for his help and sympathy were always to be relied upon. However tired and overworked he was, he was ready so long as he was able to come to the Home and give his help and encouragement. His work was very quietly and simply done, but well, indeed his whole life may be summed up in the word thorough. The foundation of his character was absolute sincerity, and his life was one of Christian charity, "seeking not his own but others good." He will be truly missed and mourned and the deepest sympathy goes out to his wife and family.

Pudsey.—A pretty pageant took place on Wednesday, May 23, at the Unitarian Sunday school, when the May Queen was crowned, and a Parliament of Flowers was held, accompanied by appropriate songs and dances, and concluding with a fairy play. The performance was well attended, and reflected much credit upon those who had trained the children, and upon the minister, the Rev. R. Newell, who superintended it. The proceeds will materially help the church funds. The Rev. J. Lord, formerly minister of the church, has left the Unitarian body and has been received into the Church of England. He is to receive holy orders as a deacon in the Diocese of Ripon on Trinity Sunday next. His first curacy will be at the Parish Church of Barnoldswick.

Stockton-on-Tees.—The 229th Anniversary of the Unitarian Church was celebrated on May 20, when the services were conducted by the Rev. A. Scruton. A Conversazione was held on the following evening. The Chair was taken by Mr. W. J. Watson, J.P., and the Revs. W. H. Lambelle and J. B. Robinson, of Barnard Castle, gave short and encouraging addresses. Mr. Scruton also spoke with confident courage of the work that is being done in Stockton in the spreading of the liberal faith. Mr. Scruton is devoting three days a week to National Service by doing hard manual labour upon a farm. His son, Pte. Douglas Scruton of the Black Watch, has now sufficiently recovered from his wound to be sent back to active service.

Yorkshire Sunday School Union.—The annual meeting of the Yorkshire Unitarian Sunday School Union was held on Saturday, May 19, at Chapel Lane Chapel, Bradford. There were seventy people present, and the proceedings were marked by deep interest in the welfare of the Sunday schools. Among the new-comers were the Rev. Richard Newell, who has recently settled at Pudsey, and the Rev. J. W. Maw, the newly appointed minister at Dewsbury. The hon. secretary, the Rev. Frank Coleman, is to be congratulated upon the excellent results which his earnest efforts have produced, especially in regard to the satisfactory financial position. Mr. Fred. Clayton, in referring to the good work of the officials, spoke of the valuable services of Dr. S. F. Dufton, H.M.I., the retiring president, whose genial and kindly guidance during the past two years have been so much appreciated. The Rev. Thomas Paxton has been elected president in his place. Mrs. Brownlow, and the Revs. R. A. Dickson and R. Newell also spoke. A hearty welcome was given by the Rev. A. Cobden-Smith (Holbeck, Leeds) to the Rev. A. W. Fox, President of the Sunday School Association, and the Rev. Charles Biggins, representative of the Manchester District Sunday School Association. The business proceedings were followed by an afternoon service, at which the Rev. T. M. Falconer, of Hull, preached. The sermon, which dealt with the Sunday school as a living part of the Church, was extremely helpful and encouraging. After tea, which was kindly provided by the Chapel Lane friends, an evening meeting was held under the presidency of the Rev. Thomas Paxton, when the speakers were the Rev. A. W. Fox, who gave a most practical and stimulating address; the Rev. Charles Biggin, the Rev. T. M. Falconer, and Dr. S. F. Dufton. All the speakers gave helpful advice to the teachers, and Mr. Falconer, in particular, struck the right note in enumerating the principles which should guide them in facing the changes which would arise out of the war. Problems concerning education, democracy, industry, and the life of the soul were now pressing upon us all, and three principles were to be specially noted: (1) the importance of personality; (2) the ideal of the family with its Christian principles of brotherhood; (3) serving as the ruling motive, in the spirit of the Master's saying, "I am among you as one that serveth." Mr. Biggins, in his speech, paid a tribute to the old and tried methods of the Sunday school, and Dr. Dufton gave it as his view that the Sunday school should provide during the week a counter attraction for the children to the life of the street. Good use might be made of their rooms, he thought, if "play-centres" could be organised in connection with their Sunday schools.

THE THIRD ANNIVERSARY OF THE DECLARATION OF WAR.

To the Editor of THE INQUIRER.

SIR,—Will you kindly allow me to say in reply to Mr. Ballantyne's interesting and valuable suggestion that the Committee of the National Conference at its meeting this week decided to recommend our Churches to hold a Commemoration Service on Sunday, August 5. The Committee quite recognised that Bank Holiday Sunday is, perhaps, the most inconvenient in the year for securing united effort. But this inconvenience, it was felt, is counterbalanced by the considerations named by Mr. Ballantyne. A Form of Service is being prepared, and we cordially commend the proposal to the favourable consideration of ministers and congregations.—Yours, &c. JAMES HARWOOD.

SWANWICK SUMMER SCHOOL.

THE proposed United Summer School of Social Service Unions at Swanwick, announced for June 23—July 2, 1917, has been abandoned in view of increased expenses and other difficulties connected with the war.

NOTES AND JOTTINGS.

NO LIQUOR FOR AMERICAN SOLDIERS.

The United States Senate has adopted a prohibition amendment to the Conscription Bill, by 57 to 30, after a spirited debate. The amendment provides for the absolute prohibition of liquor from soldiers, both in selling and giving, inflicting penalties for violation. In the Canadian House of Commons Mr. Rodolphe Lemieux, a former Postmaster-General, has protested vigorously against the institution of "wet" canteens in the Canadian training camps in England. He read a letter from Capt. Beaufort, a Canadian officer, describing the demoralising influence of the drink traffic. Mr. Lemieux demanded that steps be taken by the British or Canadian Government to prohibit altogether the sale of intoxicating drinks in the camps.

POETRY IN WAR-TIME.

Mr. Ronald Ross has written a letter to the press asking the privilege, accorded to past presidents of the Poetry Society, of addressing an open letter on behalf of the Poetry Society to remind all lovers of poetry of its existence and development. "The Society is not," he says, "a poets' club, but rather a fellowship of lovers of this supreme art, who frequently congregate in order to hear readings of the greatest classical or modern works. In this time of tragedy, when the souls of all men are moved to their depths, poetry comes again into its place as the most perfect possible utterance of humanity and the maker of monuments of and for the human spirit. In these days, also, when science and education are being urged forward with the whole energy of the nation, poetry, which contains science, education, and almost every other worthy thing, should not be forgotten. Poetry is the shrine of beauty, the altar-flame of the heart, and the religion of the intellect, and we hope that all those who love it will join us, not only for their own pleasure, but in order to help our nation to consider, appraise, and honour the greatest of the arts." The office of the Society is at 16 Featherstone Buildings, Holborn, W.C. 1.

OUT OF THE HEART OF THE STORM.

Twelve Sermons preached at Rosslyn Hill Chapel, Hampstead, and Manchester College, Oxford.

BY

Rev. HENRY GOW, B.A.

The sermons are written by one who believes with President Wilson that "right is more precious than peace," and that no personal sorrow or loss should discourage us and turn us from our firm resolve to overthrow the Prussian autocracy. They are written too in the growing confidence that faith in God and in the supremacy of Love has become more and not less possible and real through the conflict and agony of recent times.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

The address for our Belgian Hospital Fund, to which cheques and parcels of clothing should be sent, is Mrs. Bernard Allen, 14 Gainsborough Gardens, Hampstead, N.W.3.

IT is with extreme regret that we have to announce a further reduction in the size of THE INQUIRER. After the present issue we shall be able only to print eight pages weekly. The reasons for this step are obvious. The growing scarcity of paper and the large advances in wages and the price of material leave us no choice. We believe that with a revision of type and a zealous practice of the art of brevity the sacrifice will not really be so great as it appears at first sight. But we are aware that we shall not be able to satisfy all the demands which are made upon our space, and we can only throw ourselves upon the courtesy and goodwill of our readers to help us through the difficult months which lie ahead.

OUR readers can help us if they will recognise cheerfully that there must be some reduction in every department of the paper as a matter of patriotic duty. This applies specially to "Letters to the Editor" and reports of local news. On our side we hope to be fair to all the interests concerned. We do not want to cut anything off, but only to reduce it in quantity. Since the beginning of the war it has been our aim to conserve the religious traditions which have given interest and vitality to THE INQUIRER for seventy-five years. At the same time we have striven to keep faith strong and courage high in face of the duties and dangers of the hour, and to open up new channels of sympathy and beneficence for the help of those who are sorely stricken. The Belgian Hospital Fund is the best evidence that on the practical side our message has met with an eager response. Numerous letters of gratitude which have reached the editor show that in the direction of moral stimulus and religious help our effort has not been in vain. Whatever the difficulties we may have to meet, we intend to be loyal to this special opportunity and to labour in the same spirit for the cause of justice, freedom and humanity so long as the need exists.

* * *

IN connection with the annual meeting of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association last week a paragraph of a most misleading character appeared in several newspapers, and we cannot pass it by without a word of correction. Any one reading it would imagine that Mr. Arnold Lupton's speech gave rise to scenes of disorder and that he was put to silence by an intolerant majority. We are glad to see that Dr. Carpenter, as Chairman of the meeting, has written to The Manchester Guardian, which published the amazing headline 'Mr. Arnold Lupton Shouted Down,' to describe exactly what occurred. His quiet and dignified words are a crushing reply to this kind of sensationalism, which thrives on inaccuracy. We only regret that The Manchester Guardian did not give the same prominence to the correction as to the original statement. In a glaring case of this kind we think that some apology would also have been in place. Dr. Carpenter writes as follows :—"Although Mr. Lupton's views were no doubt distasteful to the meeting, he was listened to without one single word of interruption or even of disapproval. He was followed by a lady speaker to the same effect. It was only because he tried to speak a second time on the same motion, which was a breach of the rules of the meeting, and when he persisted in standing up to speak, although the chairman had risen to his feet, that the meeting by cries of 'Order' declined to hear him a second time. Unitarians have always upheld to the best of their ability the right of complete freedom of opinion and the largest possible liberty of its expression, however contrary to the opinion of the majority."

A SMALL book came quietly into the world last week and appeared on the bookstall at Essex Hall. We refer to 'Out of the Heart of the Storm and other Sermons,' by the Rev. Henry Gow. It contains the fine flower of Mr. Gow's teaching at Hampstead and Oxford, since the beginning of the war, and will be heartily and gratefully welcomed by his friends, and especially by those of them who have shared with him the sorrows and anxieties of this time. But we hope that many others will find here just what they need to give them calmness and strength. As they read these pages and allow themselves to be guided in their own meditations by the light which they throw upon the problems of life and duty, they will feel behind the words the kindling influence of a man who has himself lived in the heart of the storm and is very sure of God. "There is the mystery of God," he says, "above the battlefield and in the hospital and in the sorrowing home. He is with us through all the changes and the anxieties and pain. In him is our peace." These words may be taken as the keynote of the volume.

RELIGION AND THE NATION.

By The Master of Balliol.

Being unable to come to the Conference, I am asked to send a short message. I should like to mention three experiences which I have recently had. (1) In one great industrial city I was told by one of the leading men there—and a thoroughly competent judge—that he was certain the rank and file of the different religious bodies in the city have been so disturbed by the war out of the comparative apathy into which they had been drifting, that there was an opportunity for a really great movement of religious union, only that he despaired of any one body having either the insight or the spirit to attempt the effect. (2) In another great industrial centre, I found one of the leading working-men assuring me that the most thoughtful opinion of his class agreed with him in saying: "I am not a Christian." He was well known himself through the district as a man of extraordinary public spirit and self-sacrifice, and his whole spare time was given to the wise and kindly helping of others; but his line of argument was: "I am not a Christian, because those who take the lead in calling themselves Christians are often those with whose conduct I most profoundly disagree." In the same way, and often from men of the same class, I have been met by the question: "Has not Christianity failed, because it has not cured social evils, or stopped this war?" I submit that the proper answer to this question is, that what has failed is our dilution of Christianity and our disconnection of it from our daily conduct; in fact, the division of life into water-tight compartments, business and religion, weekdays and Sundays. (3) In the third place, in the centre of one of our greatest industries, a manufacturer whom the others had put forward as their spokesman said to me afterwards: "Why does no one make an appeal to business men to return to the State for the good of the community every penny of profit they have made out of the war, on the ground that it is the price of blood?" I was much astonished at this coming from such a source, and said I was afraid that not many would agree with him; he assured me on his own personal knowledge that this was not the case. This leads to a question: Can we hope that the same spirit shall ever be found influencing on a large scale the business and commercial world? Can Christianity recapture this sphere? I am not now asking if business men, after making a fortune by business methods, can be induced to devote some of that fortune to public objects. That is already the defect in English life; its division into water-tight compartments, business and charity, weekday and Sunday; a division which is so universal, and so complacently accepted, that it explains why the rest of the world talks of British "hypocrisy." No, I am asking a much bolder question: Whether business itself can be humanised and Christianised, whether industrial and commercial activities themselves can be conducted on human and Christian principles. If they cannot, if they are to go on getting more mechanical, more "business-like," more divorced from questions of right and wrong, then it is a bad outlook for our civilisation. In the struggle between man and machinery, if we do not humanise the working of the machine it will crush humanity. We have seen something of that already in our factory history, and can see it now in places in the United States of America. But, fortunately, both the writers on economics and the business men themselves are seeing the danger and are devising the way out. Here and there are business men who are determined to act as Christians, not only after business hours but during them, and throughout all their relation to their employees. And that wise economist, Prof. Smart, in his posthumous book, insists on the introduction of the moral element even into the action of the consumers, as well as into that of the producer. The very able financial writer, Mr. Hartley Withers, deliberately comes to the conclusion that poverty at one end of the social scale is directly due to waste at the other end; if the rich did not waste, there need be no poor. All this convergence of opinion is very hopeful.

Some say that industrial conditions will be harmonious, all classes having learned so much goodwill. But nothing leads to greater disaster than uninstructed goodwill; and we shall not get a permanent advance in religiousness, any more than in industrial harmony, without much clear thinking and wise planning, to use the occasion aright, and to make permanent gains out of it. One of the most brilliant of the many brilliant men who have fallen often declared in his letters that the spirit of the New Armies was the finest thing he had ever known: "I want everybody to learn soldiering, so that they may gain this spirit. All my life I have been occupied with social problems, and to solve these I believe that this spirit is indispensable." He meant the spirit which cheerfully gives up life itself for an ideal or for a comrade, the spirit of disciplined co-operation. This would, indeed, lead to the solution of our social problems, and this is religion in the truest sense. Hitherto, we have been too contented in England with religion as a purely individual thing, saving one's own soul. But Christianity, if it tells us anything, tells us to save ourselves by saving others; the tendency to relapse into our individualist religion will be one temptation at the close of this war. The world will not get better of itself at the close of the war. In many ways, indeed, the close of the war will itself bring problems of its own more formidable even than those of the war, problems in international relations, social and economic problems within the nation, problems of education and of religion, which will call for clear thinking and resolute action, as well as for goodwill. Indeed, mere goodwill unbacked by properly thought-out methods is a positive danger. It is a sort of social opiate, it leads men to say: "Oh! things will clear themselves up somehow." Would it be safe to let four millions of men replace themselves in industry somehow?

It is now that the nation should be making its high resolutions, now, when we are seeing all these splendid young lives being offered up for us every day so ungrudgingly; it is now that we should be pledging ourselves to see to it that these dead shall not have died in vain. For even victory will be in vain unless it leads not only to a better Europe for the nations to live in, but to a better England, too, for our children to live in. That day will dawn when we resolve as a nation to bring our religion into our national life, when we realise and act on the great truth that we are not individuals, but members of a community, when we apply that truth to the education of our children, the training of our citizens, the conditions of our industries. Then, indeed, Christianity will have entered upon its fulfilment, which must be to make society Christian, instead of having Christian individuals conducting their society on wholly non-Christian principles. As General Smuts has said: "We have been down to the depths, and it is from the depths that we must build up."

This Message from the Master of Balliol was read at the Public Meeting of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association on Wednesday, May 30, 1917.

Good Thoughts for Evil Times.

Oh! gently on thy suppliant's head,
Dread goddess, lay thy chast'ning hand!
Not in thy Gorgon terrors clad,
Not circled with the vengeful band
(As by the impious thou art seen)
With thund'ring voice and threat'ning mien,
With screaming Horror's fun'ral cry,
Despair, and fell Disease, and ghastly Poverty:
Thy form benign, oh goddess, wear,
Thy milder influence impart,
Thy philosophic train be there
To soften, not to wound, my heart.
The gen'rous spark extinct revive
Teach me to love, and to forgive,
Exact my own defects to scan,
What others are to feel, and know myself a Man.

Gray, 'Hymn to Adversity.'

If patriotism is often quite unconscious of its own grounds; if it does not reason on the virtues and liberties of the national heritage, or organise schemes for the future of the world; if its imagination kindles chiefly at the mere mention of the home name, or the sound of the native song; if the mere shape of the island on the map, and the free line of its shores, should look up at our foolish eye with unspeakable appeal; if the very hedgerows and dotted trees, the sedgy streams and modest hills, though no better than those of other lands, should rise into the memory as pictures of untold beauty;

this is but like the recall of the sacred features of the absent or the dead, not unique in loveliness themselves, but symbols to us of a treasure consecrated and infinite. MARTINEAU.

HAVE mercy upon us, O Lord, have mercy upon us; comfort the orphan, the needy, the afflicted, the stranger, the sorrowful, and the fallen; relieve the oppressed, gather together the dispersed, recall the captives, visit the sick, blot out the sins of the penitent; pour out on all Christian people the abundance of Thy help; grant soundness of mind and body to travellers and prisoners, and to all the faithful; wipe out our many offences, and of Thy great mercy grant to the departed eternal rest. AMEN.

THE CHURCH.

THE Church remains; in its essence, in each individual congregation, a company of faithful men and women, devoted to a life of true brotherhood, in Christ's spirit, bent on the service of the Kingdom of God.

We want, above all things, reality and sincerity in religion; and we are thankful that in the spiritual freedom, which is our inheritance, and the principle of undogmatic open fellowship, on which our church is founded, we have an unobstructed way, and can give ourselves freely and gladly to be led in the way of truth and of progressive life; that our religion and our life may be, as they ought to be, one and the same thing, and we have not to profess or pretend anything that we do not honestly believe and intend.

Through the testing of this time of bitter trial, which to many sensitive hearts is a time of veritable agony, we are called to greater sincerity and earnestness of religious life. We hear so much of what our men have learnt amid the actual horrors of the war, face to face every day with the supreme issues of life and death—how the formal and external things of the divided churches fall away, and men get down to the fundamental things of human need, and the deep things of the spirit, love and loyalty and self-sacrifice, in which all are at one; and we are told that when they come back, and take up with us again the work of building up the life of this nation, they will be impatient of the old conventions and pretences and futile disputings over unessential things, and will demand of the churches more honest and effectual grappling with the real problems of human need and a firmer hold upon the things of the deeper life. We are warned to be ready and to make ourselves more worthy of that new companionship and the tasks to which we shall be called.

It will be well for us if we are moved, even from afar, by that spirit of heroism and self-sacrifice and steadfastness, which we recognise and honour in the men of our fighting forces, and are so brought to clearer vision and a fuller measure of devoted service. It rests with ourselves, through the grace of God, to make of our Church a living power for good, in however humble a place, to preserve and enrich its spirit of sincerity in worship, in brotherly fellowship, and earnest purpose in the service of the Kingdom of God.

UNITARIANS AND THE WAR.

To the Editor of THE INQUIRER.

SIR,—May I venture to give expression to a few thoughts on the subject of Unitarians and the war? What is on my mind is the belief that our extreme pacifist friends are labouring under a false impression about the proper attitude of Unitarians towards the war. It seems to be implied that because Unitarians in the past have written on their banner "The Brotherhood of Man," therefore they are peculiarly guilty in taking part in the war. To begin with, as I construe it, the Unitarian movement has been distinguished by one outstanding feature, and that is its insistence upon all the virtues that centre round allegiance to the truth—integrity, veracity, justice, liberty. It is quite unnecessary to remind readers of THE INQUIRER of the significance of the lives of men such as the early Unitarian martyrs, and the founders of many of our churches, or to quote the watchwords of our leaders, to prove this. Following the Master, men of our faith have held that it is possible to learn the Will of God and that it is true life to do that Will, individually, civically, nationally. I believe the atmosphere is considerably cleared if we realise at the outset that this is the bedrock of our faith. It becomes at any rate more clear why some of us—not bloodthirsty men, or war-makers—because we believe it to be God's will for us, are supporting this fight in defence of the principles that were clearly stated by our leaders at the outset of the war. We are thinking and not unfeeling men; our eyes are not blind to the dark shadows thrown across our life to-day, the brutalising effect of the war on many men, the dangers of militarism, the tendency to forsake the highest aim, let alone the sickening horrors of death and devastation, and the wringing pain of loss in our homes and the homes of those we love. But before all things the Will of God must be done, and though to many people it seems blasphemy for us to associate that phrase with our part in the war, nevertheless humbly and with an intensified sense of the awe, the responsibility, and the majesty of life, we believe we are doing that Will in defence of the principles of national integrity, veracity, justice, and liberty, and in opposition to a people whose action was described by their Imperial Chancellor as "this wrong—I speak openly—which we are committing." And we believe it to be God's Will that we should continue this defence until Germany proclaims, with equal clearness: "This wrong which we have committed—we speak openly—we now desire, so far as in us lies, to undo."

In all this we hold no brief against brotherhood. The Brotherhood of Man is a fact; men are all sons of one Father. In this field of brotherhood we must build the kingdom of God. But how? And on what foundations? I think I am right in saying that as Unitarians we believe we must build on the basis of the virtues that are subsumed under the phrase "the truth"—integrity, veracity, justice, liberty. Our friends reply that the basis must be fellowship and love. But while love is the height and the goal, it cannot in its fulness come first in time. International fellowship is made possible by international justice: true love can be sustained only on a high plane of rectitude—"Here properly soul first meets with soul and society begins to be possible."

"Serene will be our days and bright, and happy will our natures be, when love is an unerring light"—but that time is not yet. As Unitarians we hold that the unerring light is the "star of truth"; that we must follow that light with perfect trust even when it appears to lead us away from the goal of fellowship for a time, knowing that we are thus following the beck of the spirit, the command of God who is Perfect Love, and who will lead us by His own way to the kingdom of Love. As surely as we try to build the kingdom in some other way, or achieve world-wide fellowship while the foundations are as yet only in the process of construction, just as surely will all our work go to pieces when some crucial test is applied.

Is it not amply evident that the world needs just this faith, preached with power and built into life, as it has been by our forebears, who were not given to mere disquisitions about love and peace, but strove to get down to bedrock and spent themselves in swinging some stones of justice, integrity, and liberty into their places in the social structure? They were called "cold" because of it, and we inherit the taunt; but as they marched high-breasted, so must we, and build where we know God needs the building. Those who are well-read in the history of our faith know how much love and warmth there has been in our men and women; it may not always have been spoken in words, but it was certainly poured out in great and spacious enterprise for the establishment of those principles of freedom and justice on which the Kingdom of Love will rest. And we to-day need not fear the taunt that we are unloving; rather keep our tears in our hearts, take our share in the hardships, call down God's blessing on our sons that they may be true to our faith and fight the good fight for truth, deepen our inflexible resolve to fight for God and our faith in the immortal life of all, whether enemies or friends, who have died in the strife. In the meantime it is entirely consistent on our part to give ourselves eagerly to acts of loving kindness wherever we may and can; deny by our action the assertion that hate always begets hate, and show that in this instance hatred is met with large-hearted chivalry, ready to forgive as soon as the wrong is confessed and the fitting reparation made. Yours, &c.,

John C. Ballantyne.

DR. PRICE AND THE FREEDOM OF THE CITY OF LONDON.

To the Editor of The Inquirer.

Sir,—As your two correspondents in last issue differ, perhaps you may like to insert the following in the interest of historical accuracy.—Yours, &c.,

R. J. Jones.

At a Court of the Common Council, 14th March, 1776,

It was resolved :—

That the freedom of the City be presented in a gold box of the value of £50 to the Rev. Dr. Richard Price as a graceful testimony of the approbation of the Court for his late pamphlet, intituled 'Observations on the Nature of Civil Liberty, the Principles of Government and the Justice and Policy of the War with America.'

Dr. Price replied :—

Newington Green,
21st July, 1776.

Sir,—I am happy in the opportunity given me, by receiving from your hands the Freedom of the City of London, to repeat my thanks to the Lord Mayor, the Aldermen, and Common Council for the great honour they have done me. It is impossible I should not be deeply impressed by testimonies of their approbation so condescending and generous. May the City of London always flourish, and may the Kingdom be delivered from the dreadful danger with which it is threatened by the present Civil War.

I am, Sir, with great respect,
Your most obedient and humble servant,

Richard Price.

To Benjamin Hopkins, Esq.,
Chamberlain of the City of London.

The Rev. Gardner Preston writes: "My memory has played me false. I cannot find any proof for my statement that the late Dr. Alex. Maclaren was made a Freeman of the City of Manchester. Nor does there appear any evidence that Bishop Fraser was so honoured."

MEMORIAL NOTICE.

MISS HARRIET E. HIGGINSON.

As announced in our issue of last week, Miss Harriet E. Higginson died at her home, The Knoll, Ambleside, on May 29, after a long illness very bravely borne. We take the following notice from The Westmorland Gazette of June 2 :—

Miss Harriet Emily Higginson was the daughter of the late Alfred Higginson, M.R.C.S., of Liverpool, niece of the Rev. James Martineau, and a niece also of Miss Harriet Martineau, who built and came to reside at The Knoll in 1846, and there did much of the writing which has made her name famous. Miss Higginson was educated at Bedford College, London. Her home was in Liverpool till her father retired in 1878, and removed to Tulse Hill, London, where he died in 1884 ; she then went with her mother to Southport, and after her death in 1889, Miss Higginson spent five years with her brother, the Rev. Philip Higginson, who was minister at Monton Church, near Manchester. She and her brother inherited The Knoll through their mother, but before coming to Ambleside nineteen years ago, she went on a voyage to Australia and New Zealand to visit her cousins. She was deeply interested in public affairs and as strong in her opinions as her illustrious aunt, but withal made many true and earnest friendships. A great lover of nature, and particularly of botany, she was successful in inspiring others in the same direction. For years she used to send specimens of flowers to one of the schools for the poor in Liverpool. She was closely connected with the Home Reading Union and had a large class of young people who met as a reading circle periodically in her dining-room. She was particularly active till eight months ago, since when she has been a total invalid. The interment took place on Thursday at the Ancient Chapel of Toxteth, Liverpool, in the grave where her mother and her infant brother and sisters were laid to rest long ago. The Rev. T. Lloyd Jones conducted the service. We may add that Miss Higginson took great interest in the Summer Services conducted in the Old Chapel (Rydal Road, adjoining the Knoll), which had been purchased by her brother.

BRITISH AND FOREIGN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

PUBLIC MEETING.

THE Public Meeting was held at Essex Hall on Wednesday, May 30, at 7 o'clock, the President, Dr. Carpenter, in the chair. It was announced by the Chairman that the Master of Balliol, to his very great regret, was unable to be present, owing to an engagement in Oxford which he felt it his duty to keep, but he had sent to Dr. Carpenter an interesting message, which he proceeded to read to the meeting, and which will be found on another page. A letter had also been received from Miss Spurgeon, who is suffering from a recent bereavement and was not well enough to be present and deliver her address.

NEED OF A COMMON BASIS.

DR. CARPENTER, in introducing the subject which it had been proposed that they should consider that evening, namely, 'The Need and the Opportunity for the Reorganisation of the Religious Life of the Country,' said the war had brought all kinds of new difficulties while at the same time it had emphasised many old sores. They had been forced to realise the tremendous hold which the drink traffic had upon the people, terrible revelations had been made as to the extent of the social evil in our midst, they were becoming more and more conscious of the labour unrest throughout the country and the problems that were involved in the acquiring of large profits, and the view taken of this by those who had to endure the burden of high prices even if they had also benefited by increased wages. Abroad they were faced with a perfect orgy of political wickedness and cruelty on the part of their adversaries which had staggered imagination, and for many people had resulted in a complete loss of faith. Baffled by the immensity of the issues before them they were wondering what would come out of it all, and how they were to attempt the religious reconstruction of the country. They were thrown back, Dr. Carpenter said, upon the most naked elements of faith, upon the bedrock of their whole mental and moral constitution, upon those abiding realities of faith and trust which nothing that had occurred, nothing that ever could occur throughout this terrific struggle, could dislodge or even disturb. They had only to think of the permanencies that were all around them. The marvel of the order of nature remained unchanged, and they had just seen the magical beauty of spring rushing through the land. The stars still shone above the battlefield, and they were told how the nightingale sang amid the roar of cannon. When they turned to the inner life they found there how the springs of heroism and honour and self-sacrifice were welling up in many a man whom they had once thought degraded and brutal, and they knew that at the core of humanity there was something that transcended humanity, and linked them with the eternal action and being of God. Immense forces of good and evil had been released in their presence, and they had been made to see the chasm that lay between their ideals and their practice. Turning to the question of the reconstruction of the religious life of the country Dr. Carpenter said it was a gigantic task which it would take centuries to complete, and he could only suggest the first lines of common action. It was impossible to reorganise and combine without some starting-point upon which they were all agreed, and he himself was convinced that neither ecclesiastical dogma nor ecclesiastical polity provided that common basis. Certain movements of groups in the various religious communities towards unity were, however, taking place, as, for instance, between the great Methodist bodies, the two great Presbyterian Churches in Scotland, and the Evangelical Churches in this country. At Swanwick members of all denominations had been brought together to organise themselves for the study of the great social questions, and only a week ago he had attended the sub-committee of a new interdenominational council at Oxford which had been established in order to consider the rates of wages, the question of housing, temperance, public morality, &c., and the same kind of thing was happening in other towns. Here was reconstruction in progress already, because a common basis of thought and action had been found. Everything depended, however, on the temper with which we came out of the present war, and upon the moral effect which it had wrought on the life of the people. A flood of new problems was rushing upon us, and men were almost overwhelmed in a sea of uncertainties. They needed courage and trust, wide knowledge, searching insight, and a realisation of the interdependence of humanity. President Wilson had defined in the clearest terms the conditions upon which, in the future, the great aims of humanity must control the actions of the separate peoples. How this new ideal would express itself and what forms it would take in the future they could not yet see, but it was far more vivid and concrete, he thought, than the Christian Church itself. The Christian Church was, in truth, the biggest international organisation on the face of the earth, but at the same time it was so rent by internal divisions that they could not make it the starting-point for the realisation of the ideal of humanity. The time would not be long before a great option would be offered to them, for when peace was made they would have to ask themselves how they were going to treat the adversary with whom they had contended. That was the problem of the immediate future, and they could not organise religious life effectively if they started with the bitterness of concealed hatred, and tried to keep Germany outside the league of nations allied to promote the common aims of humanity.

VALUE OF ORGANISED RELIGION.

The REV. NEANDER ANDERTON of Monton said that organised religion, owing to the war, had experienced the greatest shock it had felt since the evolution theory was propounded. The shock given by the evolution theory was due to the fact that it traced the origin of man to a brute ancestry and associated him with Nature, "red in tooth and claw." Since that time man had himself gone back to those conditions, and they all felt deeply the shame attached to that fact. Organised religion, as the Chairman had reminded them, did not at the present time cover the whole of the religious life of the country, which embraced all the deepest, holiest, and purest impulses of men and women who never thought of entering a church at all. It was possible to have a religion unconnected with church or chapel; but this did not mean that non-church-going was to be exalted into a virtue. On the contrary, one of the reasons for the feebleness of the churches was the fact that the men and women referred to were not associated with the churches, and pouring into them their life and feeling. Religion lost half its power and influence through being solitary. It had been said that the war had been brought about by a few diplomatists and militarists, but that was not a satisfactory explanation. They must further ask: How did these men have the power to do it? The truth was that the people of Europe could not will against war because they had not previously willed a right peace, as they would realise if they considered the state of things before the war. The whole problem of humanity was rendered complex by the fact that men were daily giving evidence of a barbaric as well as a humane side to their nature, and in every one of the great nations at war there was a great fund of common feeling to draw upon which was not yet free from the impulses of an earlier time. The breath of change was, however, blowing everywhere, only they must beware of thinking that change alone was what they needed before they decided into what they wanted to change, or how they were going to achieve their desire. Mr. Neville Talbot had spoken in his book of the peasants of France, the men and women at work in the fields, whose duties were fixed, and whose thoughts and efforts would seem to be concentrated entirely on their immediate activities without any thought for the things which affected humanity as a whole, and yet they thrilled at once to the cry vive la France! to the call of nationality, and the feeling that they were serving, not purely local interests, but their own people and country. That was a parable. We belong to humanity, and everything we do as in the sight of God is serving the great ends of the race. We must be reckless about denominations so long as we are loyal to God.

RESPONSIBILITY AND FREEDOM.

The REV. DR. RATTRAY of Hindley said the question which every thinking man and woman must ask, as a result of facing realities during the war, was "What really matters in life, and what matters ultimately?" The war had demonstrated once and for all the absolute need of moral men and women, and the destinies of humanity would not be safe unless men and women placed moral responsibility, founded upon religion, before everything else. They had always before them as a national ideal at its best the traditional "British gentleman," with all that it meant in regard to generosity, honour, endurance, humour, tenderness, the love of fair play, justice, and courage, and one could wish that our conception of a courageous man might be enlarged so as to include those who were willing to take up solitary outposts of thought and feeling in order to solve problems which the world, sooner or later, will have to face. This type, which was worthy of all admiration, was really founded indissolubly upon religion, whether people knew it or not. There was only one explanation of the world which was really necessary, and that was that behind external things there was the unseen life of the spirit that we call God. Many people had been sorely perplexed since the war began in attempting to reconcile this divine governance of the world with all that was happening, but the truth was that God was constantly working through matter, and showing men his laws, but he had also given them the terrible power of refusing to obey His commands, and all the evils in the world, without exception, could ultimately be traced to that great refusal. The responsibility lay with man, and with him alone. In order that God's purpose should be realised it was necessary that they should be free, and in that freedom the common ground of religion was mapped out for them, for the freedom they claimed must be freedom for Christianity, which was a living and growing thing. The Church of the future must embrace all the finest flowers of the free spirit—art, literature, music, and poetry. There was danger, of course, in freedom, and they must not be surprised if sometimes people inspired by it took the bit between their teeth, but there were great spiritual safeguards against freedom being turned into licence, and they need not be afraid of any one possessing it who was really sincere, who was seeking the truth, and whose great desire was to grow.

Things Worse than War.

Lieut.-Col. Bullock, who had kindly consented to address the meeting in the place of one of the absent speakers, referred to the resolution which had been passed at the meeting that morning, expressing satisfaction at the entry of America into the war on the side of the Allies. In his opinion, he said, the United States had found her own soul when it declared itself for the world's redemption. He hated war, but there were worse things than war—the ruthless slaying of the unoffending, the enslavement of the human mind, the denial of the rights of freedom to those whom God had made free. He had seen the shadow of war sweeping up over the horizon, he had seen the lamps in the homes go out one by one, but it would have been a sadder thing to watch the lights of liberty extinguished and the world wrapped in a darkness through which no star of hope might shine. These were days when every man must declare himself, for there was no neutral ground between Jesus and Judas Iscariot. No nation could permanently endure if its citizens reserved to themselves the right to say when, and where, and at what time they would serve it. He felt that the citizen who refused to defend his nation when its existence was imperilled should be automatically deprived of the benefits and the protection which that State had bestowed upon him. The cry of the State should be: "Defend me, or you shall not be defended by me." He was not there to speak of war, but of the things that should be when the present fearful war had run its course, nevertheless he prayed that God would bless their flag and his flag, because of those flags, as of no others, it might be said that the weal and the woe of the whole world were wrapped in their folds. He did not know exactly what they could do in regard to religious reconstruction after the war, for time alone would show them; but he was convinced that religion would be successful only in so far as it expressed itself in terms of service. The war was leading them to realise through bitter experiences the things that made for the advance of civilisation, and the Church would have its place in giving those things to the people. Christianity was not, however, a flabby, emasculated thing without any power of asserting itself against wrong, but rather the dynamic of God against the evil in the world, setting up the principles of Jesus in its place.

A vote of thanks to the Chairman and the speakers, proposed by Dr. Wicksteed, brought the proceedings to a close.

OPENING OF LAWRENCE HOUSE.

On Thursday afternoon in Whit-week a simple and delightful ceremony was observed at Essex Hall in connection with the opening and dedication of Lawrence House. Dr. Carpenter presided; and in calling upon Mr. R. M. Montgomery, K.C., to give a short account of the origin and history of the scheme, congratulated him and all who had assisted by their labour and their money in establishing so useful and promising an institution.

Mr. Montgomery said that while attending a meeting of representatives of District Societies held at Essex Hall in October last, he suggested that something more should be attempted by Unitarians as a denomination to keep in friendly touch with men on active service belonging to our churches and schools. Out of this suggestion the scheme for providing a hostel had its origin. The tenancy of No. 1 Essex Street, directly adjoining Essex Hall, ended early in 1917; and Mr. Howard Chatfeild Clarke showed how the old house could be transformed into a modern hostel, and when linked up with other rooms at Essex Hall would provide a bright and useful centre of rest and recreation for our soldiers and sailors when visiting London. After the war, the hostel would become available for young men connected with our churches and schools as a temporary lodging in the metropolis, while they made arrangements for a more permanent home. In devising the scheme, Mr. Montgomery said that he was most anxious to avoid appeals for annual subscriptions; and it was necessary, therefore, to raise a sufficiently large sum, the income from which would provide rent, rates, and taxes, and ordinary working expenses. An endowment fund of £5,000, with £1,000 for alterations, furniture, and supplying literature, say for two years, to our 6,000 men on active service, was the estimated amount. How could any one hope to secure £6,000 from a small group of Unitarians in war-time? Dr. Carpenter met a few of our ever-generous laymen; they discussed the scheme, gave their approval, and promised their support, if it got under way. Lady Durning-Lawrence was then approached by Mr. Howard Chatfeild Clarke and himself; and in view of a promise made by the late Sir Edwin Durning-Lawrence to contribute to the extension of Essex Hall towards the Strand she offered to give £2,000, provided other people subscribed £3,000; her name was not to be mentioned until and unless this sum was raised. Within a month, the estimated amount was forthcoming. Owing to war conditions, there had been delay in getting the work done, and the cost was larger than had been contemplated. American Unitarians, through Dr. S. A. Eliot, had sent a gift of £200, and a draft for a further £100 had gone to the bottom of the sea while on its way to England. The total sum subscribed was £6,805, and £5,475 of this sum had been invested as an endowment fund. The rooms were now ready for occupation, and Miss Beeley, the Matron, would give any of our soldiers and sailors visiting London a hearty welcome to Lawrence House.

Dr. Carpenter then presented a suitably inscribed silver key to Lady Durning-Lawrence, and invited her to declare the building duly open. He explained the reasons which had led the Committee to suggest the name of "Lawrence House," and spoke appreciatively of the valued services rendered by the three Lawrence brothers in securing Essex Hall as a central meeting place for Unitarians in the year 1885.

Lady Durning-Lawrence on rising received a most cordial welcome from the audience. She referred to the very deep interest which her late husband and his brothers had taken in the foundation of Essex Hall; and she was glad that such an admirably useful extension had been rendered possible. She trusted that Lawrence House would become a centre of rest and recreation for our men now serving in the army or the navy, and that after the war it would become a temporary home for a long succession of young men coming up to London from our churches and schools in all parts of the country, and from lands beyond the seas. She had the greatest possible pleasure in declaring Lawrence House "open."

Mrs. Sydney Martineau, in moving a vote of thanks to Lady Durning-Lawrence, spoke of the close friendship which had existed between the Lawrence family and her own father and mother, and their common devotion to the Unitarian denomination and its educational and philanthropic work. She believed as the years passed that Lawrence House would become an increasingly useful addition to Essex Hall, and a source of inspiration and helpfulness to our young men at home and abroad.

Mrs. Wooding, who along with Mrs. Martineau had been most assiduous in preparing the hostel for occupation, seconded the vote of thanks. She referred to herself as belonging to the present generation of Unitarians, and she had pleasure in associating herself with all that had been said in respect to Lawrence House and its possibilities of usefulness.

Dr. Carpenter, in putting the resolution to the meeting, which was carried by acclamation, expressed the hope that our ministers and Sunday school superintendents would direct attention to Lawrence House and the facilities it offered to our young men when visiting London.

A prayer of dedication by the President brought the proceedings to a close. Dr. Carpenter then conducted Lady Durning-Lawrence on a perambulation of the newly furnished rooms in Essex Hall, including the "American" Room, and of Lawrence House itself. The Matron afterwards provided tea in her sitting-room. The establishment of the Hostel and Social Centre, described in the report of the Committee of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association as the chief "event" of the year, was thus consummated.

THE WOMEN'S LEAGUE.

THE Annual Meeting of the Women's British League of Unitarian and other Liberal Christian Women was held at Essex Hall on May 30. There was a large attendance, and the proceedings opened with a short devotional service, conducted by Miss Margaret B. Crook of Manchester College, Oxford, who preached from the words "Whereunto we have already attained by that rule let us walk" (Philippians iii. 16).

We have set ourselves ideals, said the preacher in the course of an impressive address, that we might go amongst our neighbours as those who were about their Father's business. In so doing we have found it true that we have embarked upon a life-long enterprise, that we have formed a fellowship whose purpose could not be accomplished in a day, or a year; that it was not a scheme with an ending, but a league in which we had to play our part and to go on playing our part all the time. The days in which the league was founded seem far away. The differences between then and now are striking, indeed, but the one difference that immediately concerns the league lies here—the ideals we put before us in the early days sprang from among ourselves. We chose them and tried to follow them. They were ideals to which we had attained in mind, and by which we made the resolve to walk. To-day, that by which we have to walk is thrust upon us. It comes compelling our adherence. It comes not so much as an ideal set by ourselves as a demand for certain qualities that we shall exhibit on the spot. It is no question to-day whether we will, or will not, show courage. We have to show courage. We are not asked whether we will, or will not, endure. From year to year we must endure perforce. Perhaps we have formerly known what hard work meant, but to-day we work because we must, because of shortage of labour, or because we cannot tolerate an idle life. To-day we are public-spirited, whether or not we should be so in the ordinary way, because occasion wrings it out of us. That is the situation which faces the league to-day. In considering it we can see why it is possible for the war to sweep over us, imposing upon us for the time being seeming strength, and then to end, leaving us weak and aimless and exhausted. We must see to it that this does not happen to us.

MRS. W. BLAKE ODGERS presided at the business meeting. Selections from the Annual Report were read by Miss Brooke Herford, Hon. Organising Secretary, showing, among other things, that there had been a great development of the international work of the league during the war.

MISS GRACE MITCHELL, Fellowship Secretary, spoke upon the details of fellowship work, and said that a tremendous problem was presented by the young people, a problem which the League were out to solve. She urged that junior branches should be formed wherever possible, and that ministers and Sunday school superintendents should keep in touch with league activities in this direction. A tribute was paid to the excellent work of Miss Delf amongst the soldiers.

MRS. SYDNEY MARTINEAU presented the balance sheet, stating that it was much better than at one time she thought it would be. New subscriptions from the Northern branches, and increased subscriptions from branches in other parts of the country had resulted in a balance in hand. She emphasised the fact that regular annual subscriptions are the financial mainstay of the league.

In the regrettable absence of Mrs. Alfred Wilson through illness, the report of the Publications Committee was read by Mrs. E. R. Fyson, showing that the Monthly Letter was becoming more and more valued as a medium of communication between the Central Committee and the branches.

MISS CLEPHAN of Leicester, in moving the adoption of the report and balance sheet, said she was glad that the League was taking up the question of the cinemas. Bodies like their own would be doing a large amount of good if they could induce the managers to provide better pictures and purer air. If the branches would take an active interest in this work she was sure that the cinemas could be improved without legislation.

This was seconded by MISS E. R. LEE, who alluded to the excellent work of the League in connection with the Belgian Hospital Fund. The motion was carried.

MRS. BERNARD ALLEN proposed the re-election of the officers and committee, and mentioned that the majority of the articles which she had been able to send to the Belgian hospitals were contributed by members of the League, one of whom, Miss Grace Holmes of Hull, was in France rendering great assistance to the soldiers.

This was seconded by MISS ANNE BARKER of Todmorden, and carried. Certain alterations to the rules were agreed to on the motion of Mrs. J. C. Drummond, seconded by Miss E. Johnstone of Bury.

The PRESIDENT, in the course of her address, said it was difficult at this, the fifth Annual Meeting over which she had presided, to find fresh thoughts to put before them, and yet having watched closely the developments of the League she felt that a useful word of encouragement and good cheer might be said for the delegates to take back to the branches. Alluding to her recent visits to Manchester and Liverpool, she said that nothing could have been more encouraging to those who went from London than the real interest shown in those meetings. North and South were brought closer together, and the good fellowship between them was abounding. The spirit of the meetings was what mattered most, but from the point of view of added strength the meetings were also successful, for three new branches were gained. The ideal of what the Women's League might be to our Churches would not come near to attainment till there was a branch in every congregation, seriously setting itself to carry out the objects for which they were banded together. To be members of a League branch made a more serious call upon them than to be just members of a sewing society, or a circle to study social questions. The activities of a League branch could include any or all of these, but behind and above and around them would be the larger purpose and scope of the League "To quicken the religious life of our Churches, and to bring Unitarian and other Liberal Christian women into close co-operation and fellowship." Another argument in favour of being connected with the League was that when public claims are made upon our women they could join in as a branch, with the support of the League at their back, and thus carry more weight; and in this connection she urged that the name of the League should be more definitely and widely used by all the branches. Alluding to the Fellowship work, which was growing every year, the President said they needed to remind themselves that loneliness of soul was common to us all. The fellowship was meant for women and girls of whatever class, whether highly educated or not, whether of leisure or working for a livelihood. A Fellowship Secretary was needed in every branch, and also in every church where there was no branch. This brought her to what she felt to be the most important work to which they must seriously set their hand. They must win the young members of the Churches to come into the League as members, and make them feel that they were wanted. When they were called away to fresh scenes and out of reach of home, they would be more likely to be interested as fellowship members and have a truer understanding of what it means to be faithful to our Unitarian belief and thought if the older members, whose personal influence should be at their disposal, saw that they had opportunities for reading, thinking, and questioning on those subjects. Women's greatest and highest influence must be due always to what they are, rather than to what they can do in the world. Let them do things by all means, but let all their doing be consecrated service, worthy of the best they know, and sweetened by the spirit of helpfulness and the longing to live so that their years of service to God and man may bear good fruit for the generations still to come.

MRS. ODGERS proposed a vote of thanks to Miss Crook for her address. This was seconded by Miss Harriet M. Johnson of Liverpool, who coupled with the motion the name of Mrs. Odgers, and it was carried by acclamation.

CENTRAL POSTAL MISSION.

THE Annual Meeting of the Postal Mission was held on Thursday, May 31, at 2 o'clock, Miss Tagart, the President, in the chair. Miss Tagart said that never had they needed the sustaining power of God in their work more than during the past three years, and never had the need for a clear, outspoken faith been so much wanted as in these tragic days when so many hearts are wrung with sorrow. It had been given to the workers of the Postal Mission to bring comfort and help to numbers of struggling souls, as some of the extracts from letters published at the end of the report would show. They could not stay their hands now, but must press forward and do what little lay in their power to help those who needed enlightenment and encouragement. With reference to the widespread influence of their work, the activities of Mr. Shinde in India among the Untouchables, which he undertook as a result of his interest in the Postal Mission, and which was now absorbing his energies, was of special interest. Literature had been sent to several Somajes in the three Presidencies, where the Theistic Societies are doing a wonderful work, and where the caste system is gradually being superseded at the cost of much self-sacrifice on the part of those who refuse to be bound by it. The whole question of education in India was a most important one, in which the Brahmo Samaj might play a great part. The work in connection with the Italian Association of Free Believers was progressing, in spite of Signor Conte's illness, and Signor Murri, who is closely connected with the Italiana Riforma, speaking of the scepticism and disregard of religion so prevalent in Italy at the present time, had expressed the opinion that the regeneration of his country depended upon the light thrown upon the problems of religion from their point of view.

MISS FLORENCE HILL, Hon. Secretary, in presenting the report, referred to the regrettable fact that Miss Ethel Lake was too unwell to attend the meeting. Miss Lake had been appointed trustee to the Framlingham Old Meeting House Trust, and had made a special appeal for funds, with a view to putting the accounts on a sounder footing and increasing the minister's salary, which has resulted in £66 being raised. This splendid piece of work was a matter for congratulation, and Miss Edith Lake, who had kindly promised to read the financial statement in place of her sister, was requested to convey to Miss Ethel Lake the sympathy of those present in her illness. The financial statement was then presented.

MR. H. G. CHANCELLOR, in moving the adoption of the reports, expressed his increasing admiration of the work which the Central Postal Mission has been doing for twenty-nine years, and spoke in warm terms of the great affection with which they all regarded their President. He felt that, in view of the difficulties which so many people were encountering at the present time in regard to their religious beliefs, the problems which would perplex the men at the front when they returned, and the reasons which often prevented inquirers from laying bare their souls to those who knew them intimately, the Mission had a great work before it, and the mere fact that it had at present a roll of over 1,100 correspondents was no measure of the extent of its influence. That influence was bound to spread in numerous ways wherever an individual had been comforted and strengthened by it.

The REV. CYRIL FLOWER, in seconding the adoption of the reports, pleaded for a recognition of the fact that such work as the Postal Mission was doing was for the purpose of clarifying thought and deepening religious consciousness everywhere rather than making converts for one special denomination. The effect of prejudice and bigotry were like the effects of smoke on a large manufacturing town, and the first thing they had to do was to destroy the smoke, before they could apply their minds to the more constructive work which they would rather be engaged upon. They should associate as much as possible with those who might differ from them in regard to the exact interpretation of faith, but whom they could meet on the fundamental basis of the unity of the spirit, and they should be so much in love with religion itself that it would not matter if their denomination disappeared from the face of the earth.

MR. SANDS gave an account of the work of the Suffolk Mission, touching upon the position of the agricultural classes at the present time and the sacrifices they had made in manhood for the nation; and MR. BEGG, one of the Pioneer Preachers, proposed the election of officers for the ensuing year.

NATIONAL UNITARIAN TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION.

ANNUAL MEETING.

THE twenty-fourth Annual Meeting of the National Unitarian Temperance Association was held at Essex Hall on Friday, June 1, Dr. Carpenter, the President, in the chair. The business meeting was held at 4 o'clock, when the annual report was adopted and Dr. J. E. Carpenter was re-elected as President.

At 7 o'clock a public meeting was held. Dr. Carpenter presided, and Lieut.-Col. C. S. Bullock gave an address on 'The Progress of Prohibition in Other Lands.'

The CHAIRMAN, in the course of his presidential address, gave a wide survey of the work of the Control Boards and other methods of diminishing the sale of drink adopted during the war. He pointed out that in the first year of the war in greater London, in 36 boroughs with a population exceeding 100,000 each, the total number of convictions were 117,489. Last year, in 1916, the number was 52,000, a reduction of considerably more than 50 per cent. The production of beer had been reduced by nearly one-third, and there had been a very remarkable development in the establishment of canteens, no fewer than 650 having been established in connection with controlled munition and other factories, in addition to 60 in the transport service, the greater part of which were "dry." Science continued to emphasise the danger of alcohol and to warn them that it was a deleterious ingredient in the human frame, and they would not forget in this connection the splendid services which had been rendered to their cause by the late Sir Victor Horsley. Magistrates told the same tale, and gave evidence as to the connection between drunkenness and crime, and from every quarter of the country and all sections of the community appeals had come to "stop the drink." After enumerating the various protests which had been made to the Government since the war began, and which have formed the subject of frequent comment in these columns, Dr. Carpenter said the members of the Association must push their cause, first of all by individual example, and secondly by such combined action as could be carried out in the immediate neighbourhood where they lived. They must labour until the curse of drunkenness was lifted from the land, and a sober nation realised that only in true self-mastery was real freedom.

LIEUT.-COL. C. S. BULLOCK, who dealt chiefly with prohibition as it has been experienced in various provinces of Canada and the United States, said there were always fools who said that under prohibition more liquor was drunk than before they had it. If that were true, then the best thing the liquor seller could do was to let prohibition go on. But they knew, of course, that it was not true. It took a power behind the law to make a law effectual, and he realised that you could not make a man sober by framing laws, but when he heard of some of the shifts that drink lovers were put to under prohibitory law in order to get a drop of whisky or beer he felt perfectly sure that most men would not often go to so much trouble in order to procure it. He once asked an official on a railway station in the United States if he could get a drink anywhere in the town, which was "dry." The man replied that if he would go with him he would give him some. Col. Bullock humorously described how they went down street and lane and alley till they found themselves in a sort of barn, and there, under a heap of manure, his guide showed him a hidden bottle of spirit. He emphasised the fact that many of the lads who have come from overseas to fight in the present war never saw a legalised public house until they arrived in England, and, in future, the mothers of these boys, seeing what havoc had been wrought, would have something to say if ever another war was declared and a voluntary army was called for. It was a terrible thing that some of their very best manhood from Canada should have come into this country and should have suffered and died here, as a result of the degradation resulting from drink and vice, without ever seeing the field or taking part in the fighting. What was once a trouble belonging to the big cities would now be carried into the rural districts with disastrous results, and it was almost wholly attributable to drink. Dealing with the question of drunkenness under the system of State purchase, which he denounced in emphatic terms, Lieut.-Col. Bullock said drunkenness was just the same, whether under a high licence or a low one, under private ownership or State control. There was something in the stuff itself that bleared the eye, and put a tremble into the limbs, and took the steadiness out of the hand which proved it was accursed, and was the State going to sell this poison and make its consumption respectable ?" He was told that the money it would bring to the State could be devoted to social amelioration, to education, and things of that sort ; but he would rather forfeit all the benefits it produced than add to the misery of innocent women, destroy happy homes, and rob the little child of its joy in life. They ought not to make things harder, either, for the poor, weak fellow who could not resist drink, but to lift him up and help him. The whole thing was a question of public opinion and public agitation, and if they persistently pointed their finger at the evil they wanted to remove, concentrating their efforts on trying to make others see it as clearly as they did and hate it as much, public opinion would change and the drink traffic would have to go. All the remedies that had been suggested for experiment in England had been tried in other countries, and they did not work. Nothing brought about the immediate benefits which prohibition secured, and the United States had found this out. They did not want the power to traffic in human happiness in the supposed interests of the State.

Mr. Arnold Lupton, Mr. Thomas Wicksteed, Mr. S. P. Penwarden, and Mr. Baily of Winnipeg (who spoke from the Labour standpoint), took part in the interesting discussion which followed. Mr. Harold Coventry moved a resolution calling upon the Government to introduce immediately a measure of total prohibition for the period of the war and demobilisation. Mr. H. G. Chancellor, M.P., seconded the motion, putting forward the view that breweries and distilleries should be allowed to continue their operations, on condition that their products were devoted to the uses of industry. The resolution was carried, and it was agreed that a copy of it should be sent to the Prime Minister and to the Home Secretary. The meeting closed with a hearty vote of thanks to the Chairman and to Lieut.-Col. Bullock, proposed by Dr. Lionel Tayler.

UNITARIAN HISTORICAL SOCIETY.

THE Annual Meeting was held at Essex Hall on May 30, the President, Mr. John C. Warren, in the chair. The report and statement of accounts were presented and adopted. The President and officers were re-elected and the Rev. H. McLachlan was added to the Council. It was reported that gifts for the library of the Society had been presented by Lady Durning-Lawrence, Miss E. H. Green, Mr. Philip Green, and the Rev. J. C. Odgers. The first number of the Society's Transactions had been issued to subscribers. The question of forming an index of rare volumes of historical interest in the older chapel libraries was raised in letters from the ministers of Dundee and Loughborough. The matter was referred to the Council.

A public meeting followed at which the President read a paper entitled 'From Puritanism to Unitarianism at Lincoln,' Mr. R. M. Montgomery, K.C., was in the chair. Mr. Warren traced the history of Puritanism in Lincoln from the days of the Reformation on through the seventeenth century when John Smith, an early "separatist" was "lecturer" at St. Peter's at Arches in Lincoln. Smith was followed later on at the same church by Edward Reyner of Cambridge University, a noted Puritan divine, who was ejected in 1662, and may be regarded as the founder of our Lincoln congregation. His work was taken up by James Abdy, after whom came Michael Drake. Mr. Warren gave an interesting account of the close connection of the Disney family with both the Lincoln and the Kirkstead chapel. These two congregations, together with Gainsborough, formed a closely related group. A curious interlude in the history of the present chapel was its permissive occupation for about ten years by a group of Whitefieldian Methodists and Calvinistic Baptists, who at the end of that term laid claim to the building and endowments. The trustees resisted this claim and re-entered upon possession of the premises, which were opened once more for Unitarian worship, August 19, 1804, by the Rev. Charles Wellbeloved. The paper will appear in full in the next number of the Transactions. Mr. Warren exhibited the deed of Kirkstead bearing the signature of Daniel Disney and the trust deed (1725) of the Lincoln Chapel. The Rev. W. H. Burgess announced that a meeting of the Society is arranged for June 27 in Manchester, to which friends in the Lancashire and Cheshire province are cordially invited.

MESSAGE FROM MISS WESTENHOLZ.

MISS M. B. WESTENHOLZ of Folehave, Denmark, sent the following message to be read at the Annual Meeting of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, "addressed to one and all in love and sympathy" :—

Every day I wish to write to you all, but I can never find words for what I feel. At times I feel as if all I could say was : "Oh, I am so sorry ! Oh, I am so sorry !" and then again I feel that what I want most of all to say is : "Thank you and God bless you !"

If I could take your hand in mine and hold it for some moments in perfect silence, I feel my heart so full of sympathy could find no better mode of expressing itself. And this is all I attempt to do in sending this message. I can almost feel, as if I were looking into your eyes and praying : "God give us a real Pentecost after this noble vicarious sacrifice,"

Your loving sister,
MARY B. WESTENHOLZ.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Chesterfield.—Sunday School Anniversary services were held at Elder Yard Chapel, on Sunday, June 3. The pastor (the Rev. Kenneth Bond), who is also the superintendent of the school, occupied the pulpit, and at both morning and evening service gave practical advice on the care and education of child life. There were good congregations, and the singing of the children reflected credit on the training of the organist and choirmaster (Mr. Blackshaw). The Manchester Sunday School Union set of hymns was used.

Framlingham.—A pleasant gathering took place on Whit-Monday, when some of the members of the Old Meeting House and Sunday school gathered in the garden of the Manse for tea, music and games. Much appreciation was expressed of the helpful spirit in which the minister and his wife, Mr. and Mrs. Sands, enter into the needs of the congregation and seek to promote its welfare.

Glossop.—A new window illustrating "The Good Samaritan" was unveiled by the Rev. H. E. Dowson in memory of the late Herbert Partington, Mayor of the Borough, on Whit-Sunday morning. A large and representative congregation assembled. The service was conducted by the minister (the Rev. J. Wilson), and a glowing tribute to the good work of the late mayor was paid by Mr. Dowson. On the following Tuesday, the annual business meeting of the Church was held, when reports were presented showing that the work of the past year was eminently satisfactory.

Hinckley.—The Sunday School Anniversary Services were held at the Great Meeting, on Sunday, May 20, when the Rev. Herbert Barnes, of Oldham Road, Manchester, preached to large congregations. Special hymns and anthems were rendered by the children and the choir, under the leadership of Mr. A. E. Beasley. Mrs. R. Burgess presided at the organ. In spite of the gaps which the war has made in the ranks of the congregation the spirit of loyalty has not been found wanting, and this year again there has been an appreciable increase in the anniversary collections.

Horsham.—The 144th Whit-Sunday anniversary was held on May 27 at the Free Christian Church in ideal summer weather. The preacher for the day, the Rev. A. Gordon, gave two sermons full of historic interest, with practical lessons for the life of to-day. In the afternoon selections on the organ were given by Messrs. D. Price, W. Baker, and W. S. Chesson. Collections for the British and Foreign Unitarian Association and the Provincial Assembly were taken at the close of each service. There was a fairly good attendance, which included many friends from a distance.

Manchester : Mr. Cadman's Ministerial Jubilee.—Inspiring services were held at the Oldham Road and Dob Lane Churches on Sunday, June 3, to mark the Ministerial Jubilee of the Rev. W. G. Cadman. Mr. Cadman was ordained to the ministry in the old Dob Lane Chapel, Failsworth, on June 1, 1867. He held this pastorate for five years. At the morning service last Sunday Mr. Cadman referred to the wonderful changes that fifty years had brought. He paid a tribute to the old stalwarts of faith and urged the present generation to hold fast to the traditions. In 1872 Mr. Cadman came to minister to the congregation worshipping at Varley Street. It was under his ministry that the present church in Oldham Road was built. Twenty-one years out of forty-six years of active service were spent by him in this congregation. Another twenty years found him first at Bethnal Green and afterwards at Macclesfield. For the past four years he has been on the retired list, but retirement has not meant for him a cessation from the good work. He renders help wherever needed and nearly every Sunday finds him in some one of our churches rendering service. He is still a constant attender and worshipper at Oldham Road, where he endeared himself by a long and faithful pastorate, and where he proved a good friend at a critical time in the congregation's history. Mr. Cadman conducted both services last Sunday. He preached with vigour and enthusiasm. He told us there was never any failure in good work. The sowing was our concern, the harvest was God's. The large congregations at both services were a tribute to his own work. He has engraved his name very deeply on the hearts of many during his fifty years of labour.

Newchurch.—On Sunday, May 27, the Anniversary Services in connection with the Unitarian Church were held. The Church was crowded in the evening. The preacher for the day was the Rev. W. G. Tarrant. Special hymns and anthems were sung by the choir and scholars, and the collections taken on behalf of the church amounted to £85. The minister, the Rev. T. J. Jenkins, is now making satisfactory progress, after a very serious illness extending over four months.

Newport, I.W.—On Wednesday, May 23, a Sale of Work was held in the schoolroom of the Unitarian Church, which was opened by the Mayor (Mr. F. E. Whitcher), Sir Edgar Chatfeild Clarke presiding. Those present included the Mayoress, the Revs. R. S. Jones (Congregational), and T. Letcher (United Methodist), Mr. and Mrs. Leslie Chatfeild Clarke, the Rev. J. Ruddle, minister of the Church, and Miss Ruddle. The Chairman recalled the fact that they were visiting the oldest place of worship in Newport. The records of the church extended over nearly two centuries. The first meeting-place of that community was built before 1728, and the present building was erected in 1774, and enlarged in 1825. During the whole of that period the members of the congregation had taken an active share in the public life of the town. The church had given three Mayors to that ancient borough, and at the incorporation of Newport in 1835, of the eighteen Town Councillors returned, six were members of that church. It had been singularly blessed by a long succession of devoted ministers. One specially remembered the Rev. Robert Aspland, a fearless and courageous champion of Nonconformity, the Rev. Edmund Kell, a friend of Samuel Wilberforce, then Rector of Brighstone, and afterwards Bishop of Oxford. The spirit which permeated the congregation was not a narrow sectarian spirit, but was based upon the widest liberality of sentiment and thought. In addition to the Mayor, he specially welcomed the two ministers from other churches. They appreciated their presence and reciprocated the kindly feeling which it betokened. The Mayor expressed the pleasure which it gave him to renew the very happy associations which he had had with that church for many years. Perhaps his presence might be regarded as being in a measure indicative of the gratitude of the town towards that church, whose ministers and members had contributed so much to its thought and culture. One instinctively thought of the late Rev. John Dendy, his able ministry there and his very charming and kindly personality. Then there were Mr. Jupp and Mr. Pike, and they were glad to know that in their present pastor they had one who worthily maintained the best traditions of the church. The laymen attached to it had borne an honourable share in the work of the town. One thought of the late Professor Morley, who, during his stay, was of inestimable advantage to the culture and thought of the town. They also remembered that that church had rendered loyal service to the town in supplying those who had occupied the position of chief magistrate, and one naturally associated in that connection the name of the late Mr. Robert Pinnock, one of the fathers of the Council, and they knew how revered his memory was. They also gratefully recognised the services of his son (the late Mr. Charles Pinnock), whose lite, full of brilliant promise, was cut short by an early death. The Rev. J. Ruddle proposed that hearty thanks be given to the Mayor and Mayoress. Mr. L. Chatfeild Clarke, in seconding, said that although small in numbers, Unitarians were to be found everywhere taking their part, a fact to which a lieutenant, belonging to their church, writing home from the Front, bore testimony. He also said, as a censor of soldiers' letters, how much the war had brought out the religious side and convictions of the men. Mr. Hawkins proposed a vote of thanks to the chairman, in whom their church and Sunday school had an exceedingly kind friend, and to the Revs. R. S. Jones and T. Letcher for the broad and kindly spirit they had shown in being present. Mr. Jones and Mr. Letcher replied in a friendly and appreciative spirit, expressing their sympathy and sense of essential unity in spite of some difference in thought and creed. After the opening ceremony the former sang a solo. The sum realised by the sale, including gifts from friends, amounted to £90.

Scottish Unitarian Sunday School Union.—The Annual Meeting of the Union was held in Edinburgh on May 26 and 27. On Saturday morning papers dealing with the development of the idea of the Kingdom of God from pre-Christian times to the present were read by the Revs. M. B. Skelland, S. T. Pagesmith, and R. V. Holt, B.A., and a model lesson was given by Mr. W. Twaddle. The business meeting, at which the reports were presented and the retiring office-bearers re-elected, was held in the evening and was followed by a social meeting. The service on Sunday morning was conducted by the Rev. S. T. Pagesmith, and was preceded by a Dedicatory Service for teachers, conducted by the Rev. Lucking Tavener. On Sunday evening a Conference was held, at which a paper dealing with the relation between Church and school was read by Dr. J. K. Wood, this being followed by an animated discussion.

Shrewsbury.—The sheriff of the county of Montgomeryshire for the present year, Mr. J. Bancroft Willans, of Dolforgan, Kerry, has appointed as his chaplain the Rev. A. E. O'Connor of the Unitarian Church, Shrewsbury.

The Treatment of Wounded Trees.

Wherever the Germans have been driven back in the recent fighting they have laid bare the country as far as possible, and attempted to destroy thousands of trees on the roadside or in woods and orchards. Where they had not time to fell the trunks, they cut off a circle of its bark two or three inches deep, so that the trees would bleed to death. The French soldiers, working under expert advice, have found a way to save the lives of these damaged trees, and the method adopted is very much the same as that required in dealing with wounded men. In the case of trunks suffering from incision, the circle where the bark had been cut away (according to Mr. Henry Wood, the special correspondent of the United Press of America with the French Armies) "was first covered with a special grafting cement, and the entire wound then carefully bandaged up—often with the same bandages that had been prepared for human limbs." In this work thousands of Army surgeons and Red Cross ambulance drivers and stretcher carriers assisted. When the available supply of grafting preparation was exhausted, tar, and finally a loamy clay was used, and moss, twisted and tied about the dressed wound, was found very effective when substitutes for surgical bandages were required.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

The address for our Belgian Hospital Fund, to which cheques and parcels of clothing should be sent, is Mrs. Bernard Allen, 14 Gainsborough Gardens, Hampstead, N.W.3.

OUR recent appeal for more money for the Belgian Hospital Fund has met with a fine response. To-day we have great pleasure in announcing the gift of a motor-car by Miss L. T. Roscoe, which is to be attached to our Maternity Home in Calais. We hope that another reader will be eager to emulate Miss Roscoe's generosity by sending a promise of the motor cycle and sidecar which are so urgently needed for the work which Mrs. Allen describes in another column.

THE splendid advance of our troops and the capture of the Messines Ridge, which is now firmly held, have rightly occupied public attention and put other events into the shade. We needed this heartening reminder that while we embark upon endless discussions and watch the political barometer at home and abroad, great events are taking place in the field and the man of action still sways the future. It is by this sharp method alone and not by talking that we can make possible a partnership of the nations in the arts of liberty and peace. As President Wilson says, "Unless we pour out the blood and treasure now and succeed we may never be able to unite or show conquering force again in the great cause of human liberty. The day has come to conquer or submit. If the forces of autocracy can divide us they will overcome us; if we stand together victory is certain, and the liberty which victory will secure. We can afford, then, to be generous, but we cannot afford then or now to be weak or omit any single guarantee of justice and security."

THESE firm and striking words are taken from Mr. Wilson's Message to the Provisional Government of Russia. It supplies just the tonic of clear vision and plain speaking which the situation demands.

The war [he says] has begun to go against Germany, and in their desperate desire to escape the inevitable, ultimate defeat, those who are in authority in Germany are using every possible instrumentality, are making use even of the influence of groups and parties among their own subjects, to whom they have never been just, or fair, or even tolerant, to promote a propaganda on both sides of the sea which will preserve for them their influence at home and their power abroad, to the undoing of the very men they are using. The position of America in this war is so clearly avowed that no man can be excused for mistaking it. She seeks no material profit or aggrandisement of any kind. She is fighting for no advantage or selfish object of her own, but for the liberation of peoples everywhere from the aggressions of autocratic force. The ruling classes in Germany have begun of late to profess a like liberality and justice of purpose, but only to preserve the power they have set up in Germany and the selfish advantages which they have wrongly gained for themselves and their private projects of power all the way from Berlin to Bagdad and beyond.

IN a later part of his Message Mr. Wilson gives an excellent summary of the kind of settlement to which we should look forward, but he does so with a shrewd warning that we need remedies as well as statements of principle which have a pleasing and sonorous sound.

Practical questions [he says] can be settled only by practical means. Phrases will not accomplish the result. Effective readjustments will, and whatever readjustments are necessary must be made. But they must follow a principle, and that principle is plain. No people must be forced under a sovereignty under which it does not wish to live. No territory must change hands except for the purpose of securing those which inhabit it a fair chance of life and liberty. No indemnities must be insisted on except those that constitute payment for manifest wrongs done. No readjustments of power must be made except such as will tend to secure the future peace of the world and the future welfare and happiness of its peoples. And then the free peoples of the world must draw together in a common covenant, some genuine and practical co-operation that will in effect combine their force, to secure peace and justice in the dealings of nations with one another. The brotherhood of mankind must no longer be a fair but empty phrase; it must be given a structure of force and reality. The nations must realise their common life and effect a workable partnership to secure that life against the aggressions of autocratic and self-pleasing power.

OUR own Government has endorsed President Wilson's words in the reply which has been sent to the recent Russian Note. In doing so it simply reaffirms the policy which we have accepted since the beginning of the war. America's part in the war is unselfish, but so is our own. We never had any ambitions to gratify, and all we seek is justice and security for ourselves and our neighbours. The official Reply concludes with the following significant words:—"The British Government believe that broadly speaking the agreements which they have from time to time made with their Allies are conformable to these standards. But if the Russian Government so desire they are quite ready with their Allies to examine, and, if need be, to revise, these agreements."

A WHIMSICAL situation has arisen through the refusal of the Sailors' and Firemen's Union to allow Mr. Ramsay Macdonald and Mr. F. W. Jowett to sail for Russia. The protest which has taken this most effective form is based upon a feeling of outrage at the apparent callousness with which the claims of the families of seamen, who have been murdered by the crews of German submarines, were treated at the Leeds Conference. We believe that the feeling is one worthy of honour and should be shared by all right-minded people, but that having made their protest the Union would be wise to withdraw any further opposition, especially in view of the statement made by Mr. Bonar Law in Parliament on Monday. The whole incident illustrates very forcibly the moral incapacity which cripples a certain type of peace propaganda at the present time. There are circumstances in which it is more noble, and certainly more human, to be terribly indignant, than to speak mildly or to lapse into equivocal silence, as though nothing unusual had happened.

THE death of Major Redmond has touched the public imagination almost more than any similar loss since the beginning of the war. He belonged to the great race of Irish patriots. He joined the army at the beginning of the war, because his quick mind saw at once that to fight against Germany's aggression was the best service which he could render to his country. "I should like all my friends in Ireland to know," he said in a statement which he left behind him, "that in joining the Irish Brigade and going to France I sincerely believed, as all Irish soldiers do, that I was doing my best for the welfare of Ireland in every way." He chose the post of danger at the head of his men, and when he fell he was carried off the field in an Ulster ambulance. He is buried in Belgian soil which already holds the dust of many Irish scholars and exiles. If noble memories and a brave end can heal the wounds of ancient wrong and help all men who love Ireland to love one another, he will not have died in vain.

THE Food Controller has informed the local food control committees that he considers, in view of the necessity of conserving the supply of food, particularly bread-stuffs, all consumption of food in connection with parish teas, school treats, working parties, &c., should be discontinued. We are aware how hardly this will bear upon the gracious and simple hospitalities which have become part of our Church life, and many teachers will be most reluctant to curtail the pleasures of the children, but it is a case where we must obey without a murmur and regard a request as having the force of a command.

IN the sensible and practical address which the Prime Minister gave on Tuesday to the members of the Commission on Industrial Unrest we are glad to see that he had some pointed remarks to make on the connection between the present high prices for food and profiteering. The Government, he said, have already started a searching investigation into the subject, and they hope in a short time to make proposals which will have the effect of reducing very substantially the cost of some of the necessaries of life. This announcement does not come a moment too soon. There is a growing suspicion, and we have a right to know whether it is based upon facts, that there is a yawning discrepancy in the case of some staple articles of food between wholesale and retail prices, which represents the fat profit of the army of middlemen.

THE DUTY OF ENCOURAGEMENT.

WHAT is the best gift which religious people can make to the commonweal at the present moment? We are not thinking of the unchanging witness of the soul to the things of God. Worship, trust, love, the eager pursuit of the high standards of Christian character, these remain our central interest and our chief duty, whatever may happen in the world around us. Amid the confusions of the time the eternal Gospel abides, and we confess with a new accent of conviction that the things which are seen are temporal, but the things which are not seen are eternal. But in asking this question we want to fix attention upon the special way in which religion may enter into relation with our national life and the moral issues of liberty and right which are involved in the present struggle.

Now it seems to us that there are two ways—the difference may be partly temperamental—in which men of earnest faith answer our question. Some of them never open their lips without speaking words of sad foreboding. They are sensitive, almost to the point of despair, to all the evils of the time. They warn us continually of the danger of moral corruption in which we stand, and with piercing foresight see us already the helpless victims of our own lusts. At the very moment when we are elated with the hope of success and victory beckons from afar, they have only pensive misgivings to offer us, which chill our ardour and confuse our aims. On the other hand there is the strong conviction that when hard duties have to be done men ought to do them with courage and a firm will, without the backward glances which are the sure sign of self-consciousness and sentimental fears; and for those who share this conviction it is no small part of the task of religion to give men the deep and unselfish joy of those who contend for the right, to speak to them continually of the splendour of the cause which they serve, and to make them feel that because God has laid this duty upon them and they cannot refuse it, the good in it is a hundredfold greater than the evil.

It is hardly necessary for us to point out that all our own spiritual instincts and sympathies demand this word of joyous confidence and hope. We have no message of Stoic endurance or of wistful foreboding for our readers, but simply one of glad faith in the living God, whose justice we serve, whose dread commands we endeavour to obey. Whenever human hearts grow tired because the way is long and the end out of sight, and many of our brothers tortured by the sense of the evil in the world are tempted to think more of the moral dangers than of the glory of our service, we ask only for the privilege of saying once again that the best gift of religion to us at the present moment is not the word of advice but the word of strong encouragement. We say this in no spirit of indifference to the evils which lie in wait for us on every side. We ought to discuss them gravely together as they affect our own social life and the welfare of our men in the army. But messages of warning and rebuke spoken from the platform or the pulpit, even when they are free from the taint of morbid exaggeration, will never have a tenth part of the value for the cause of righteousness of the simplest word of faith and enthusiasm, which kindles the power of admiration and noble living in other hearts.

We want to keep our cause unstained by the world and undefeated in our own souls. We can only do it when we serve it with the joy which is the heart's homage to its goodness, and pitch the claims of loyalty so high that all mean passions and selfish impulses will shrink back ashamed. Do we fear that the spirit of cruelty and hate may lay siege to men's souls? Let us remember, if they yield to these temptations, that the shame of it may lie at our doors, because while we have been busy with warnings and rebukes and the fickle moods of the faint-hearted and the double-minded, we have failed to convince them that this cause of liberty which they serve is unsurpassed in its splendour in the history of the world, and asks of them the utmost of which their manhood is capable in loyalty and goodness and unselfish love.

RELIGIOUS FRIENDSHIP.

[FROM A CORRESPONDENT.]

I HAPPENED into Essex Church the other Sunday morning. I found a printed service-order in the pews to guide the stranger through the details of the service. It contained an announcement that the collections on that occasion were for the Provincial Assembly of London and the South-Eastern Counties. The announcement did not raise any special emotions in me. Collections are a customary but not a gracious incident among exercises of devotion. "Provincial Assembly" sounded antiquarian, Dissenting, Presbyterian. The rest of the title sounded like a railway line. But on the back page of the service-order there was another announcement which suggested that the collection was to receive some explanation in the sermon. I read that "Mr. Weatherall would preach on 'Religious Fellowship': (the deficiencies and dangers of the isolated soul-life; the exhilaration of active communal religious life; how it is to be got on this side of dilatory Church Reunions)." This thoughtfully provided first aid to the attention of a listener interested me; the dilatoriness of Church Reunions has weighed upon me; and I found the preacher's development of the theme so interesting, plausible, and hopeful that I have ventured to set forth the following points in the argument and the appeal.

Religious fellowship was the recurring idea; the way to it was opened through some remarks on human friendship: Bacon's essay was cited for the three "principal fruits" which friendship produces: "Peace in the affections; support of the judgment; aid, and bearing a part in, all actions and occasions." Friendship thus fruitful in sympathy, counsel, and alliance is the salt of human life. Man is gregarious, as God himself is gregarious; for once God himself dwelt in loneliness and found it not endurable: therefore he created men, that He might have friends.

Friendship, essential for the common concerns of life, is yet more essential for the uncommon concerns of life—all those interests, duties, aspirations that are summed up in the religious life. The isolated soul-life is a maimed thing that cannot know either itself or its God. Here came a quotation:—

No one could tell me what my soul might be;
I sought for God, and God eluded me:
I sought my brother out, and found all three.

In fellowship came revelations, and ratifications of the inward private faiths and aspirations; the timidities of the fugitive and cloistered virtues vanished when the soul found its fellows and prayed, mourned, and rejoiced along with them. No man, then, can live to himself alone in the smaller or the greater things of life; and especially in religion, which is the raising of the soul to its highest power; it is man's duty to recognise his need of fellowship, and his duty to find it.

Where? Why, of course, in the church, which is the great historic institution for fellowship in the good life; and the natural home for the friendship of the religious.

What, then, ought to be the conditions of entering into the fellowship of the good life? One would suppose it was the humble desire to give and to share experiences, prayers, counsels, in the common search of man after God and in the common service of human life. Love is the basis and security of any friendship. Fragments of Bacon's great essay came again to fortify this argument: "Solitude is where there is no love"; "A crowd is not company, and faces are but a gallery of pictures, and talk but a tinkling cymbal, where there is no love." Love, surely, is the only sufficient and efficient basis of religious fellowship; and love in a man's heart, for God in heaven and man on earth, is the appropriate and the single rational condition for entrance into the fellowship of the religious community.

But, as things are, love is not the condition recognised in the historic organisations of Christian fellowships or churches, and the heart hungry for fellowship finds itself suddenly embarrassed by the intrusion of conditions of quite a different order.

There followed some history and some explanation of the barriers which the churches have set up against this free and loving fellowship in religion. The barriers are real; they are explicitly or implicitly behind all the great historic churches. They consist of certain supernaturalist theories about man's redemption, and certain definite, though mutually destructive, doctrines, practices, and institutions which are claimed to be the essential conditions through which alone that redemption can be obtained. In short, the churches claim to be warders of the kingdom of heaven, and confine their fellowship to those who believe in their guardianship of the keys.

The next turn in the argument was introduced by that splendid old maxim: "In things essential, unity; in things non-essential, liberty; in all things, charity." Hitherto religious controversy had revolved within the circle of such theories of man's redemption as those just outlined, and such efforts as there had been towards Church reunions and wider religious fellowships had all taken for granted that supernaturalism was the quintessential basis of fellowship.

But history had proved that any kind of effective reunion within that circle of ideas was impossible. More important still, the thought and experiences of multitudinous men in modern times have produced the conviction that the belief in a supernaturalist basis for Church fellowship was not an essential at all; that supernaturalist claims to the guardianship of the keys is an encumbrance of history; that the progress of religion in the world, and especially in modern times and for modern ideas, has been hampered and weakened by such claims; that they have hidden God from man, and men from each other; that supernaturalist processes of ultimate redemption are not the needed present aliment of the religious life, but fraternity in the memory of the saints, the teaching of the prophets, the love of ideals, the faith in spiritual brotherhood of all groping souls, in common prayer and common service.

These are the quintessentials among which modern men may hope to find religious fellowship satisfied and satisfying. The only hope for the future is in a Humanist Church, claiming no supernatural power over men's souls, imposing no barriers of creeds, rituals, initiations, books, ordinations, priesthoods, upon free religious fellowship; a Humanist Church, made up of groups of ordinary people of ordinary gifts, humble in their claims of knowledge, speaking the words of personal experience and reflection to each other in the ways of mutual counsel; asserting no rights of coercion or excommunication, refraining from condemnations; rejoicing to say their prayers and sing their praises together, and united in the passion every day to love mercy, to do justly, and to walk humbly with God. The Supernaturalist Church has been founded on the organisation of belief. The Humanist Church is founded on the organisation of devotion.

From these great arguments the preacher came down to the solemn assertion that a visible Church of this kind was already in being; that Essex Church tried to be a church of that type; that the Provincial Assembly was a group of churches of that type. He explained the circumstances that had kept free that group of churches from entanglement with legal conditions perpetuating any specific excluding creeds; and how that freedom had permitted a natural movement theologically from a supernaturalist theology to a humanist religion. It might be that their fathers had builded better than they knew; it remained the case that they had received an inheritance which proved that free religious fellowship was no unproved theory but a working fact. In that group of churches religious friendship, based on human needs and not on supernaturalist reserved redemptions, had been a reality which had brought together many types of men and women and given them a common fellowship in the devotional life. But for many reasons thus far their fellowship had played only a small part in the religious life of England; sometimes, even, they themselves had weakly imagined that there was no future for them; that they had nothing to teach the world now; that they were only a survival of an unfashionable tradition. Let them consider how many lives were fallen away from God because churches in a changing world have still blindly held on to the old unprofitable speculative supernaturalisms; consider how men are naturally religious and would gladly consort to a free, loving, human religious fellowship if they knew where it was to be found and how much it might do to help and teach their nobler natures; and how only by such loving, friendly fellowship in a Humanist Church could ever the old unhappy theological controversies perish and the great Church of God recover its place as "a factory of thought, a prompter of conscience, an elucidator of social conduct, an armoury against despair and dulness, and a temple of the ascent of man."

The claims of the Provincial Assembly as the uniting bond between a group of churches with this basis and these ideals were thus commended to the affections of the fellowship that meets in Essex Church. I noticed on one of its service orders the following paragraph: "The aim of Essex Church.—Essex Church exists simply to increase the number of men and women who love God and their neighbours, and who seek to live the religious life." I have dreamed often of the comprehensive Church. It seemed to me that here was a significant effort towards it.

BOOKS AND REVIEWS.

THE SPIRITUAL ASCENT OF MAN.

The Spiritual Ascent of Man. By W. Tudor Jones, D.Ph. With an Introduction by A. L. Smith, M.A., Master of Balliol College, Oxford. Published for the University of London Press by Hodder & Stoughton. 5*s.* net.

"This book aims at bringing the best philosophical thought of the time within the range of the ordinary reader....Its message is one of hope, or rather of confidence and conviction, and it is expressed in such a spirit as must leave the reader with a very friendly feeling towards the author." Introduced in such warm terms to its readers by the Master of Balliol, the volume can hardly fail in receiving a wide and cordial welcome. Those readers who are prepared for a certain amount of intellectual effort, and who desire to acquaint themselves with an outline of the metaphysical arguments of idealism and religion will not find their welcome misplaced. One of the best signs of the times is a certain disturbance and semi-awakening of the spirit of man. People who have never faced realities before have been compelled to do so by the inescapable and ubiquitous effects of war. Not only in the army, but in the homes from which the army has been recruited, the spirit that was asleep has begun to awaken, and, awakening, to demand of life something more and deeper than the mere satisfaction of material wants. Life itself, health, happiness and comradeship are beginning to be valued above the gratification of immediate desires; and there is a vague consciousness stirring that to secure these things some new orientation of life is imperative. Everything for the future depends upon this newly awakening spirit, and its proper instruction and right direction. Uninstructed and unintelligent restlessness may land us only more deeply in the morass than the lethargy of dreamless sleep. We shall need leaders and guides of every type to help in organising the forces that are being released for the purposes of construction and life, else they may spend themselves in mere disturbance and produce only chaos. Dr. Jones clearly realises this, and he aims at making intelligible some of the underlying principles of forward and upward movement from mechanism to mind, and from mind to spirit. He successfully shows that life even on the physical plane is not reducible to the mere categories of mechanism; exposes the fallacies of epiphenomenalism not so much by controversial argumentation, as by a positive insistence—one might have said demonstration—of the constructive and constitutive work of mind in the universe even in those very schemes of explanation which profess to account for it on a materialistic basis. If the author had done no more than this, his book would be important and valuable. But in the next stage he advances into the "third domain" and vindicates the reality and essentiality of "spirit." As spirit he shows that by the blending of intellect and intuition, man is able to develop and intelligently utilise Knowing by Being. From idealistic philosophy we thus pass into the realm of positive religion, and God becomes for us a certain and real experience in the moral constraint of the Ideal, and the vital effort of the progressive attempt to realise the Ideal.

"The light is divine, and to that fact we must cling; and clinging to it we shall be able to obtain relations with the Ought and with Him who not only includes the Ought but who, as well, is beyond it in the form of an infinity of meaning and blessedness." This, however, involves not a lapse into passive faith, but a summons to faithfulness in effort and service, for "the existence of the Godhead, as being the Creator and sustainer of the Ought, has to be perpetually affirmed by man in order that the Ought may obtain an eternally objective as well as a subjective meaning." The last chapter contains an excellent summary of conclusions reached in a book which will prove highly stimulating to all who recognise that clear and vigorous thinking is the ally and not the enemy of genuine religion.

"WE ARE AS GOOD AS THOSE WHO GO."

To the Editor of The Inquirer.

Sir,—"Organised religion did not at the present time cover the whole of the religious life of the country, which embraced all the deepest, holiest, and purest impulses of men and women who never thought of entering a church at all. It was possible to have a religion unconnected with church or chapel; but this did not mean that non-church-going was to be exalted into a virtue." I quote from the report of meeting of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association in The Inquirer of June 9. But why harp upon this string? Are we not sick at heart of the cant phrase, not only among those who have passed through our Sunday schools but those reared within our church walls: "We are as good as those who go"?

It is possible to be a scholar without having gone to school or University; it is possible to be a musician without the stimulus and fellowship of musical people; but it is highly improbable, and for the mass of men quite impossible. Is it harder to be a scholar or a musician than a devout Christian? Let us recognise the improbability, and for the mass of men the impossibility, of acquiring a devout Christian spirit without the training and discipline of the Church. No doubt the Church is seriously defective; but is it more so than other indispensable institutions? Any church is better than none. Let us put our own house in order, repair our broken theology, renew and beautify our services, and make diligent and grateful use of the means of grace.—Yours, &c.,

Edgar I. Fripp.

LAWRENCE HOUSE.

To the Editor of The Inquirer.

Sir,—The Hostel is now in full working order, and both the Rest Room and the bedrooms are at the disposal of all who may find them convenient. Naturally, at the moment, we may expect sailors and soldiers to find here just what they require; but we do not wish sight to be lost of the fact that other men coming to London from the country may find the accommodation useful, and these, too, are welcome. It may be that a father or brother wishes to come to London to see a sailor or soldier who is wounded or on leave. We wish to meet his needs. We would also remind those who are living in London that the Rest Room, the Writing Room, and the Tea Room are at their disposal; and we hope that Lawrence House will form a place for social intercourse during the day.—Yours, &c.,

R. M. Montgomery.

MEMORIAL NOTICES.

MRS. SYDNEY TITFORD.

By the passing of Mrs. Titford (née Spiller), at the age of 75, Unity Church, Islington, loses its senior member and most enthusiastic worker. Brought up at the old Chapel at Newington Green, on the occasion of her marriage with Sydney Titford she removed to Canonbury, where she resided for the remainder of her life. She was a woman of remarkable personality, and was gifted with many interesting qualities. Early in life, after the loss of her husband, she took to designing birthday and other kinds of cards—a work of which she may be considered as one of the first pioneers. Later she undertook miniature painting and with remarkable success. Many of her miniatures were presented to the Unitarian bazaars and were sold for large sums. Two of the most striking are those of Dr. Martineau and Prof. Eucken. The former was bought by Mr. Charles Hawksley at the Great Bazaar of 1900, and the latter was presented by her to Dr. Tudor Jones. In her latter years she became greatly interested in the history of our churches, and, in 1913, brought out a volume on the History of Unity Church, Islington. This volume was well received by some of the most prominent journals in the country, and brought her into correspondence with many eminent persons. For many years she had been a prominent member of the North London Vigilance Society and of the Peace Society. But her greatest interest was in Unity Church. Within a few weeks of her death she was in her usual place at the Sunday morning service, and was hardly ever absent, illness being always the cause of her absence. She was deeply interested in all the movements of our churches in London, and was a strong supporter of the women's work in them. On many occasions she rendered important services to her own church. In connection with the minister at the time (Dr. Tudor Jones) she collected within a few weeks the sum of £800 for the decoration of the church; and last year, when the steeple showed signs of cracking, she appealed to her friends, and, in the course of a few weeks, succeeded in obtaining ample funds to meet the emergency. But even more than all this was her loveable personality. Every minister at Unity Church found in her at all times a loyal supporter, and they remained her staunch friends to the very end.

The funeral took place on Saturday, June 9. Before laying her mortal remains to rest at Abney Park Cemetery a religious service was held at the church she loved so dearly. The Rev. J. Vint Laughland (the present minister) conducted the first part of the service, and Dr. Tudor Jones (a former minister) delivered an address on her life and work. A large congregation had assembled. Dr. Jones referred to Mrs. Titford's many-sided valuable qualities, and pointed out that if Unitarian Christianity could produce characters like hers there was nothing the matter with our religion; if there was anything the matter with our churches it was so because we do not apply our religion as she applied it. Hers was a noble life which, if multiplied on a large scale, would engender prosperity and spirituality in all churches. She left behind her one daughter—Mrs. Sargent, wife of Mr. F. Leyden Sargent, solicitor.

LADY WILSON.

WE regret to record the death of Lady Wilson, wife of Sir Roland K. Wilson, at their home in Richmond. She was in her 85th year, and had been for some time unable through the infirmities of age to be out-of-doors; but her interest in affairs continued unabated till the end came. After a slight seizure a fortnight ago, from which she rallied, a second attack came on Sunday and she passed away on Tuesday evening. Lady Wilson, who was the daughter of Mr. Richard Phillips, F.R.S., was married in 1873; her husband a few years later became Reader in Indian Law to the University of Cambridge, and many of the older ministers in our body had pleasant visits to their hospitable home. On their removal to London she took an active part with other Unitarian women in Postal Mission and other propagandist work, and was always warmly devoted to her faith. Her eager and vivacious temperament made her a good correspondent with inquirers, and she diffused our literature far and wide. Along with her husband she formerly took a leading part in our Richmond congregation, and while her strength lasted she was busied in the London work generally. The funeral took place on Thursday, at Richmond Cemetery, the Rev. W. G. Tarrant conducting the service.

This will enable us to fetch patients from outlying districts and greatly enlarge the scope of our work. We should like to express our warmest thanks to Miss Roscoe for this magnificent gift.

WEEKLY NOTES.

I WANT to make a very special appeal for a motor cycle (and sidecar, if possible). It is for a Belgian doctor at an important military hospital where there is a large out-patients department. He sees a great many women patients, and in many cases has to go to their own homes to see them. These homes are frequently miles away. There is no sort of conveyance available and the call is quite often at night time. At present he is exhausting himself and wasting much time in these long walks, after a hard day spent in the operation theatre. A motor cycle would use the minimum of petrol, and a sidecar would enable him to take what is necessary—or even take a nurse, for certain difficult cases. He is a big man, so a strong cycle would be necessary. All this work outside the hospital has to be done in addition to his duties as military surgeon, which are often exceedingly heavy. ROSE ALLEN.

SPECIAL WANTS.

Mrs. Allen has a quantity of grey knitting wool to sell for the Fund. Price 4*s.* 6*d.* per lb. (carriage free).

The name and address of sender and list of contents should be enclosed in each parcel.

Contributions of money and clothing should be sent to Mrs. Bernard Allen, 14 Gainsborough Gardens, Hampstead, N.W.3.

THE NATIONAL CONFERENCE.

A MEETING of the Committee was held at Dr. Williams's Library, London, on May 30, when there were present: the Revs. Dr. Hargrove (in the chair), D. Agate, Dr. Carpenter, Rudolf Davis, H. E. Dowson, E. D. P. Evans, F. K. Freeston, H. Gow, F. Hankinson, F. H. Jones, Dr. Mellor, J. A. Pearson, W. J. Phillips, C. Roper, C. J. Street, W. G. Tarrant, Joseph Wood, Messrs. Barclay, R. P. Jones, T. Oliver Lee, F. W. Monks, Ion Pritchard, G. W. Rayner Wood, and the Secretary.

The following resolutions of condolence were passed, all standing: "That the Committee of the National Conference, meeting for the first time after the death of Sir William B. Bowring, Bart., one of the Vice-Presidents, desire to place on record their sense of the loss sustained by the Conference and the churches it represents. The religious principles to which Sir William was deeply attached throughout his long life and which he supported with such constant generosity, were the inspiration of a career of distinguished public service as well as of a personality that attracted the affectionate regard of troops of friends. The Committee beg to assure Lady Bowring and the relatives of their sincere sympathy with them in their sorrow."

"That at this the first meeting of the Committee since the death of Mr. James R. Beard we desire to put on record the high esteem in which he was held, not only in our churches of Lancashire and Cheshire whose interests were so dear to him in earlier years, but afterwards throughout all the churches of the Conference to which he became known as a wise and generous supporter. He was our first President, and the name he bore will long be had in honour as that of a father and two brothers, who in different ways were alike distinguished in services to our Liberal Faith. By his death the last of the three is taken from us, but the influence he so long exercised still survives for our common inspiration and profit. We most deeply sympathise with Mrs. Beard and her family in their bereavement."

The Special Committee on 'The Churches after the War' reported that the Service of Commemoration on the first Sunday in November had been largely observed, over 7,000 copies of the Form of Service having been applied for. But, except in the Liverpool District, where there had been much activity, the other suggestions of the Committee had not met with much response from other District Associations, largely owing to the absence at the war of active men and to the expense of travelling. In the course of conversation it was elicited that in individual congregations and smaller groups much interest had been quickened. The Special Committee is kept in being and will be alert to any opportunities that may offer.

A Report from the Ministerial Settlements Board on the relative numbers of ministers and congregations desiring settlements was received and referred to the Committee on the Supply of Ministers. The same Committee reported on the inadequate supply of competent ministers and made the following recommendation, which was adopted: "That an earnest appeal be made to our churches on the part of the Conference drawing attention to the vital question of the supply of ministers, and that the details of opportune time and other circumstances be referred back to the Committee on the Supply of Ministers, with power to act, and that the co-operation of the Colleges be invited."

The final Report of the Committee for the Special Appeal for £50,000 for the Sustentation Fund was presented. It was resolved: "That this Committee of the National Conference in receiving the final Report of the Committee for the Special Appeal desire to express to that Committee, and especially to its Chairman, Vice-Chairman, Hon. Treasurer, and Hon. Secretary, their high appreciation of the services rendered by them to all our churches by their indefatigible industry, their tact, and insistence in soliciting donations. The extraordinary economy with which they conducted their work, so that the expenses amounted to little more than ¼ of 1 per cent, probably forms a record of so large a sum being raised from so many subscribers at so very small a cost."

The question of the next Triennial Meetings was considered. The general feeling appeared to be that it would be impossible to hold meetings on the usual scale next year, but that some kind of meeting should be held during 1918. A definite decision was postponed until the autumn.

It was resolved: "That a Public Worship Committee be appointed to collect information respecting the music and the orders of service in use in our churches and missions with a view: (1) To the improvement of the music and musical arrangement of church, mission, and other services; (2) To prepare such special and occasional forms of service as may be required by the public or other circumstances of the time; (3) To advise, when requested, ministers and congregations on these and kindred matters relating to public worship." The Revs. Joseph Wood, J. C. Ballantyne, F. K. Freeston, E. D. P. Evans, Mr. R. P. Jones, with the President and Secretary, ex-officio, were appointed.

It was also resolved: "That a Standing Advisory Committee on War Memorials be appointed, with power to co-opt additional outside members who may be specially qualified; that the Committee provide, when requested to do so, information or suggestions for members or committees of our churches who contemplate the erection of war memorials in their churches; that the Committee also provide such further advice and assistance as may be desired in the preparation and execution of schemes for such memorials." The Revs. Dr. Jacks, F. K. Freeston, Kenneth Bond, Messrs. Hope Pinker, R. P. Jones, Stevenson, J. C. Warren (representing the Unitarian Historical Society), with the President and Secretary, ex-officio, were appointed.

It was agreed to recommend all our churches to set apart August 5 (the opening of the fourth year of the war) for a Special Service of Commemoration and Reconsecration.

The next meeting of the Committee is to be held in Manchester in October.

SOUTHERN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

The Annual Meeting of the Southern Unitarian Association was held at Bournemouth on Wednesday, June 6, the President, Mrs. Cogan Conway of Ringwood, in the chair.

The report, presented by the Secretary (the Rev. V. D. Davis) said: "The record is overshadowed, as it was last year, by the tragedy of the Great War. Endurance, patient and steadfast effort and self-sacrifice are still the watchwords for our national life and for service in the churches, looking forward and hoping for happier days to come." The financial position of the Association showed little change. The chief ministerial changes were the settlement of the Rev. G. B. Stallworthy at Poole, and the Rev. W. B. Matthews at Ringwood. Wareham had benefited by the devoted service of Mr. and Mrs. W. E. Stevens of Poole, especially in keeping the young people together. At present Mr. Stevens and Mr. Stallworthy are sharing the responsibility for the Sunday evening services there. Reference was made to the loss sustained in the death of Mr. Charles Isaacs, J.P., of Bournemouth, for fifteen years a valued member of the Executive, and for ten years a Vice-President.

The report and Treasurer's statement, together with the report of the Sunday School Union, presented by the Rev. J. Ruddle, were adopted, and the officers and representatives of the Association were re-elected for the coming year.

A resolution of tribute to the memory of Mr. Charles Isaacs, "constant in friendship and in his warm interest in the fellowship of the churches," and of sympathy with the members of his family, was passed in reverent silence; also a resolution of cordial welcome to Dr. Carpenter, President of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association. Dr. Carpenter, in response, gave an address on the work of the Association. A resolution of thanks was passed to the lay preachers of the district, and especially to Mr. S. C. Ryley for his services at Emerson Hall.

After tea in the Church Hall, a public meeting was held in the Church and was largely attended. The Rev. V. D. Davis presided. Dr. Carpenter gave an address on 'The Appeal of Religious Faith in War-Time.' It dealt in a masterly way with the questions raised by the appalling horrors of the war, the strain placed upon the faith of many by the terrible sacrifices, the destruction, the overwhelming sorrows involved in it, and further with the difficulty of maintaining the high level of moral and religious idealism with which the nation entered upon the war. In that time of crisis it was well to remember that freedom, law, order, justice, faith, hope, charity, goodwill, and love, were not destroyed, but yet remained for them to cling to, all the greater things of life involved in their abiding faith in the Fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man. The horrors of the war had compelled men to see and feel; but evils as appalling, but largely unregarded, had been in their midst before the war: the ravages of disease, the fearful loss of infant life due to insanitary conditions, to ignorance, to intemperance and vice; this destruction and crippling of life, which was largely preventible, if the nation would make the required sacrifice and learn obedience to God's law of life, presented exactly the same moral problem as the war, and they must face the demands of moral responsibility. The true meaning of the Fatherhood of God was to be found in the community of their nature with his, in acceptance of the conditions of life as he had ordered it, in willing obedience and faith in goodness. A gigantic task of reconstruction awaited them after the war. The divine law of justice must be vindicated against the claim of Germany that the State was above morals. They must not say that Christianity had failed. There was a new stirring of hope in the nations, based on the principles of a true democracy, that must lead to a better social order, a lifting up of the level of life, and a new brotherhood among the nations. They still had much to learn, but the ideal was set before them. Resentment and hatred must be overcome. They must work through justice and goodwill to achieve security and peace for the world.

The meeting closed with a vote of thanks to Dr. Carpenter for his address, moved by Mrs. Conway and seconded by the Rev. H. S. Solly.

An admirable pastel portrait of Dr. C. W. Eliot, President Emeritus of Harvard University, has been placed in the American Room, which has been furnished out of the contributions of American Unitarians to Lawrence House. On the night of the Conversazione in Whitweek the picture was on view at the Hostel in the Rest Room, which was decorated with American flags. The portrait is the work of Miss Tayler and was presented by her to Lawrence House as a slight recognition of the generosity of American Unitarians to the Hostel, prompted by their sympathy with the cause of the Allies. In January a first gift of £200 from Americans was sent by the Rev. Dr. S. A. Eliot, President of the American Unitarian Association. A banker's draft for a further sum of £141 7*s*. went down in the Laconia, but a fresh one has now arrived, and the gift enables many improvements to be carried out at the Hostel.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Birmingham: the late Captain John Chamberlain.—A memorial service for Captain John Chamberlain, South Wales Borderers, son of the late Arthur Chamberlain, who was killed in action on May 14, was held at the Church of the Messiah on June 8. There was a large attendance, including the brother and sisters and other relatives of Captain Chamberlain, Mrs. Carnegie, Mr. Austen Chamberlain, members of the city magistracy and other prominent citizens, as well as members of the church and representatives of firms with which the late officer was connected. The service was conducted by the Rev. J. H. Weatherall.

Bolton.—The School Sermons on May 13 were a great success from every point of view. The attendances were easily the largest on record, in the evening a number of people being unable to obtain admittance. Mr. Weatherall preached at all three services, and for one day renewed the old friendly relation so long maintained. The very representative character of the congregations was a tribute to his popularity as a preacher both within and without our own churches. The collection amounted to £105. In the course of some hints to the congregation on christening in the June Calendar, the Minister says: "Christening is essentially a social act, and should be performed in the presence and with the co-operation of the congregation. This may not, for various reasons, always be possible; but when it is possible it is extremely desirable, and the Minister earnestly invites parents and congregation alike to co-operate with him in endeavouring to give full expression and force to the meaning and value of the service. He suggests that whenever it is possible parents should arrange with him to have their children christened at the close of morning service, thus giving the congregation the opportunity of participating by their presence and sympathy in a rite which definitely concerns them all."

Bradford.—An impressive service in memory of Bradford men who have fallen in the war was held on June 10 at the Chapel Lane Chapel, the service being conducted by the Rev. Thomas Paxton. A detachment of the Royal Flying Corps and the Army Service Corps was present. Special solos were sung, and the service concluded with the National Anthem.

Chowbent.—At the School Sermons on Sunday last, the preachers being the Revs. H. Fisher Short and J. Morley Mills, the Rev. J. J. Wright, resident minister, with special prayer, read the Roll of their 112 Boys away in the Forces, including some now wounded, 1 blinded, and 11 killed in action. During the reading of the names of the dead the whole congregation stood. The day's collections for the Sunday school were an increase on last year, being £57 9*s.* 3*d.*

Dewsbury.—On June 9 the Rev. J. W. Maw, M.A., was inducted to the pastorate of Unity Church. The charge to the minister was given by the Rev. C. J. Street (Sheffield). Principal Mellone gave the charge to the congregation, and the devotional part of the service was conducted by the Rev. H. McLachlan. After the service a Welcome Meeting was held. In the absence of Mr. E. Thornton, chairman of the congregation, Mr. W. Sanderson, Sunday school superintendent, presided, and extended a coridal welcome to Mr. Maw. Mr. E. D. Gaunt, the secretary, spoke on behalf of the congregation. Addresses were also given by Dr. Mellone, the Revs. H. McLachlan, and W. R. Shanks, Mr. Fred Clayton, and the Revs. A. Cobden Smith, R. Newell, and M. Evans. Mr. Maw responded in suitable terms.

Leytonstone.—A conference of churches arranged under the auspices of the London District Unitarian Society at the invitation of the Leytonstone friends took place on Saturday, June 9. About sixty people attended the service, which was conducted by the Rev. J. Arthur Pearson, but at the Conference (which followed tea in the garden) the gathering had increased to a hundred, representing more than a dozen different congregations in and around the metropolis, and including Dr. Herbert Smith (president of the London District Unitarian Society) and other friends. Several solos were rendered by Mr. Glyn Thomas. Mr. H. G. Chancellor, M.P., presided at the evening meeting, when the subject under discussion was 'The Religious Needs of the People.' Three addresses were given: 'From a Minister's Point of View,' by the Rev. Bertram Lister; 'From a Woman's Point of View,' Miss Maud B. Burtt; and 'From a Layman's Point of View,' by Mr. S. P. Penwarden. A very brisk discussion followed which was opened by Mr. E. R. Fyson (president of the London and South Eastern Provincial Assembly). There was a consensus of opinion upon the need of emphasis being laid upon right living rather than a supposed correctness of belief, and it was agreed that freedom on matters of theological theory should be conceded, whilst a practical expression of religion in all departments of life should be insisted upon. Dr. Herbert Smith, Messrs. A. J. Howard Hulme, John Kinsman, G. H. Clennell, W. J. Noel, and others took part. Letters on the subject under discussion were read by Mr. J. W. Peterken (Leytonstone) from Miss Francis (secretary of the National Lay Preachers Union), and the Rev. D. Delta Evans (Woolwich), and expressions of regret at inability to attend were received from the Rev. Dr. Copeland Bowie, the Rev. Gordon Cooper, Dr. Blake Odgers, and others. The holding of this Conference was suggested by the success of the one held recently at Ilford, and both events have proved the usefulness of these gatherings for the purpose of promoting interchange of ideas and social intercourse.

Pudsey.—On Sunday, June 10, the Sunday school Anniversary Services were held at the Unitarian Church. Mr. T. Manning, of York, was the special preacher, morning and evening. In the afternoon the scholars, congregation, and friends assembled for an outdoor service, the full choir being led by Mr. J. A. Webster, assisted by a mixed band. The minister, the Rev. R. Newell, and Mr. Manning gave short addresses. The congregation numbered over 500 people.

THE FUTURE OF GERMANY'S COLONIES.

A London Conference.

It has been decided to arrange a conference in London early in July upon the future of the former German colonies conquered by the Allies, in so far as the wishes and interests of the inhabitants of the territories are affected. The Anti-Slavery and Aborigines Protection Society, the Committee of which is responsible for organising the Conference, will shortly issue full particulars as to place and speakers. Any one interested in the subject can obtain a card of invitation by forwarding a stamped addressed envelope to the Offices of the Society, Denison House, Vauxhall Bridge Road, S.W.1.

Next week two meetings will take place in furtherance of Liberal Christianity, both to be held at Sion College on the Embankment, E.C. The Liberal Christian League meet on Tuesday, June 19th, and among the speakers are Miss Evelyn Underhill and Dr. Fort Newton, while on Thursday, the Modern Churchmen hold a public gathering under the presidency of Prof. Gardner at 5.30. The Master of Balliol is announced to speak.

DEATHS.

Brindley.—Killed in Belgium, by shell, on June 3. Gunner R. Brindley, R.F.A., only son of Richard Prince Brindley, 33 Maldon Road, Wallington, Surrey.

Taylor.—On June 11, at Elstree, Jane, beloved wife of T. B. Taylor of The Grange, Highgate, London, N., in her 54th year. Laid to rest at St. Pancras Cemetery, Finchley, London.

Wilson.—On Tuesday, June 12, at 86 Church Road, Richmond, Surrey, Christiana Whiting, wife of Sir Roland Knyvet Wilson, Baronet, youngest daughter of Richard Phillips, F.R.S., in her 85th year.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

The address for our Belgian Hospital Fund, to which cheques and parcels of clothing should be sent, is Mrs. Bernard Allen, 14 Gainsborough Gardens, Hampstead, N.W.3.

SINCE we wrote last week another notable address by President Wilson has been published. It is a scathing indictment of Germany's conspiracy against the freedom of the world. In the bluntest possible fashion Mr. Wilson warns his people against trafficking with proposals for peace at the present moment. He tells them to look at the map. From Hamburg to the Persian Gulf the net is spread. Is it not easy, he asks, to understand the eagerness for peace that has been manifested by Berlin ever since the snare was set and sprung? The German Government wishes to close its bargain before it is too late, and it has little left to offer for the pound of flesh it will demand.

IT is their power at home, Mr. Wilson continues, of which the military masters of Germany are thinking now more than of their power abroad. "It is that power which is trembling under their very feet. Deep fear has entered their hearts. They have but one chance to perpetuate their military power, or even their controlling political influence. If they can secure peace now, with the immense advantage still in their hands, they will have justified themselves before the German people. They will have gained by force what they promised to gain by it—an immense expansion of German power and an immense enlargement of German industrial and commercial opportunities. Their prestige will be secure, and with their prestige their political power. If they fail, their people will thrust them aside. A Government accountable to the people themselves will be set up in Germany, as has been the case in England, the United States, and France—in all great countries of modern times except Germany. If they succeed, they are safe, and Germany and the world are undone. If they fail, Germany is saved, and the world will be at peace. If they succeed, America will fall within the menace, and we, and all the rest of the world, must remain armed, as they will remain, and must make ready for the next step in their aggression. If they fail, the world may unite for peace and Germany may be of the union."

WE hope that Mr. Wilson's warnings will be laid to heart by a certain school of idealists among ourselves, who are inclined to take all lofty professions at their face value. There are circumstances when suspiciousness is the proper armour of virtue. At present it is the game of the German Government, as Mr. Wilson points out, to employ Liberals for their enterprises, and to make them their dupes by appealing to sentiments of freedom and justice. "Let them once succeed, and these men, now their tools, will be ground to powder beneath the weight of the great military empire; the Revolutionists of Russia will be cut off from all succour and the co-operation of Western Europe, and a counter-revolution will be fostered and supported; Germany herself will lose her chance of freedom, and all Europe will arm for the next final struggle."

THE exposure of the peace propaganda which has emanated from German sources in Switzerland and the expulsion of the Socialist Grimm from Russia furnish the best commentary upon this new type of intrigue. There is also only too good reason to regard the peace terms of the German Socialists which have been published at Stockholm as similarly tainted at their source. After a careful reading of the document we cannot find in it a trace of that change of heart in the German people for which we are all looking so anxiously. It is based upon the assumption that all other great nations are oppressors, but Germany can do no wrong. These are not the accents of independent Socialists but of the tame spokesmen of the German Government. In an atmosphere poisoned by insincerity it is the first duty of the genuine lovers of justice and peace to be always on their guard.

THE natural feelings of anger and horror produced by the last air-raid over London have given rise to a demand for reprisals, which has swept a good many sensible people off their feet. We deeply regret it, for reasons which we have explained several times. The public meeting last Sunday, at which the Lord Mayor presided, passed a resolution which denounced the murder of innocent women and children and at the same time called on the Government to adopt a policy of systematic and ruthless reprisals. The speeches in support of it were made under the influence of strong excitement and were certainly more violent than wise. We share to the full the mood of horror and indignation, and we hope that the day will soon come when the men who are responsible for these crimes will be punished as they deserve. Certainly they have no claim upon our mercy. But to carry child murder into the households of Germany will satisfy no instinct of justice. There is no good reason to suppose that it will act as a deterrent, and it will certainly demoralise our own people just in proportion as it gratifies the instincts of revenge.

IN a remarkable letter which he has addressed to the Belgian clergy Cardinal Mercier draws a distinction between an act of revenge and one of righteous vengeance. Quoting the words of St. Thomas Aquinas he says, "The will to avenge evil, having respect to order and justice, this is a virtuous action. Thus to wish for the redress of a moral evil, within the limits of right, is to rebuke evil, and is a zealous and good action. But to have an unruly desire for vengeance, whether within the limits of a law or not, which has for its first object the punishment of the guilty rather than the repression of evil, this is an evil action; in this latter case, in fact, the suffering of your neighbour becomes the aim of your vengeance."

APPLYING these principles to the special case of the violation and the long martyrdom of Belgium, Cardinal Mercier argues that to wish that the authors of disorder shall be punished and reduced to impotence, and to wish it with the full force of our will and with all the passionate ardour of which human nature is capable, this is a righteous action. "But," he continues, "this is hatred, you may say, and charity excludes hatred. But what is hatred? Is it not to wish evil for evil, to desire suffering for your neighbour merely that he may suffer, and to let this suffering be the goal at which your desire dwells with pleasure? A disposition such as this would indeed be guilty. On the other hand, to wish a physical evil to someone who has done wrong and remains obdurate, not as an aim in itself but as a means to a further moral aim, to wish that the guilty suffer, so that under the strain of suffering conversion may come to him though he would not go to her; this is not hatred, it is, on the contrary, reasonable love."

INCOMPARABLY the most significant event of the week at home has been the magnificent majority—385 to 55—with which woman suffrage was passed by the House of Commons on Tuesday. Many old prejudices have died away; even militancy has become a dim memory; and a new era has dawned full of the promise of change and rich in possibilities of good. It is for the men and women of the country to use its opportunities in a spirit of noble comradeship.

OUR SYMPATHY WITH RUSSIA.

WE are all anxious to express our sympathy with Russia in this crisis of her fate, and to give to our deep concern for her future the exhilaration of wise and unselfish friendship. For most of us this is a very difficult thing to do on account of our ignorance of the forces which are struggling for mastery. Even men who are deeply read in the history of revolutions feel themselves baffled by the changing panorama from day to day. They are familiar with the way in which anarchy dogs the steps of freedom, and they do not expect political wisdom to be the first fruit of the faith which destroys tyrants. In these circumstances we have to learn to combine ardent sympathy with temperate hopes.

All genuine friendship with Russia will avoid the twin vices of flattery and sentimentalism. Both of them are unfortunately rife in some quarters at the present time, and they have a habit of concealing their moral bankruptcy behind a glittering array of words. Some people talk as though Russia at one bound had placed herself at the head of the free nations of the world, and all the rest should go to her in order to learn the meaning of liberty. They seize upon her vague revolutionary mottoes like "No annexations and no indemnities" and proclaim that she is restoring Christianity and common sense to our bewildered minds. They even bid us treat Russian ideals and Russian aims as though they were more sacred than our own.

All this is flattery and sentimentalism, and it is full of poison. It corresponds to none of the facts of the situation, and the strong men in Russia, who are grappling with the difficulty of organising some reasonable system of government, are probably among the first to recognise how false and injurious it is. It is not in this way that the problems of social order or the duties of war and peace can be solved. If our friendship with Russia is to be sincere it must have in it the saving salt of candour. It must be as candid and as firm as the recent speeches of M. Ribot. There must be nothing obsequious in it which lowers our dignity and injures our self-respect. What Russia needs is not the tribute of almost fulsome admiration, but the practical help and the steadying influence which Allies, who long ago broke the fetters of autocracy, can give her. We rejoice without measure that she is entering into the fellowship of free and self-governing peoples, but the services which France and ourselves can render her are at the moment a greater gift than any which she has it in her power to offer us. That is the privilege of our position, and we say it in no spirit of boasting but with the strong desire to deepen the sense of a national privilege which has been entrusted to us for the good of mankind. It is impossible to establish international goodwill on a basis of self-depreciation. We can only serve when we are strong and humbly confident in the mission which God has placed in our keeping. A patriot of a narrow build who never talks about ideals at all, with his plain sense of duty and his loyalty to homely virtues, is a better servant of freedom and the future than the sentimentalist who gushes over the dawn of liberty in Russia, and forgets that she is groping after something which we possess already in tenfold richness and power.

We write in this way because we are anxious that our friendship with Russia should grow in strength and mutual confidence, and it can only do so if we offer her convictions rooted in our own experience as well as pleasant sympathy. The situation which has arisen through the excitements of revolution and the narcotic influence of high-sounding phrases is one which needs the keen wind of moral common sense. What has happened is a change in Russia and not a change in ourselves. Russia has not suddenly shot ahead of us in faith and idealism; she is struggling hard, after centuries of autocratic rule, to place herself on our level. Here and there the agreements which exist among the Allies may require some modification; but our fundamental aims remain just what they were. How much of them can be realised must depend upon the issue of the war, for Germany shows no sign that she will ever accept them except by force of arms. We cannot in justice to the high responsibilities which have been committed to us accept as our own vague statements about the principles of peace, just because they are attractive and beautiful, without very strict examination into their application to the tangled world of European politics. In the long run Russia will respect us most, and feel her partnership with us to be a privilege both in war and peace, if we show independence of mind and steadfastness of purpose, and help her to bring the cloudy phrases of her revolutionists to the sharp test of our own practical experience in the use of liberty and the art of government. Let no one say that this is to abandon the high motive of religion for the dull levels of expediency. The task of finishing the war, of creating stable international friendships, and rebuilding the arts of peace will require all the faith of which we are capable, but it must be guided at every point by hard thinking and a quick sense of the difference between words and things. Here the sentimentalist, with his gift of florid speech and his incapacity for firm and courageous action, can be of no use to us. He only cumbers the ground.

THE RELIGION OF MR. H. G. WELLS.

THE publication of 'God, the Invisible King,' by Mr. H. G. Wells,* is surely a remarkable event. As a popular writer he has long occupied a foremost place; his vigour and clearness of style cannot be missed even in the most ephemeral of his sketches and articles; he combines a love of fun with the keenest interest in facts, whether in science or society; and to the fascination of romance he adds that of mental adventure. If he may to-day be said to have become a preacher, his congregation is not only one of the largest in the world but also one that includes a host of pioneering minds, especially among younger men and women.

If any one had predicted that the Mr. Wells of 'Kipps' and 'The Wonderful Visit' would develop into a metaphysician and a theologian he must have been either a bold or a very shrewd observer. It is all plain to see, now, that a man so vividly alert as he is to the forces that move and mould us must come face to face at last with those intangibles which affect our inner life and which form the subject matter of philosophy. There have not been wanting, indeed, suggestive buddings in this direction amid the luxuriant imaginativeness of his novels; but, if one reader may honestly avow his impressions, these passages were too frequently accompanied by a context that left an unpleasant taste in the mouth, and the combination rather suggested the undisciplined outplay of extraordinary vital energy than the considered movements of sober thought. But, again, while Mr. Wells has also been known for many years as immensely in earnest in socialist propaganda, he has always been far too clear-sighted to suppose that material prosperity could be secured by mankind, or if secured could satisfy, without attention to temper, conduct, and character. Thus those of us who accept the principle that to know a thing we must know its history, would have plenty of stuff to work upon if we undertook the task of discovering how this singular writer found his way into "religion."

Upon that task, however, we need not enter; for Mr. Wells himself has completed the hints of indirect autobiography by explicit statements on the point. Nine years ago, in 'First and Last Things,' he told us how he and others, finding themselves (we quote his words) "extremely uncertain in our outlook upon life, about our religious feelings, and in our ideas of right and wrong," arranged a series of meetings for "some sort of frank mutual confession." With characteristic humour he hints that some of them cut an astonishing figure in their attempts to set forth the faith that was in them. For his own part, he found (as might be expected) that the business in hand was not so speedily to be dispatched as he had hoped; and so 'First and Last Things' came to be written, presenting in some two hundred and fifty pages "his metaphysics, his religion, his moral standards, his uncertainties and the expedients with which he has met them." The concluding words of this description are highly suggestive; for, though even at that date Mr. Wells was evidently much more inclined to serious constructive effort than people appear to have generally recognised, he was just as evidently not fully prepared as yet for the greatest of all ventures. One observes a kind of shamefacedness, natural enough, as the man testifies to being a "Believer" of a sort. At that stage he was not merely extremely sensitive to the opinion of his associates, but obviously self-conscious in a somewhat disabling measure.

To-day the world is not as it was in 1908. The great war has struck its ploughshare deep. One of the results is an outspoken courage in many a mind; and it would almost seem that the more rigorously censored we are in regard to matters mundane the more free we feel to discuss God and His doings. His Realm, at any rate, knows no Defence Act; men are bold to criticise who formerly acquiesced in or even avowedly upheld the traditional creed. It is a noteworthy fact that the experiences that have shaken the belief of many, apparently, have brought Mr. Wells to a positive affirmation, no longer hesitant and half-afraid. It is true that he is self-conscious still; but the chief effect of this is now, not to make him shrink from the ridicule of the unbelievers who may wonder that such a Saul should be among the prophets, but to make him anxious not to be claimed as a convert by any Church or sect. By and by, perhaps, Mr. Wells will care so entirely for his vision of the true and good as not to mind these small considerations. On the whole, we should say that his peculiar type of theology, as set forth in his recent books—'Mr. Britling sees it Through,' 'War and the Future,' and pre-eminently in 'God, the Invisible King,' is such that no one who is zealous for tradition and dogma is likely—if he reads the books—to triumph over the "conversion" of Mr. Wells. It will need a larger sympathy, we think, to appreciate duly his contribution to the religious life of our time.

We take for granted that no thoughtful reader of THE INQUIRER will fail to peruse this latest book for himself. It is not a long book; for though Mr. Wells deals with subjects upon which many volumes might be written he takes the short cut, asserting in few words what could hardly be "proved" with a multitude. He does not give all his small space, either, to affirmation; but in clearing the ground of the old creeds he lays about him with abundant vigour, not to say violence. If any pious soul is offended, on his own head be it, for the author warns off in advance all who cleave to the orthodox system. He writes partly as expressing the thoughts, hitherto mostly inarticulate, of "modern" people as he conceives them, partly in appeal to those who, having cast away religion with the old theology, need religion still. What he offers is a statement of living faith in God, the Friend of Man, not a scheme of doctrine that seeks to combine all cosmical facts in one Divine Order. To Mr. Wells such a combination is impossible. Appalled by the resistless, pitiless, unheeding method that evolves unnumbered orbs, shocked by the vast suffering involved in the inescapable struggle of living things upon this planet, he sets afar from his heart the Veiled Being that holds on its imperturbable way at the back of all things, and to that Life in Nature that thrusts forth (as it seems) so blindly all around us, he has no homage to give. But there is a God with Man and in Man, there is That which forever strives toward the realisation of things truly good and beautifully just, That which kindles in us all our nobler aspiration, sustains our upward effort, accepts and uses our service, cares for us all, aims to bring all men into His kingdom on this earth, and, finally, to conquer death.

For the God here spoken of is no abstract thing, nor a name of multitude set up as an individual. He is described by Mr. Wells (characteristically again) as in the first place Courage. But next, he says, God is a "Person":—

> "God is a person who can be known as a friend, who can be served and who receives service, who partakes of our nature; who is like us, a being in conflict with the unknown and the limitless and the forces of death; who values much that we value and is against much that we are pitted against. He is our king, to whom we must be loyal; he is our captain, and to know him is to have a direction in our lives. He feels us and knows us; he is helped and gladdened by us. He hopes and attempts. ....God is no abstraction nor trick of words, no Infinite. He is as real as a bayonet thrust or an embrace" (p. 67).

Moreover, this Being is Youth; ay, and God is Love—if we can but wisely use the word. In concluding a striking passage, in which Mr. Wells cites instances of the highest kinds of affection, he says:—

> "These are the forms of love that perhaps come nearest to what we mean when we speak of the love of God. That is man's love of God; but there is something else; there is the love God bears for man in the individual believer. Now this is not an indulgent, instinctive, and sacrificing love like the love of a woman for her baby. It is the love of the captain for his men; God must love his followers as a great captain loves his men, who are so foolish, so helpless in themselves, so confiding, and yet whose faith alone makes him possible. It is an austere love. The spirit of God will not hesitate to send us to torment and bodily death.
> "And God waits for us, for all of us who have the quality to reach him. He has need of us as we of him. He desires us and desires to make himself known to us. When at last the individual breaks through the limiting darknesses to him, the irradiation of that moment, the smile and soul clasp, is in God as well as in man. He has won us from his enemy. We come staggering through into the golden light of his kingdom, to fight for his kingdom henceforth, until at last we are altogether taken up into his being" (pp. 80-81).

* Cassell, 6s. net.

It is thus that Mr. Wells has found salvation, and that man's Christianity must be a queer thing that leaves him untouched by such words, supplemented as they are by expressions of the sense of sin and of yearning toward higher things. If Mr. Wells has himself been unable altogether to avoid the use of unworthy flouts and scorns in dealing with theological conceptions that may possibly be no longer tenable, but which have in past times engaged the deepest thought of the greatest thinkers, it would be pitiful indeed to dismiss him and his modern gospel with a few cheap and easy criticisms. If his assertion be true that many thoughtful and trained minds in our day have come or approximated to the position he holds, and that faith in a finite and developing God is their best resource, there is here a twofold challenge to all positive theology of another type, and especially to that which, as some of us think, does not lie open to much of the criticism, itself rather thin, which he brings against the orthodox creeds.

In the first place, if we cannot but suspect all systems of thought which divide man (still more which divide God) from the universe, and if we doubt the policy of restricting human interest to affairs purely terrestrial and temporal, the immense task is incurred of rationalising all the multiplex and often conflicting elements in the world of experience and thought, of accounting to ourselves for the presence of things and happenings that are to us evil and even monstrous, and of firmly grounding our trust in a Goodness, supreme and final, in which we have long professed to believe. In the second place, the fervour, white-hot, of this latest "convert" to religion, albeit of a singular type, is a startling rebuke to the lukewarm and intermittent service given to mankind by most of us. In the passion of his new-awakened "love of God," Mr. Wells is evidently burning with "love of Man," wide as the whole earth. Endowed with a vivid sense of the ridiculous, he has braved the ridicule of both sides—the believers of the old school and the unbelievers of every school. May not all they who are candidly alive to their own philosophical difficulties, as well as to those of Mr. Wells, adopt a line more becoming to the modesty of wise men than that of supercilious contempt? The least they can do is to thank him for his courageous demonstration that man is truly a spiritual being; a better thing would be to infuse into their message, if it be (as they think) a more adequate gospel than his, something more of the self-devotion, quickening enthusiasm, and dominant joy which have attended his discovery.

LAWRENCE HOUSE.

To the Editor of THE INQUIRER.

SIR,—Last week I wrote that Lawrence House was ready for the sailors and soldiers. Before my letter was in print it was clear that the sailors and soldiers were ready for Lawrence House. Our bedrooms are now well occupied. They are just the men any nation does well to be proud of. Some have come from South Wales, some from West Country, some from North, a few Canadians, and the son of our minister in Adelaide. Some not belonging to our religious community came with the introduction of friends. All are delighted with the homely feeling of the Hostel. All are charmed with the Rest Room, and we shall be grateful if any of your readers will provide us with the means of getting daily and weekly papers, a few special books and more sets of chess and draughts and dominoes. When forwarding parcels will donors kindly send separately a postcard notifying the gift. A number of men from hospital or training ground have visited Lawrence House during the day and seem to find the writing room as well as the rest room a great pleasure. The piano has been much used, and the gentleman who so generously presented us with a number of gramophone records has already provided additional enjoyment. At the moment everything points to the conclusion that the need for Lawrence House was great. I have dared to write at some length because I feel sure that many of your readers will rejoice to know that their generous response to the appeal for funds has already met so warm a welcome at the hands of our men. A "Lawrence House Bulletin" will be sent to 6,000 of our sailors and soldiers in the course of a few days. The addressing of the envelopes for these has been undertaken by the ladies of our congregations at Hampstead, Wandsworth, and Ilford.—Yours, &c.,

INDUSTRIAL HARMONY.

To the Editor of THE INQUIRER.

SIR,—In his message published in your issue of the 9th inst., the Master of Balliol raises the question "whether business itself can be humanised and Christianised, whether industrial and commercial activities themselves can be conducted on human and Christian principles." That all depends upon what is meant by human and Christian principles. If it means the distinctively Christian principle of self-sacrifice and generosity the answer is clearly in the negative. But if it means the principle of justice and mutual benefit, which are equally though not distinctively Christian, the answer is as certainly in the affirmative. Mutual benefit is the happy mean between egoism and altruism. We hear so much about greed on the one hand and benevolence on the other, about being Christians on Sundays and something shockingly different during the week, that we have almost forgotten that there is a happy mean, and that one can, and indeed must, in honest business be friendly and serviceable without being either a saint or a sinner. Strange to say, political economists and other theorists about commerce have not asserted the mutual benefit theory, certainly not asserted it with any force, before the recent publication of 'Second Thoughts of an Economist,' by the late Prof. Smart, referred to by the Master of Balliol. Prof. Smart's argument is that mutual benefit or mutual service is the real, even though unconscious basis of commerce both ancient and modern. True, each party to a transaction must consider his own interest, for he must know it best, but he should not overlook the other interests, he should consciously do business in the mutual benefit spirit and with a mutual benefit aim. Industrial harmony will never be brought about by Act of Parliament, but if commerce can be thought about and taught about and consciously worked out upon lines of mutual benefit all round, the success of such working might be so great that the holders of the false theory of self-interest alone would be compelled to adopt the new outlook and methods. Many very successful welfare schemes, embodying this principle to a certain extent, have been worked out by our best business men, and apparently Mr. Ford in America has run his most astonishingly successful motor manufactory on this conscious mutual benefit system, the capitalists, managers, workers, and customers having all reaped immense advantages from it. So striking a success in a very open field should at least set us thinking. The Churches may well ask for this mutual benefit attitude, but it is quite useless to ask for more than this in business.

—Yours, &c. G. M. HERBERT.

MEMORIAL NOTICES.

SECOND LIEUT. CYRIL G. JOHNSON.
LIEUT. ALLAN H. PRESTON, M.C.

IT is with a sense of deep personal loss we chronicle the death of Second Lieut. Cyril Goode Johnson, R.F.A., who was killed in France on June 7 in his 20th year. He was the younger son of Col. J. G. Johnson, V.D., J.P., and Mrs. Johnson of Brinnington Hall, and was the youngest officer in his regiment. He was educated at Sedburgh, had nine months artillery training at Woolwich, took his commission, and went out to France in March last. He belongs to the third generation of Johnsons who have faithfully served the Stockport Unitarian Church, his grandfather, Capt. Johnson, J.P., was its Treasurer for thirty-four years, and his father is still one of the pillars of the church. Cyril Johnson was a member of the Minister's Vestry Class twelve months ago; his was of a bright, cheery, kindly disposition, which endeared him to all who knew him, and his loss is deeply mourned.

The Stockport congregation also laments the loss of Lieut. Allan H. Preston, M.C., of the Machine Gun Company, New Zealand Force, the son of Mr. and Mrs. J. W. Preston of Westbourne Davenport, Stockport, who was killed in action on June 8. Lieut. Preston, who was living in Wellington, New Zealand, at the outbreak of war, enlisted at once. He took part in the first landing at Gallipoli, was wounded several times, and was given a commission on the field. Later he was mentioned in dispatches and invalided home. On his recovery he was sent to France, where he was awarded the Military Cross for conspicuous gallantry on the Somme. In the official record it was stated that: "He handled his machine guns under heavy fire with great courage and ability, and greatly assisted in the final success of the operations."

On Sunday morning, June 17, the Rev. H. E. Perry paid an affectionate tribute to the memory of the two fallen officers.

MEETINGS AND GENERAL NEWS.

BELGIAN HOSPITAL FUND.

The Belgian Hospital Fund is registered by the London County Council, under the provisions of Section I. of the War Charities Act, 1916.

The objects of the Fund are: (1) To aid the Belgian hospitals and convalescent depots in France, and the Belgian military doctors at the Front in Belgium. (2) To maintain a Civil Hospice at Calais. (3) To aid the Belgian School Colonies in France.

INTER-DENOMINATIONAL SOCIAL SERVICE UNIONS.

AN EXPERIMENT IN EVESHAM.

IT is thought desirable to give some account of the steps taken and the work accomplished by the Evesham Inter-Denominational Social Service Union with a view to other similar local Social Service Unions being formed throughout the country. This Union was formed as recently as October 17 last. Moreover, it was formed in war time, and its brief activities have taken place under war conditions. This fact has had its advantages as well as its disadvantages, for such co-operation as has been effected between the various local Christian Churches would not, in the opinion of those on the spot, have proved possible in pre-war times.

PRECEDENTS.

The initiative was taken by the minister of the local Oat Street Chapel. He is also secretary of the Union for Social Service of Members of Unitarian, Free Christian and Kindred Churches. This Union is affiliated to the Inter-Denominational Conference of Social Service Unions. The Chairman of this Conference is the Bishop of Oxford, and each Denomination is represented on it by three delegates. It has organised five United Summer Schools for the study of social questions at Swanwick in Derbyshire, at which members of all the Christian denominations have met for social intercourse, interchange of thought, and for mutual encouragement and inspiration. It has recently issued a 'Scheme of Christian Social Reconstruction,' which reveals a remarkable agreement on principles and even methods of social reform among members of all the great Christian Churches in this country. Arising out of the work of the Conference and of the United Summer Schools at Swanwick two local Inter-Denominational Social Service Unions, at Liverpool and Birmingham respectively, had been formed before the Union in Evesham had been contemplated. Indeed, without this body of powerful precedents, the work at Evesham could not have been successfully inaugurated.

PRELIMINARY STEPS.

A meeting of all ministers of religion in charge of congregations in Evesham was called on September 22 last to consider the steps to be taken to found an Inter-Denominational Social Service Union in the town. It was held in the Council Chamber of the Town Hall. All the ministers were present: The Vicar of Evesham, the Roman Catholic priest, the three Nonconformist ministers, and the leader of the Society of Friends. The Vicar was in the chair. At this meeting, and at a subsequent meeting held on October 3, it was resolved to found a Christian Social Service Union on Inter-Denominational lines. It was also resolved that the Executive of the Union should be a Council consisting of the minister of each congregation and two members of such congregation nominated by him, one of whom might be a woman. It was further resolved that the name of the Union should be the Evesham Inter-Denominational Social Service Union, and that its object should be: "To study the social conditions of the town, and to endeavour to promote the general welfare through the inspiration of the Christian spirit and the application of Christian principles."

A CHRISTIAN COUNCIL.

A meeting of ministers and their nominees was held on October 17 in the Council Chamber of the Town Hall, the Vicar presiding, when a Council was constituted on the lines agreed upon above, and the proposed name and object were adopted. The Vicar is the Chairman of the Council, the minister of Oat Street Chapel is the Hon. Secretary, and the Hon. Treasurer, Miss Piper, is a member of the same chapel. The Council meets in the Council Chamber, and the Committees in a Committee Room of the Town Hall, generously placed at the Union's disposal. There have been eight monthly meetings of the Council at which the average attendance has been fourteen out of a possible twenty. Eight of the members are women. The Council Meetings are opened with silent prayer and the Lord's Prayer. In addition, twenty-six Committee Meetings have been held to date.

COMMITTEES.

The following committees have been appointed and have done useful work, some of which is outlined below: Maternity and Infant Care, Housing and Sanitary, Finance, Vigilance, Cinema, Sunday Observance, Education, Organised Games, Communal Kitchen and Children's Welfare.

Maternity and Infant Care Committee.—This was the first committee appointed, as it was thought well to commence with work about which there is the greatest certainty of common agreement. It is one of the principles of the Union that no action shall be taken unless opinion is unanimous in its favour. After several Committee Meetings had been held, interested persons were invited to a meeting in the Council Chamber of the Town Hall on January 15, which was addressed by the County Medical Officer of Health and by a lady who has charge of a local voluntary agency for Maternity and Infant Care. As a result of this meeting a Maternity and Infant Care Society was formed, of which Mrs. Geoffrey New is Hon. Secretary, and a Maternity Centre has now been working for some three months for which the Vicar has generously placed rooms in the Church House at the Society's disposal. A health visitor and a doctor have been appointed. Funds have been raised to secure the adequate working of the Centre for a year, and the Town Council has made the Society a grant of £25. At the end of the year it is expected that the Local Government Board will meet half the working expenses, since the work is being carried on in accordance with the Board's requirements.

Housing and Sanitary Committee.—The Town Council has a building scheme held up by the war. The Committee is carefully investigating housing conditions in the town with a view to influencing the Town Council when an opportune moment arrives. It has already accumulated a valuable body of data as a result of the personal investigations and detailed reports of its members. It has also effected a number of minor sanitary improvements. This Committee has also investigated the bad conditions in a factory employing two hundred women and girls. The attention of H.M. Inspector of Factories was called to these, and the result is that important improvements are being effected which will conduce greatly to the health and happiness of the employees. This Committee has, further, taken up the question of garden allotments. Apart from small holdings of an acre or more there are no garden allotments in Evesham, and there is very considerable difficulty in obtaining land for the purpose at a reasonable price. Letters of the Hon. Secretary in the local papers brought him one hundred and twenty-five applications for such allotments of about one chain each. A meeting of the applicants took place in the Town Hall on April 26 when ninety-seven were present and an Allotments Committee was appointed. This Committee has now approached the Town Council asking it to take action, by exercising compulsory powers of purchase, if necessary, in accordance with the requirements of the Small Holdings and Allotments Act of 1908. The Town Council has referred the matter to its General Purposes Committee.

Finance Committee.—The expenses of the Union are small. Its various meetings are held in the Town Hall at a nominal charge for cleaning, &c. The minister and the two nominated members of each congregation are asked to collect from the members of such congregation a minimum of £1 and a maximum of £2 per annum. The amount thus raised is likely to meet all present requirements.

The Vigilance, Cinema, Sunday Observance and Education Committees are doing useful work, and have more in prospect.

An Organised Games Committee has just been appointed to take steps to procure more adequate playing-fields for children, and to get schoolrooms and school playgrounds better utilised out of school hours.

Children's Welfare Committee.—This Committee is probably undertaking the most difficult work so far attempted. It concerned itself in the first instance with child-labour, and procured valuable information in regard to this from two head teachers. Some 20 per cent of the children in Evesham work out of school hours, a number of boys as much as 30 hours a week

The moment, however, has not seemed opportune for taking action. The question of the After-care of children was then considered, and it was decided to call a meeting in the Town Hall to consider the formation of a Children's Welfare Society which should concern itself with the physical, mental, vocational, moral and spiritual welfare of children, especially in the critical years from 14 to 18. This meeting took place on May 2 and was addressed by the Dean of Worcester and the County Director of Education. Persons specially interested in education were invited and the meeting was largely attended. It requested the Council to form a Children's Welfare Society. This it has now constituted, the Society to be affiliated to the Council and to be upon the same basis. The co-operation of teachers and managers and of those interested in education is secured.

Communal Kitchen Committees.—This was appointed at the close of the Children's Welfare Meeting on May 2, and is making inquiries as to the need and possibilities of such work.

Results.

As a result of the work of the Union there is already evidence of a quickening of interest locally in social questions. This is most noteworthy among the ministers of religion. The work for Infants' Care, for Garden Allotments, and for Children's Welfare has also roused a wide and deep interest, and has received much attention from the local Press, which has given the Movement throughout its wholehearted support. The Council has recently added to its number the Captain of the local Salvation Army.

Counsel.

To those who propose to take steps to found similar Unions in their own local areas the following counsel may be offered as a result of a brief experience. First, it is not of the least use to expect any permanent co-operation of churches for the ends contemplated save on a Christian and on an Inter-denominational basis. This must be settled at the outset. Secondly, it is urgently necessary that the most careful selection should be made of the members of the Council, and the method followed at Evesham has proved so far successful, although it is hoped that a more representative basis will soon be reached. Members have been chosen by the ministers not as having official and representative capacity, but solely for their interest and experience in social work animated by the Christian spirit.

THE LANCASHIRE AND CHESHIRE PROVINCIAL ASSEMBLY.

Beautiful weather helped to make the Annual Meeting of the Provincial Assembly enjoyable on Wednesday, June 13, at Manchester. A large gathering took place at Cross Street Chapel for the morning service, which was conducted by the Rev. E. D. P. Evans of Bury (the "Supporter" this year and "Preacher" next year). The sermon was preached by the Rev. N. Anderton, B.A., of Monton, on Prov. xx. 27: "The spirit of man is the lamp of the Lord," and contained a forcible plea for the preservation of the highest human ideals even amidst the catastrophe which has befallen civilisation.

The meeting for business was held at the Memorial Hall, and although the proceedings were lengthy and the afternoon rather warm, the interest of the gathering was maintained throughout. "What do they do at the Business Meeting?" was a query overheard in the crowd outside the chapel, and the somewhat deprecatory answer was given "Oh! talk politics!" This year, at any rate, the mild accusation thus implied was not warranted by the event, for although certain broad aspects of public life came under consideration, the attention of the meeting was given mainly to matters of vital importance affecting our own churches. A very high and impressive note was struck in the opening address by the President, Mr. G. G. Armstrong. Explaining that no report had been issued to members of the Assembly this year on account of the necessity of economy in paper, he said that the present was a period of marking time and holding on. We had had to make up our minds whether we could feel justified in repelling force by force. We had sadly come to the conclusion that while the use of force was not in consonance with the teaching of the Founder of our religion, in this matter we felt we must disagree with Jesus. We chose force; but having done so, we must see to it that we resist any other deviation from the teaching of the Master. We must reject that bastard form of patriotism which is shown in hating our enemy, even while we fight him. Since force of itself could not yield the higher spiritual results, we resolved to watch and pray for the time when we could turn away from this present work to that which will be nobler. Two world-shaking events had taken place—the Russian Revolution and the accession of America to our Alliance—and they called forth a rebirth of faith in human kind. The meaning of the Russian formula of "no annexations" was that there should be no passing on of peoples as chattels from one government to another. With deep joy we had learnt that our Government had entered sympathetically into Russian aims and had offered to revise the statement of our own aims. The men who will return from the war will insist on a revolutionary change in our own home institutions, for which they have risked and sacrificed so much. One thing that will have to be surrendered by all the nations in the coming settlement, if there is to be lasting peace, is that claim to the sovereignty of the State which has been so inimical to the world's welfare. The states of the world must learn how to submit themselves to a higher law. We have to beware of continuing the war after the attainment of the high objects for which we set out has been secured. Particularly we have to beware of the cry for "punishment," which is dangerously suggestive of "revenge."

Speaking of the losses the Assembly has suffered, the President referred to the beautiful life and character of the Rev. Henry Hawkes, who was beloved by all for his unaffected simplicity and deep humility and for his gift of spiritual poetry. He wished also to send loving greetings from the meeting to the Rev. E. L. H. Thomas. The retirement of the Rev. Dendy Agate was also in all our thoughts, as well as the death of Mr. J. R. Beard, whose long and devoted services to the churches of the Assembly were commemorated in a resolution moved by the Rev. H. E. Dowson and seconded by Mr. G. H. Leigh.

Dr. Mellone was elected President and Dr. Mellor Supporter. The new Committee is as follows: the Revs. E. D. P. Evans, J. C. Flower, A. W. Fox, S. A. Mellor, J. M. Mills, G. A. Payne, H. B. Smith, J. J. Wright, Miss Dornan, H. P. Greg, H. Dean, Miss H. M. Johnson, A. Nicholson, Mrs. Renold, T. F. Robinson, J. Wigley.

The President moved and the Rev. D. Agate seconded a resolution of congratulation and good wishes to the Rev. H. E. Dowson on his Golden Wedding and his Jubilee at Gee Cross. The resolution which will be engrossed on vellum, records with special gratitude the invaluable services which Mr. Dowson has rendered to the Assembly and to the ministers and congregations composing it during his long tenure of the Secretaryship. Both Mr. and Mrs. Dowson were greeted with great enthusiasm on rising to reply.

A resolution upon the Russian Revolution and the entry of America into the war was passed. The Assembly also renewed the protest made last year against the unjust treatment from which conscientious objectors are still suffering. During the afternoon Mr. P. M. Oliver gave an address which made a strong impression on the spiritual outcome of the war. He thought that two things had been brought home to a multitude of our voluntary soldiers, the sacredness of human personality and the value of co-operation and esprit de corps. It would, he said, be the business of the Church to meet these men on their return with a clear and powerful embodiment of these great principles; otherwise the co-operation they will inevitably strive after will be sought for upon a lower and more material basis.

WILLASTON SCHOOL.

AN OLD BOY WINS THE VICTORIA CROSS

The death in action of Captain David Philip Hirsch, an old Boy of Willaston School, was recorded in these columns a few weeks ago. It is now known that the supreme tribute of a soldier has been paid to his memory. He has been awarded the Victoria Cross: "for most conspicuous bravery and devotion to duty in attack. Having arrived at the first objective, Captain Hirsch, although already twice wounded, returned over fire-swept slopes to satisfy himself that the defensive flank was being established. Machine-gun fire was so intense that it was necessary for him to be continuously up and down the line, encouraging the men to dig and hold the position. He continued to encourage his men by standing on the parapet and steadying them in the face of machine-gun fire and counter attack, until he was killed. His conduct throughout was a magnificent example of the greatest devotion to duty."

"Tu vero felix, non vitae tantum claritate, sed etiam opportunitate mortis ....Placide quiescas, nosque et domum tuam ab infirmo desiderio ad contemplationem virtutum tuarum voces, quas neque lugeri neque plangi fas est. Admiratione te potius et immortalibus laudibus et, si natura suppeditet, similitudine colamus."

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Bolton.—Reprisals was the subject dealt with on Sunday evening, June 17, at Bank Street Chapel, by the Rev. J. Cyril Flower. In the course of his sermon he said: One of the most insidious dangers of war is the tendency against which even the most moral people find it hard to contend, to revert to the moral standards of barbarism. At no point is this danger more intense than when people are stirred by the foul inhumanity of the enemy to demand reprisals. For by this word many people mean nothing else than revenge. In the recently discovered Code of King Hammurabi, 1,300 years earlier than the Biblical books of the Covenant, the primitive of idea of justice based on instinct finds expression. It starts from the principle "an eye for an eye," but works it out with complete lack of recognition of responsibility by insisting also on the principle—an ox for an ox, a slave for a slave, a son for a son, a daughter for a daughter. You have slain my son; then I may legally slay not you, but your son. It is to this level of primitive, instinctive morality that those who seek reprisals by the slaughter of German women and children would have us return. Reprisals in this sense were not only morally indefensible, but practically stupid and futile. In a crescendo of reprisals and frightfulness, it would not be we who could reach the highest note. The responsible authors of the inhuman outrages were the Prussian military caste. It was folly to imagine that they, who hesitated not to saturate the world in blood for their lust after power, would be deterred from any means of warfare by sentiment over the spilt blood of a few more women and children who happened to be German. Our business was to protect our land from all murderous attacks to the utmost of our power; and meanwhile to work unitedly for that day when the German rulers could be brought before the bar of humanity to receive judgment for their unspeakable crimes. "But let us not defile ourselves," he concluded, "or increase the black misery of this war-torn world by deliberately embroiling our hands in the blood of women and children."

Exeter Assembly.—The members of this ministerial society met on Wednesday, June 20, at George's Meeting, Exeter. The moderator, the Rev. R. H. U. Bloor, presided. There were also present the Revs. F. Allen, T. F. Brockway, C. E. Jewell, T. B. Evans, A. Lancaster, E. Palmer (Congregationalist), and W. H. Burgess, scribe to the Assembly. After the usual business Mr. Evans opened a discussion on 'The Collapse of Science in Ethics.' A resolution was passed expressing regret at the impending departure of Mr. Bloor from Exeter and appreciation of his many services to the Assembly. The members presented him with a book as a token of regard.

London : Finchley.—The Unitarian Church has suffered a sad loss in the death of Mr. William Murray, a partner in the Edinburgh Press, Old Bailey, after a long illness borne with characteristic fortitude and patience. Mr. Murray was born in Edinburgh about fifty years ago, where he was apprenticed to the printing trade. Some years ago he established himself in business in London and secured the confidence and support of the leading publishing houses. He was an original member of the Finchley Unitarian Church, which he supported generously. He also took a deep interest in the Spiritualist movement. The funeral on the 18th inst. was conducted by the Rev. J. Arthur Pearson.

Nottingham.—At the Annual Meeting of the congregation of the High Pavement Chapel, which was held on Tuesday, June 5, Mr. George Bryan presiding, a cordial vote of thanks to the minister, the Rev. J. C. Ballantyne, was proposed by Mr. Warren. No one, Mr. Warren said, could have worked harder or more sympathetically for the congregation and schools than Mr. Ballantyne had done, and no one of them knew all that he had done. They ought to be, and he was sure they were, most grateful to him, more especially for what he had done for the men with the Forces. The resolution was seconded by Mr. J. T. Perry, and carried with acclamation.

Warrington.—On June 15 the Rev. W. H. Drummond gave an address in the Cairo Street Schoolroom on his work among the Belgian Hospitals and in the Huts of the Y.M.C.A. during his recent visit to France. Mr. F. W. Monks presided and was supported by the Rev. Irvine Lister. A collection was taken at the close for the war work of the Y.M.C.A.

Ministers' Pension Fund.—At a meeting of the Board of Managers held early in the month Dr. C. Herbert-Smith was elected a member of the Board in place of Mr. Robert Blake, who had resigned through ill-health. Two beneficiaries had ceased to be qualified under the rules, and arrangements were made for their policies to be reassigned to them. Five new applications under the regular tables were accepted, and a special case; and a special case was dealt with under the Philip Holt Fund.

TRADE UNIONS are now being formed for the first time in Japan, as a result of the activities and rapid growth of the Yuai Kai, the labour society of the country, which has now attained a membership of twenty-seven thousand. The formation of this society is due to Burji Suzuki, until recently the secretary of the Unitarian Mission in Tokyo, and it formerly occupied quarters in the Unitarian Building. These it has, however, outgrown, and it has been decided to erect another building which will give more scope for its activities.

BOOKS WANTED.

THE hon. secretaries of the North Midland Presbyterian and Unitarian Association write that they are in search of some historical material which, up till now, they have been unable to secure locally, and they wish to make their wants known in our columns, in the hope that some help may be forthcoming from our readers. Their wants are as follows:—

'The Heavens do Rule.'—A sermon preached at a meeting of ministers at Derby, September 9, 1742.

A volume of 'Sermons,' by Dr. Latham, with a sketch of Dr. Latham's character, published by his son-in-law, Mr. Willetts.

The Midland Unitarian Record, for February, 1861, May, 1861, and further issues.

Any reports of the "N. Midland Unitarian Village Mission Society," and of the N. Midland Presbyterian and Unitarian Association prior to 1902.

Even the loan of any of the above would be most welcome. Kindly address communications to the Rev. H. W. Stephenson, 22 Beacon Road, Loughborough.

DEATHS.

COOPER.—On June 17, suddenly, at Beaconsfield, Bucks, Alice Jane Cooper, daughter of the late Rev. J. T. Cooper of Diss, Norfolk, formerly Head Mistress of the Edgbaston High School, and Assistant Lecturer on Education at Oxford.

MARLES-THOMAS.—On April 29, by enemy action against his ship whilst on Admiralty duty, Lewis Williams Marles-Thomas, a Chief Officer in the British Merchant Shipping Service, youngest and only surviving son of the late Rev. William Thomas ("Gwilm Marles") of Llwynrhydowen, Cardiganshire.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

The address for our Belgian Hospital Fund, to which cheques and parcels of clothing should be sent, is Mrs. Bernard Allen, 14 Gainsborough Gardens, Hampstead, N.W.3.

THERE have been two straws this week which may possibly show better in which direction the wind is blowing than many of the events which are trumpeted loudly in the press. If the reports which have been published may be trusted Herr Scheidemann has returned from Stockholm a sadder and a wiser man. He cannot deny that Germany has reaped a whirlwind of distrust and dislike, while the countries against which she is fighting are regarded by neutrals as the standard-bearers of liberty. "We Social Democrats," he says, "go abroad to hear the Fatherland cursed on all sides, consigned to the lowest depths of hell, as the stronghold of blackest reaction, whilst England, France, and America are praised as bringers of light and freedom. We hear Wilhelm II. described as a tyrannical war fanatic, and Bethmann as his pliable, cunningly worked tool, and we have to make out that things are not half so bad." These are words of bitter disillusion, and they lead Herr Scheidemann to the sensible conviction that nothing can be done to change this world-wide sentiment until Germany is completely democratised.

THE other event to which we refer is the Conference which has been held at the Hague between British and German delegates on the conditions of prisoners of war in the two countries. If we are not mistaken this is the first time that views have been exchanged in this direct fashion since the beginning of the war. We hope that it may be accepted as evidence of some softening of mood on the part of the German Government. Certainly nothing but an increased sense of the duty of humane and considerate treatment of an enemy who is helpless and unarmed can result from such a conference. We believe that in this matter our own standard is commendably high. Public opinion would not tolerate anything else.

THE discussion of reprisals still goes on with some heat in Parliament and in the press; but we are glad to see that the Government is inclined to hold its hand and has not yielded to clamour. It is one of the cases where broadminded worldly wisdom and the dictates of the Christian conscience seem to coincide. Speaking in the House of Lords on Tuesday Lord Derby repudiated in explicit terms the view that we ought to try to imitate the German in his brutality, and asserted that the idea of an eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth is absolutely repugnant to this nation. "In any question of reprisals," he said, "we must have a distinct military objective, something by which we can achieve not only the killing of soldiers, but the destruction of munition works and factories for the construction of guns."

THE Archbishop of Canterbury has written an important letter on the same subject in response to a request from Sir Thomas Barlow.

> The key of the situation [he writes] lies in the intention of the act; not an uncertain hope of ultimate consequence, but its immediate practical intention. Of course in one sense "reprisal" is of the essence of war. But what kind of reprisal? We bombard a fortified town. This must often involve risk to innocent non-combatants. But that is not its object. Its object is to harm the enemy's combatant forces. The incidental harming of non-combatants is lamentable, and it will, so far as military conditions permit, be avoided. But it is sometimes inevitable. Quite different from this is an attack, the direct object of which is to harm or kill non-combatants, either for reasons of vengeance, or in order to promote terror, or in the hope of deterring the enemy from perpetrating outrages. That is the kind of "reprisal" in which some people wish us in England to indulge.... In my belief such action on our part, if we were so mistaken as to adopt it, would be altogether futile as a deterrent: the Germans would always outdistance us in ruthlessness. But my belief or conjecture on that question is valueless: nor can the opinion of any one about it be more than surmise. Of this I am quite certain: many thousands of the best and most thoughtful people in this country are resolved that, so far as we civilians are allowed any say in the matter, we mean to support the prosecution of the war with every power we have and every sacrifice that we can make, but we mean to come out of it with untainted honour and with clean hands. We are determined to leave to the Germans the unenviable monopoly of an infamous disregard of what is honourable and decent in warfare. We absolutely decline to degrade ourselves to that level.

IN the arena of public life the two chief events since we wrote last have been the keen discussion in the House of Commons on the subject of the recall of discharged soldiers to the colours, and the publication of the report of the Commission appointed to inquire into the operations in Mesopotamia. In the former the Government only escaped from a very damaging situation by the promise of a committee of inquiry. The House was clearly convinced that there has been a good deal of careless and harsh administration which must be avoided in future, and agreed with the weighty judgment of Mr. Asquith at the close of his speech. "Anything so wasteful," he said, "as the return to military service of men who have been wounded and invalided and are not permanently fit to rejoin the colours, or the sending to the colours for the first time of men whose physical condition is not such as to make them really trustworthy soldiers, would not merely cause hardship to individuals but a gross waste of the human resources of the whole country."

THE Mesopotamian Report raises many questions of the utmost seriousness. We shall have done but little if we simply secure a certain number of victims for punishment among the highly-placed officials who have blundered so badly. It is the system that needs to be reformed root and branch. Clearly it was a mistake to attempt to work the transport and medical equipment of a large expeditionary force from India. The military organization, devised for other purposes, was entirely unequal to its task. A mood of popular anger, which on the facts as disclosed has seldom had more cruel justification, may be satisfied by sentences of public disgrace, but political wisdom will demand a complete change in the whole temper and method of our Indian administration. The narrow mind which resents criticism and regards suggestions for improvement as acts of impertinence must no longer occupy the high places of power. In ordinary circumstances it is a fruitful source of dullness and inefficiency. At the present time it has been guilty of a terrible neglect of duty and brought us to the brink of grave disaster.

SIR OLIVER LODGE has sent a trenchant letter to The Times in which he seeks to expose the folly of men who try at the present moment to discourage our soldiers and bid them stay their hands "in the name of a misrepresentation and travesty of Christianity." "Those who thus seek to weaken the fighters [he writes] though they are saying 'Lord, Lord' with their mouths, are taking a holy Name in vain and are traitors to the Kingdom.... The way to salvation now is by fierce and determined energy, not by miserable doubt and hesitation; only thus can mankind emerge from the present horrible nightmare and enter upon an era of peace. Wounds and death are not the worst of evils; bodily injuries must be inflicted as well as suffered by those who are standing up for the weaker peoples and fighting to the death for honour and freedom and Christianity, and the future welfare of mankind."

WE announce to-day the resignation of the Rev. E. L. H. Thomas from the important position of minister of Cross Street Chapel, Manchester, owing to long continued ill-health. In doing so we desire to express to him the deep and affectionate regret of a wide circle among our readers. During his ministry Mr. Thomas has shown himself to be a man of remarkable and original gifts. With a mind enriched by the learning of the Sorbonne and the University of Berlin he has preserved the directness of his own spiritual vision and he belongs to no school. He has been a contributor, alas! far too occasional, to our own columns. His diligence in his ministry and his own fastidious taste have never allowed him to write much; but his pregnant and allusive style, and something in the texture of his thought which linked him with the great French masters of aphorism like Pascal, gave his articles a distinctive quality which was deeply valued by many readers. A teacher, who has never competed for fame, he has prevailed through quietness and modesty and the gracious charm of his own character.

PUNISHMENT AND HATE.

WE make no apology for returning to Cardinal Mercier's recent pastoral, to which we called attention last week, for the subject with which it deals is one of grave practical importance at the present time. "Some confused notions are in the air," he writes, "concerning our obligations of justice and charity towards the enemy of our country." These words are a challenge to us on this side of the Channel, where our comparative freedom from some of the worst sufferings of the war makes it easier for us to indulge in moral speculation and to attempt to regulate policy by abstract principles than is the case in Belgium or in France. Quiet and meditative people among ourselves, who are anxious to do right and to keep their hearts clear from degrading passion, will do well to study Cardinal Mercier's words. They will recall them to the hard tasks of thought at a time when some of us seem to be in no small danger of losing our way amid soft and pleasing sentiments, and they may go far to convince them of the validity of a clear distinction between the demand for severe punishment and the mean craving for revenge, which is not always observed in our discussions.

It is, no doubt, rash to attempt to speak for such a complex and variegated thing as the mind of our countrymen, but we think it is true to say that there is a general consensus of opinion that there must be severe punishment for Germany's wanton violation of the peace of Europe and the crimes which have marked the progress of the war, and at the same time there is no widespread desire to inflict needless cruelties upon her in order to gratify feelings of anger and resentment. In any case this is certainly the attitude of a large number of high-minded people among us, who make a sincere attempt to mould their conduct by the dictates of justice and charity. When they listen to the lofty appeals of Christian forgiveness they are deeply stirred, in spite of the fact that some preachers of this doctrine seem to be hardly aware of its tremendous difficulties. When, however, they are told that forgiveness means that there is to be no punishment, that all punishment is based upon hatred and the desire to see a fellow-creature suffer, and that their present enemies must be welcomed back into intimate friendship as soon as peace is declared, they draw back in strong protest, and their whole attitude is one of moral rebellion. They may be confronted with texts from the New Testament, and the pathetic appeals which are made to them may be steeped in the most moving language of Christian sentiment, but the effect of it all is to make them doubt whether Jesus Christ intended to teach anything so morally absurd. For them at least the whole problem has been stated falsely.

It is just here, in a situation which for many of us is one of moral confusion, that Cardinal Mercier's words, with their directness of appeal and their clear-sighted analysis of motive, are most timely. His teaching is based upon the valid distinction between "the will to avenge evil, having respect to order and justice," and an unruly desire for vengeance "having for its first object the punishment of the guilty rather than the repression of evil." The stern resolve to repress evil is, he contends, something entirely different from hatred, which desires suffering for our neighbour merely that he may suffer, and allows this suffering to be the goal at which our desire dwells with pleasure. But, he continues, "to wish a physical evil to some one who has done wrong and remains obdurate, not as an aim in itself, but as a means to a further moral aim, to wish that the guilty suffer, so that under the strain of suffering conversion may come to him, though he would not go to her—this is not hatred: it is on the contrary, reasonable love. 'As I live,' saith the Lord God, 'I have no pleasure in the death of the wicked, but that the wicked turn from his way and live.' We imitate our God; we do not wish our enemies to be excluded from Paradise. We wish them to become once more worthy to enter into it.... Hatred springs from a destructive instinct. Righteous vengeance springs from charity."

From this point of view it is possible to argue that stern terms of peace may be, in the long run, far nobler than any attempt at weak accommodation. There is a fear in some quarters that severity will rankle, and we are urged accordingly to make everything easy and pleasant for Germany, so that she may desire to live at peace with us in the future. We doubt, however, whether this is the right way to win the respect of a proud and ambitious nation. If we are merely revengeful the sense of wrong will rankle and break out into flame; but terms which are based upon a strict adherence to the demands of justice and honour, though they may smart terribly for a time, will leave no permanent sense of injury behind. A nation, like a man, must pay the price of its own crimes, and we confer no benefit upon it by trying to soften the moral abhorrence of the world. It has been said repeatedly that Germany must be made to feel that this sort of thing does not pay. This is simply a crude and popular expression of our faith in the moral government of the world, and the instinct which underlies it is far closer to the essential demands of our religion than the soft pleadings which would help the criminal to escape from the bitter pains of repentance and reparation. Do what we will we cannot turn away from Germany the penalty of her own misdeeds, but as Christian men we can do our best to banish vindictiveness from our own hearts and to make her punishment just.

But, it may be said, who are we that we should be the agents of punishment upon another people? Are not the base passions of hatred and ill-will certain to intervene to spoil our task? Here we are face to face with one of the tremendous difficulties of the moral life. There is no work undertaken for the promotion of the kingdom of God and his righteousness, which may not be ruined by our own evil ambition and pettiness of mind. We can never check robbers and murderers in their mad career, or send the man who battens on the white slave traffic to his doom, without confessing the difficulty of mingling justice with charity, and remembering that these criminals are men like ourselves; and yet we cannot refuse to be instruments of a righteousness higher than our own without treachery to the best interests of civilised life. And in these days if we turn away from the terrible tasks of justice, because we doubt the power of our own hearts to rise to the heights of nobleness which God demands of us, if we allow ourselves to think more of the moral dangers which beset the path of duty than of its stern obligation, if we refuse to punish because we have not taken the trouble to clear our minds of the confusion between punishment and revenge, we may indeed find a temporary resting-place in the world of pleasant sentiments and dreams, but in the end nothing can save us from the curse of our own moral incapacity.

Cardinal Mercier's pastoral, written to people who have suffered the extremity of torture at the hands of a merciless foe, has given us the opportunity of facing our own problem, which is much milder in form though it is the same in substance. We have stated it in terms which some people may think are too stark and plain. But the issue is one of critical importance for the future of civilisation. We shall be glad if what we have written helps any of our readers to extricate themselves from a moral tangle. If we are wrong, we shall be grateful to them if they will bring forward arguments based upon clearer reason and deeper insight to convict us of our error. Only let us remember that the competence of Christian idealism to deal with things as they are is being tested as never before. Religious people do little to build up the mind of the nation in integrity and common sense when they concern themselves chiefly with vague ideals of brotherhood and peace, and avoid the tasks of hard thinking in a real world. In all these urgent matters of public policy it is not emotional appeals but clear and instructed moral judgment which will enable us to walk closely with God, for whose perfect goodness there can be no discord between the claims of justice and charity, and the sternest punishment has in it no tinge of hate.

QUESTIONS AT ISSUE.

THE RELIGION OF THE FUTURE.

It is common remark that there never was an age like the present for examining foundations; for holding up to the light of criticism conventional views and opinions whose roots were thought to be permanently fixed in the soil of life and thought. This remark applies in all directions, but pre-eminently in the sphere of religion. How often, in relation to great movements, the question arises, Where does religion come in? There can be no doubt that the relations of religion and the Church towards the nation during recent times have been profoundly modified. Take this fact. Up to little more than two centuries ago, the whole nation attended religious services. Such importance did, not only the Church, but the State attach to the practice that it made non-attendance a penal offence (see the "Act of Uniformity," still unrepealed). What is the case now? From statistics lately taken it was found that, in London, only between fifteen and twenty per cent of the population attended church or chapel. Other statistics also show the significant fact that, under the conditions mentioned, crime has diminished and the prosperity of the nation continues to increase.

Various reasons are assigned by the religious world for the falling off in church attendance. I venture to suggest that the real reason lies far deeper than in the causes usually assigned. I find the reason in a total change which has gradually come about in our relation to religion.

It was formerly taught by the church, and universally believed, that if a man did not practise religion (and, to practise religion, attendance at religious observances was held to be absolutely essential) he would not only incur various ills in his present life, but also imperil his immortal soul in the life to come. And so the State, in order to save him from such dire calamities, insisted upon his attending church.

Now this belief has, by the great majority of the nation, been abandoned. This, I suggest, is the main cause why eighty per cent of the population are found outside the churches.

The question then returns, Where, in the daily life of the average man, does Religion come in? We want a definition of religion. No word in the language is more difficult to grasp or define. No word so eludes you as you strive to track it to its ultimate source.

I have been in the habit for many years past of noting down any definition of religion met with in the writings of distinguished authors. Out of all these it is not easy to focus on a single point. It is easy to say what religion is not. It is not assent to historical or metaphysical propositions. It is not taking part in religious exercises, public or private; or attachment to a religious community; it is not the having been the subject, either externally or internally, of some mystic rite or ceremony. Then what is it?

I venture to suggest that the answer is to be found in the attitude that man assumes towards God, that is towards the Supreme Power that works and moves and rules in the Universe and in Humanity, such attitude, if rightly directed, consisting in an earnest devotion to this Power and its laws, thereby calling forth a sense of Communion, of Love, and Peace, and Joy. Again, I am driven to Wordsworth:—

A Presence that disturbs me with the joy
Of elevated thoughts; a sense sublime
Of something far more deeply interfused.
A Motion and a Spirit, that impels
All thinking things, all objects of all thought,
And rolls through all things.

But now the question faces us, What form is this religion to take? A most pregnant and difficult question. Our current forms are, for the most part, worn out. They consist mostly of begging for favours, of asking for things that can only be supplied by ourselves. "Almighty God, who seest that we have no power of ourselves to help ourselves," &c. We formally repeat these words knowing full well that all the help we are likely to get can only come from ourselves, and that if we do not supply it no outside power will. In the religion of the future, will forms be needed? We cannot say. It may be that the vision of the seer of the Revelation will be realised, "I saw no temple therein." But there are many who entertain a dream that, the need still holding for religion to be embodied—that there should be some medium for the expression and realisation of religion—new and suitable forms will arise and grow as the time is ripe for them—some rich and beautiful Ritual in some rich and beautiful Temples; perhaps now faintly adumbrated in the cathedrals of our land.

Meanwhile, bearing in mind the definition of religion above put forth, we may say that wherever the spirit of that definition can be expressed in current forms, however imperfect, it is well to use them. The form is important, but the spirit is far more so, and, if that can be realised, the other is of minor importance.

A SPECIAL COURSE OF STUDY FOR MINISTERS IN MANCHESTER COLLEGE.

To the Editor of THE INQUIRER.

SIR,—In view of the depletion of the College caused by the Military Service Act and by the general conditions attendant on the war the Committee has decided to suspend the ordinary curriculum for Michaelmas Term and to substitute a Special Course of Study for Ministers in the religious and ethical conditions of the time as affected by the war. Application to attend this course can be made by all ministers, irrespective of age, whose names are on the Roll of the National Conference. Preference will be given to those actually in charge of congregations.

The course will cover a month and will be repeated in the second half of the term, so as to admit of a second group of ministers taking advantage of it. The principal lectures and classes will be held on Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday so as to leave ministers time for travelling and for preparation for Sunday. It is greatly hoped, however, that many ministers will be able to spend a continuous month in the College, without returning for Sunday duty; and for this purpose the co-operation of congregations is earnestly invited with a view to giving ministers complete freedom for the month in question.

Full particulars of the course will be published as soon as the arrangements have been made. Distinguished Oxford lecturers will be invited to assist the staff of the College in dealing with the broader aspects of the course, and facilities will be offered by the staff for the study of the Old and New Testaments. Dr. Carpenter will be lecturing on Comparative Religion. The question of Ministerial Efficiency will also be dealt with.

A Discussion Society will be instituted, and will hold frequent sessions. The object of the course itself will be serious study.

To ministers properly accredited as above, whose applications have been accepted, free board and residence will be offered in the College; and in cases where it is deemed necessary a subvention will be made to pay travelling expenses.

It is most desirable that application should be made at the earliest possible moment to the clerical secretary of the College, the Rev. Henry Gow, 12 Glenloch Road, Hampstead, N.W.3. In making their application ministers should state their choice of the first or the second month of the term and indicate, if they can, whether they would reside in Oxford continuously during the month. Every such application will come before the Committee of the College, who assume sole responsibility for its acceptance or otherwise. It should be understood that the number of applications which can be accepted is limited by the accommodation at the disposal of the College. The course will begin on the morning of October 16.—Yours, &c.

The name and address of sender and list of contents should be enclosed in each parcel.

Contributions of money and clothing should be sent to Mrs. Bernard Allen, 14 Gainsborough Gardens, Hampstead, N.W.3.

MANCHESTER COLLEGE, OXFORD.

CLOSE OF THE SESSION.

THE annual proceedings in connection with the close of the session at Manchester College, Oxford, were held on Thursday and Friday, June 21 and 22. The usual Valedictory service was held in the College Chapel on Thursday evening. The service was conducted by the Rev. Henry Gow, the lesson being read by Dr. J. E. Carpenter Dr. Jacks gave the address of farewell on behalf of the College, and the Rev. J. M. Lloyd Thomas welcomed the out-going students, Mr. V. A. Demant, B.Sc., Miss M. B. Crook, B.A., and Mr. Percival Chalk into the ministry. Mr. Demant will settle shortly at Newbury, and Mr. Percival Chalk has accepted an invitation to become permanent minister at Banbury, where he has done excellent service during his student years. On Friday morning a service was held in the College Chapel, conducted by the out-going students, the sermon being preached by the Senior Student, Mr. V. A. Demant. Subsequently the annual meeting of trustees was held in the library. In the absence of the President, Sir John Brunner, the chair was taken by the Rev. Dr. Hargrove. The clerical secretary, the Rev. Henry Gow, read the annual address of the committee, from which we take the following paragraphs:—

"The Committee desire to express as usual their cordial thanks to the Principal and the teaching staff, and to assure them of the full confidence which is reposed in them. The difficulty of carrying on the work of the College has naturally been great. The staff has felt the burden of sorrow and anxiety, and the students have felt the claims of divided duties upon them. Notwithstanding these things, the work of the College has been carried on with energy and faithfulness.

"The Committee wish to express to their beloved chairman, Mr. Dowson, and to his wife, their cordial congratulations on their golden wedding, and also on the completion of their fifty years' ministry at Gee Cross Chapel. The work which they have done there is unique in its character and extent. The Freedom of the town of Hyde has been given to Mr. Dowson in recognition of his great services. No honour could have been more well deserved. The Committee think with deep gratitude of the work which Mr. Dowson has done for the College during so many years, and they gladly join with his innumerable host of other friends in expressing their love and reverence for him.

"The Committee wish to place on record their sorrow for the death of the Rev. W. E. Addis, a former Lecturer in Hebrew and Old Testament at the College. He was a distinguished scholar and an inspiring teacher, and a most simple-hearted noble gentleman. He was revered and beloved by all his students and colleagues. A resolution of sympathy and affection was passed by the Committee and sent to Mrs. Addis."

"The work of the College has been pursued during the session under many restrictions and disadvantages caused by the state of war. The depletion of the University has deprived the students of many of the interests and benefits of contact with Oxford life. It has been found impossible to hold several courses of public lectures in the College; and there has been no opportunity to use the new Hall for these purposes. Changes in the regulations for military service have also caused much disturbance, and resulted in the departure of five of the most promising students at the end of Hilary term, so that only six were left in the College. Nevertheless, the curriculum has been steadily pursued, and the students have worked hard and successfully on the appointed lines."

"Mr. Norman Cocker having been called to the colours in the spring of 1916, his place as College organist was taken by Mr. Harold Spicer, who continued the work with great success until April, 1917, when he, too, was called to the colours. This was a serious loss, Mr. Spicer having proved most efficient and won the high esteem of the staff and the students. By permission of the Principal he had lived in the Residence, where he had formed many friendships. With great difficulty a temporary organist was found for six weeks, at the end of which time no successor had been appointed and no likely applications were coming forward. As a result of private inquiries, however, the Principal was able to secure the services for three months—and it is to be hoped for longer—of Mr. W. A. Pickard-Cambridge, M.A., late Fellow of Magdalen, and now Tutor of Jesus College. Under the admirable management of Mr. Pickard-Cambridge a great improvement has taken place, and the College music has been maintained at a very high level....A series of Organ Recitals for wounded soldiers, hundreds of whom pass the College doors every day on their way to the Mansfield College Club, has been begun under the management of Mr. Pickard-Cambridge."

"The immediate future of the College is doubtful. If the war continues through the summer it does not seem likely or desirable that the College should re-open on the usual lines in October. The first duty of students for the ministry and of all other students is National Service, and our students themselves are feeling this.

"After the war the work of preparing students for the Christian ministry will be pressing and urgent. No greater work can be undertaken than this. The teaching staff feel deeply the responsibility of the duties laid upon them, and desire to give all their thought and effort to training young men for a work which is of vital importance to the community. The Committee believe that the opportunity for the Gospel of Liberal Religion after the war will be great, and they are determined, with the help of the Principals and tutors, to do everything in their power to make Manchester College a source of inspiration and growing strength to the Liberal Christian Churches and through them to the nation. Of all forms of re-construction there can be none more important than the building up of the moral and religious life of the nation. At present our best and noblest young men are risking and giving their lives for right; after the war the Committee hope and believe that some of the best and noblest of our young men will find in the Christian ministry opportunities for self-sacrifice and heroic effort in the service of God and in promoting peace and goodwill among men."

It was announced that owing to the pressure of other work Mr. A. H. Worthington has felt himself compelled to resign the secretaryship to the College, a position which he has held for 25 years. A resolution placing on record the indebtedness of the trustees to Mr. Worthington for his long and distinguished services was moved by Dr. Drummond, who recalled his own long friendship with Mr. Worthington's family, and emphasised the advantage it had been to the College to be served by a man of such high ability and earnestness of purpose. The resolution was seconded by the Rev. Henry Gow, who spoke as an intimate friend of Mr. Worthington from the time of their student days, and supported by Dr. Carpenter. Both speakers referred with feelings of deep gratitude to the way in which Mr. Worthington has represented the liberal principles of the College, and the spirit of deep religious earnestness which has pervaded all his work. The resolution was carried with great cordiality, and Mr. Worthington, in the course of a short reply, expressed his unabated confidence in the principles of the College, and his belief that the time might be nearer than many of them supposed when there would be a much wider recognition of its free religious basis and much larger opportunities of usefulness. Mr. Worthington, who will continue to serve on the committee, is succeeded as secretary by Mr. P. M. Oliver, of Manchester.

Dr. J. E. Odgers moved the election of the Rev. H. E. Dowson as President of the College in succession to Sir John Brunner, and in doing so expressed the desire of the trustees to associate themselves will all the congratulations and good wishes which had come to him from his friends on the completion of his 50 years as minister at Gee Cross.

In replying to a resolution expressing grateful acknowledgment of the labour of the Principal and lecturers during the past session, Dr. Jacks referred to himself as a man who was fond of experiments, but during the two years of his Principalship circumstances had made experiments impossible. In many directions effort had been paralysed, but imagination had still been active. The one change—it was not for him to call it an improvement—which had taken place was in regard to the Chapel services. It was, in his opinion, a matter of great importance to keep before the students the most beautiful and dignified model of religious worship that we can conceive. At the close of the business the usual certificates and prizes were presented by the Chairman to the students.

We notice with pleasure that at the recent University examination in Anthropology at Oxford, the results of which have been announced this week, Mr. Vigo A. Demant has been awarded a certificate in Physical Anthropology and also in Cultural Anthropology.

LIBERAL CHRISTIANS AND MODERN CHURCHMEN.

[FROM A CORRESPONDENT.]

THE past week may be regarded as recording a distinct step in the progress of Liberal Christianity, during which both the Liberal Christian League and the Modern Churchmen have held meetings at Sion College, E.C. As Dr. Glasse said the League is an attempt to consolidate the large body of opinion both inside and outside the churches which is in sympathy with Liberal Theology and practical Christianity, but it does not seek to formulate a creed nor found a new Church. Yet it is by no means indefinite in its aims, and it will not appeal to all. The rigidly orthodox will be opposed to it, while the Deist with his transcendental idea of God and strong individualism might not be comfortable within it, nor those with leanings towards Mediævalism, though the social side might appeal to them. It was a movement spiritual and social, and members could remain loyal to their own denominations while learning more of others.

At the League Meeting a good company assembled at the tea hour and was continually added to until the Public Meeting was well in progress. Prior to this a short devotional and then a Conference were held. At the latter Dr. Lionel Tayler spoke on 'Patriotism.' He said there were two kinds based on the affections and on faith. The patriotism of faith was the higher. This theme he elaborated in a most interesting address, after which there was a brisk discussion only stopped by the limit of time.

At the Public Meeting the President, Dr. Glasse, after his opening remarks already referred to, gave a very interesting account of the tendency of modern theological thought as illustrated in recent literature. At the close he made a strong appeal to the churches to be abreast of the times or no longer to cumber the ground. No doubt it was a relief to some to turn away from Scotch metaphysics, with its strain on the attention, and have their spiritual faculties appealed to by Miss Underhill (Mrs. Stuart Moore). To analyse the address would spoil it. It was listened to with rapt attention while the speaker in quiet, clear tones led us to her inmost thought. We all saw faith and charity like two shafts rising from earth to heaven with something supernatural about them, while between them was the little modest flower of hope, uniquely human, with the faculty of blooming anew every morning. It was a sweet and tender episode.

The REV. HUBERT HANDLEY then spoke on 'The Sick Churches and their Medicine.' He gave a humorous account of a visit to a church he had just made (he was always visiting churches) where he found about twenty people sitting in boxes, and a figure in another box speaking to them on—matters of no importance. The Churches were not alive to the needs of the day. There lay at once the disease and the nature of the remedy. He might be asked why, since there was so much to find fault with, he remained in the Church? It was because of her history and the tender associations connected with her. He gave a moving picture of the village church and all that it stood for.

The REV. G. T. SADLER was to have welcomed Dr. Fort Newton, but he had to explain that their expected visitor was not present. (A sudden indisposition was the cause of his absence, it appears.) However, good wishes were sent to him, and his country and flag were honoured, the audience joining with great heartiness in the singing of the Army Hymn 'Mine eyes have seen the glory,' led by Mrs. E. Fleming Williams.

The REV. CAVENDISH MOXON was the concluding speaker. He confined himself to the question of creeds. There was a general desire to shorten these, but some wanted a few clauses retained. He, however, would admit all to the Church who believed in the good, the beautiful and the true, even if such a one had a difficulty in believing in God.

During the evening Miss Alleyne, the hon. secretary, was presented with a bouquet of flowers on her return from a rest in the country, and Miss Olive Freshfield gave some account of the work at the Home of Service.

At the Modern Churchmens' Meeting on Thursday, the audience, equally large, was drawn more from one section of society. A service had been held at St. Sepulchre's Church in the morning, and the afternoon had been occupied by a business meeting. The Public Meeting was presided over by the President, Prof. GARDNER, who explained that on such occasions they generally drew their speakers from outside of the Union, and on this occasion Mr. A. L. Smith, the Master of Balliol, a distinguished man himself and the successor of such notable men as Drs. Jowett and Caird, and Mr. Clutton Brock, the social litterateur and philosopher, would address them.

The MASTER OF BALLIOL soon displayed the humorous side of his nature. He said he was going to leave empyrean flights to Mr. Brock; he himself was content to be a pedestrian. He had made various inquiries as to the causes of the failure of the Church, but not being satisfied with any of the replies he ventured to ask a soldier returned from the front what was his impression of the Church in the Army? After hesitating, the soldier replied "Well, our padre said a lot to us about eating less, but I noticed he always took two helpings for himself." There were, however, signs of increased interest in the Church. More men at the University, he was glad to say, sought to take honours. The economic question was likely to continue serious, especially after the war. As to the training of ordinands he would suggest a better grounding in apologetics, so that the minister might have a ready answer in plain language to inquiries from the man in the street. He should know, too, the elements of social problems, for he had heard it asked, will there be civil war after this war? There should be training in reading and preaching. One should learn to see both sides of the question. Let it not be forgotten that thinking is education, and there is a lot of thinking being done in the trenches. We should learn to unite on the points on which we agree. They would have to make up their minds what is religion? A chaplain from the front had said his men might be pagans, but they would face any risks for the chance of saving life. Sunday schools were arising in connection with the Ethical and Labour Movements. These were problems of the day. Let the Church cope with them and the part she will play in the future will be greater.

Mr. Clutton Brock began with a suggestion that must have startled many present. He quoted a saying attributed to the Bishop of London (it was Bishop Creighton) that "we may drive out the ape and tiger in man, but there remains the donkey." Examined carefully the speaker thought the real meaning of that saying was the same as was in the mind of Christ when he spoke of the sin against the Holy Ghost. What were the circumstances? He had been casting out devils, and the Pharisees suggested that he did so by the aid of Beelzebub, the prince of devils. There was the sin—turning from the light—calling good—evil. The Pharisees were donkeys, and all through the Gospels we find Christ condemning them. Donkeyism was rampant in Germany and in this country. If the Kaiser had been simply cruel like Nero, he could have been got rid of as Nero was, but donkeyism is contaminating, and so the German people are infected with their talk about the Teutonic race and kultur. In this country it had been said that the threatened disestablishment of the Welsh Church was the cause of the war, a sign of God's wrath. Solemn nonsense is donkeyism. The Liberal Movement is intended to do away with donkeyism in the Church. Because men had immortal souls they need not be donkeys. Christianity was an expression of the whole rational order of the universe.

The Rev. C. W. Emmet explained the objects of the Union and showed the necessity of organisation if their point of view is to be considered in the coming reforms of the Church. The people were asking for a vital religion; when they asked for bread were they to be put off with the stone of tradition?

A MESSAGE FROM MALTA.

The Rev. T. P. Spedding writes:—

Several times I have had letters from parents asking me to visit their boys in France; but unfortunately that is impossible. Even if a chaplain were appointed with full liberty to move on the front, the nature of the military regulations would put any personal visitation like that in the Home Camps out of the question. With the help of friends in definite areas, however, something can usually be done, as the following extract from a letter from the Rev. Ben. Davies in Malta will show:—

"Your note re arranging a meeting here was very welcome, and at last we have managed it. A Unitarian social has actually taken place in Malta, and it is now my pleasing duty to tell you all about it.... I corresponded with Mr. Harold Baily and received a cordial and prompt response, and also a promise of help. The arrangements for the gathering were left in his hands, while I tried to gather as many Unitarians as I knew. We hoped to have about eighteen present, but through the pressure of duties only twelve appeared. The Wesleyans placed their lecture hall at our disposal, and the Rev. Peverly Dodd sent us a word of greeting. Dr. Elizabeth Moffett of the Church of the Messiah, Birmingham, presided at the table; then we fell to song and story. One among us had enjoyed the ministry of Dr. Martineau—been a member of Hope Street for fifty years; other lads came from Lancashire, another from London, and found in Mr. Baily an old Sunday school teacher of Rhyl Street Mission, where he was a member....I gave them your message of cheer and goodwill as the representative of those at home, and drew their attention to the import of the meeting, the only meeting of Unitarians ever held in Malta....We were determined it should not be the last, and now we have arranged a picnic at San Antonio Gardens."

Among other matters Mr. Davies mentions his desire to make the acquaintance of any Unitarians who may be stationed in Malta, and, needless to say, I shall forward all names that reach me.

CROSS STREET CHAPEL, MANCHESTER.

RESIGNATION OF THE REV. E. L. H. THOMAS

At a meeting of the congregation held on June 20, 1917, a letter of resignation was received from the minister, and the following resolution was unanimously passed:—

"That this Meeting of the members of the Cross Street Chapel congregation learns with profound regret that, in consequence of his continued illness, the Rev. E. L. H. Thomas, B.A., has tendered his resignation of the office of minister of the Chapel. It desires, in accepting his resignation, to express sincere sympathy with him and his family in his affliction, and to place on record its sense of the lofty character of his pulpit ministrations, of his assiduous devotion to his pastoral duties, and of his unwearied labours on behalf of the Lower Mosley Street Schools. The Members of the Congregation acknowledge with gratitude the privilege they have enjoyed during the last four years in the ministrations of a man of rare gifts and graces of mind and spirit, and would assure him that he carries with him in his retirement their love and esteem."

The resignation takes effect at the end of September.

UNITARIAN HOME MISSIONARY COLLEGE.

OUTLINE OF SCHEME OF WORK FOR SESSION 1917-18.

1. The College is to serve as a clearing centre for supplies, by organising ministers (retired or without charge) for this purpose.

2. In order to bring the library before the notice of a larger circle of borrowers (in the absence of regular students) Lectures will be delivered by the Warden upon its contents to the various societies of Ministers and Lay-Preachers in the district.

3. Four courses of Lectures for Sunday school teachers have been offered to the Sunday School Unions of Lancashire and Cheshire by the Warden of the College, to be delivered at various centres.

4. During the second term a School for Ministers will be held at Summerville, to consist of forty lectures in all, to be delivered at weekly intervals during a period of ten weeks. A list of lecturers is being prepared consisting of members of the College and University staff, together with ministers and laymen of our own churches.

5. It is proposed to hold during the summer of 1918 at Summerville a residential School for Women Teachers, particulars of which will be announced later.

In view of the fact that the United Summer School of Social Service Unions at Swanwick has been abandoned this year, many of our readers will like to know of the lectures, classes and conference to be held at Oxford, August 2 to August 14, under the auspices of the University of Oxford Delegacy for the Extension of Teaching. The subject under discussion will be: 'The Near Future: Problems of Construction and Reconstruction—Social, Economic and Educational.' There are to be the following sections: (1) Industrial and Economic Re-organisation; (2) Imperial Re-organisation; (3) Educational and Social Reconstruction, and (4) The Future of Religion in England. We do not remember having before seen subjects under the last headings discussed in connection with University Extension work. The lecturers include: Mr. Hartley Withers, Mr. Harold Cox, Viscount Milner (who gives the inaugural lecture), the Master of Balliol, Lieut.-General Sir Robert Baden-Powell, Canon Scott-Holland, the Bishop of Oxford and Dr. Jacks, who is announced to lecture on 'Ethical Reconstruction.' Particulars can be obtained of J. A. R. Marriott, Esq., M.A., University Extension Office, Queen's College, Oxford.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Anniversary Services.—On Sunday, June 24, Sunday School Anniversary Services were held at Holbeck Unitarian Church, Leeds, the Rev. A. Cobden Smith preaching morning and evening. At Blackpool (South Shore) the Rev. J. Wilson, of Glossop, conducted anniversary services on June 17, and on the same day anniversary services were also held at the Old Presbyterian (Unitarian) Chapel at Nantwich, the preacher being Mr. D. W. Ross, M.A., of Willaston School, and at Pendleton (Manchester), preachers the Revs. H. Barnes and N. Anderton.

Diss.—The quarterly meeting of the Executive Committee of the Eastern Union of Unitarian and Free Christian Churches was held at Diss on Thursday, June 21. The President of the Union, Mr. J. D. Wright, of Norwich, was in the chair, and there were present the Revs. L. Redfern, J. W. Saunders, W. H. Sands, and Messrs. R. Hamblin, W. Waller, — Buston, and J. R. Birks. Annual business was discussed, and after the meeting the members joined a party of friends who had come over from Bedfield to spend the day at Diss, and tea was served in the Chapel. Following tea, a short devotional service was held, when Mr. J. D. Wright offered a warm welcome to the friends from the various churches, and spoke words of encouragement and help to those present who were carrying on the work of small and isolated communities. Short addresses were also given by the Revs. Lawrence Redfern, of Norwich, and J. W. Saunders, of Ipswich, who emphasised the duty of individual effort to keep alive the work of the churches during these times of stress and difficulty, and pointed out that the work done even in the smallest towns and weakest churches had its ultimate effect on the world at large. The thanks of the meeting were then expressed to the members of the Diss Church for making the necessary preparations for the day, and also to the lay workers who were so kindly giving their help to carry on the services at the Diss Chapel in the absence of a permanent minister, and a suitable reply was made by Mr. J. R. Birks on behalf of the Diss congregation.

Hull.—Home Fires, the cheery little monthly magazine which is edited by the Rev. T. M. Falconer, minister of Park Street Church, and sent out to the members of the congregation who are in the Army, has just entered upon its second year. It was hoped when it first came into existence that it would not have a long life, but the war still continues, and it is evident from the letters which have been received—extracts from which appear in the magazine—that Home Fires is greatly appreciated by men from Park Street Church who are at the front. It is full of chit-chat about local events, special notes, and press cuttings, and contains a record of all who have been regular participators in any branch of the Church work and are now on active service. —At the annual meeting of the congregation which was held last week the following resolution was passed in regard to reprisals: "Whilst desirous of aiding the Government with all the means at our disposal to bring the war to a successful conclusion, we the undersigned express our conviction that the methods of warfare which deliberately aim at the killing and wounding of non-combatants are contrary to every principle of morality, and would be disastrous to the great cause of human brotherhood for which the British peoples have taken up arms."

Liverpool.—On June 20 a large number of the friends of the late Rev. Henry Warburton Hawkes met at Bootle Free Church for the unveiling of a brass placed there in memory of him. There was a short service, beautifully rendered, in which the Revs. J. C. Odgers, J. L. Haigh, J. Morley Mills and Charles Roper took part, an address being delivered and the Memorial unveiled by the Rev. J. Morley Mills. Mr. Mills touched the right note in the difficult task of appraising the subtle values of Mr. Hawkes's personality: the sensitive, nervous, fastidious mind of the artist joined with the loving kindness, the unfailing generosity, the self-spending, "the vision and the dream" of this developed soul. The affectionate and penetrating tribute, simply given, took away any sadness from the occasion while retaining its solemnity; so that those present felt, though come to the parting of the ways, that "nothing is here for tears," but all is "well and fair." The brass bears this inscription: "A Casket within this wall holds the ashes of the Rev. Henry Warburton Hawkes, Minister Emeritus of this Church. He spent his life in the service of others. Born 26th of October, 1843. Passed away on Easter Sunday, 8th of April, 1917."

London Sunday School Society.—The Annual Aggregate Service of this Society was held at Essex Hall on Sunday afternoon, June 17. In spite of recent air raids there was an attendance almost as large as that of previous years, composed chiefly of teachers and elder scholars of the schools. The Rev. A. H. Dolphin, of Lewisham, took the service and gave the address.

Manchester: The Women's League.—The Summer Meeting of the Manchester Associate Branch of the Women's League was held at Padiham on June 16. There was an attendance of about 140 representing the following branches—Accrington, Burnley, Bury, Nelson, Padiham, Stalybridge and Todmorden. The weather was beautifully fine and a pleasant ramble was enjoyed during the afternoon. After tea Miss Johnstone presided at a meeting at which important matters relating to the welfare of the District League were discussed, and the Secretary gave her Delegate's Report of the Whitweek meetings. Hearty thanks were given to Padiham friends for the hospitality which all had thoroughly enjoyed. The Rev. Thomas Munn conducted a short service in the Chapel, and after a little more pleasant fellowship the company dispersed.

Southampton.—A large congregation assembled on Sunday evening, June 24, at the Church of the Saviour, Southampton, when a special musical service was held in sympathetic recognition of the establishment of a free democracy in Russia. Special music was rendered by a quartette, composed of Miss McLachlan, Miss Campbell, Messrs. Fred Goodyear and Hubert Towler, who sang 'The Comrades' Song of Hope,' and alternate verses of the Russian National Anthem. Mr. Fred Goodyear also sang the stirring song, 'Soldier, what of the Night?' and the organist, Mrs. Filsell, contributed solo music. The minister, the Rev. Victor Moody, speaking of the great victory that had been achieved for the world in and through the Russian people, urged the wisdom of trusting the generous forces which were showing themselves there, and of turning a deaf ear to any suggestion of disloyalty which might be heard in some quarters. He thought that Russia desired, not a separate peace which might leave things worse than they were, but a world peace on democratic lines which would secure permanent peace for the whole of Europe, and perhaps for the whole world. Commenting on the formula "No annexations and no indemnities," the speaker showed that this did not really mean what it had been supposed to mean, a return to the status before the war, but a recognition, in common with America and ourselves, of the new principles that all peoples had the right to decide by plebiscite or otherwise their own destinies. Russia had no intention of leaving Belgium, Serbia, or other small peoples that had suffered with their ravages unrepaired, but had proposed the setting aside of a sum of a thousand million pounds by all the belligerents in proportion to their war expenditure to meet the case. This proposal was worth our consideration, the speaker thought, and when the German people awoke to discover that aggressive militarism was a complete failure, we, for our part, could afford to be generous. There were signs that this change was beginning to take place, and that the whole of Europe was reaching out after a higher ideal of international unity, which alone could guarantee a secure peace.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

The address for our Belgian Hospital Fund, to which cheques and parcels of clothing should be sent, is Mrs. Bernard Allen, 14 Gainsborough Gardens, Hampstead, N.W.3.

THE two speeches which the Prime Minister made in Scotland last week did not disclose any secrets. His aim was to hearten the spirit of the nation and to keep it steady in face of the sufferings of a contest, which may still be prolonged indefinitely. The passages of chief interest dealt with the question of peace and the new watchwords which are on everybody's lips. His refusal to accept the policy of no indemnities at its face value strikes us as both sensible and just. "It is not a question," he said, "of being vindictive, it is not a question of pursuing revenge; indemnity is an essential part of the mechanism of civilisation in every land and clime.... We are fighting for the essential principles of civilisation, and unless we insist upon it we shall not have vindicated what is the basis of right in every land."

TURNING to the question of the future of Mesopotamia and the conquered German colonies Mr. Lloyd George laid it down that the former can never be restored to the blasting tyranny of the Turk, who simply held it as a trustee on behalf of civilisation. "He has been false to his trust, and the trusteeship must be given over to more competent and more equitable hands, chosen by the congress which will settle the affairs of the world. That same observation applies to Armenia, a land soaked with the blood of innocents massacred by the people who were bound to protect them."

AN equally important and far-reaching pronouncement was made on the future of the German colonies. Mr. Lloyd George's words must form the point of departure for any future discussions of the terms which the Allies hope to be in a position to enforce.

> As to the German colonies [he said], that is a matter which must be settled by the great international Peace Congress. Let me point out that our critics talk as if we had annexed lands peopled by Germans, as if we had subjected the Teutonic people to British rule. When you come to settle who shall be the future trustees of these uncivilised lands, you must take into account the sentiments of the people themselves, what confidence has been inspired in their untutored minds by the German rule of which they have had an experience, whether they are anxious to secure the return of their former masters, or whether they would rather trust their destinies to other and juster and—may I confidently say—gentler hands than those who have had the governing of them up to the present time. The wishes, the desires, and the interests of the people of these countries themselves must be the dominant factor in settling their future government. That is the principle upon which we are proceeding.

EVEN more significant was Mr. Lloyd George's suggestion to the German people that if they want a speedy end to hostilities and a satisfactory settlement they would be wise to take the control of their affairs into their own hands. This, so far as we remember, is the first definite signal which has been given by any allied statesman to the elements of democratic revolt in Germany.

> One of the outstanding features of the war [he said] has been the reluctance with which democratic countries entered it, and the historian will conclude, in reviewing the facts of these last few years, that if all the belligerent nations had been ruled by Governments directly responsible to their peoples there would have been no war, and if the German Government's constitution becomes as democratic as either the French, Italian, American, Russian, or British Governments' constitutions are, that in itself would constitute the best guarantee for peace in Europe and the world that we can hope to secure. No one wishes to dictate to the German people the form of government under which they choose to live. That is a matter entirely for themselves; but it is right we should say we could enter into negotiations with a free Government in Germany with a different attitude of mind, a different temper, a different spirit, with less suspicion, with more confidence, than we could with a Government whom we knew to be dominated by the aggressive and arrogant spirit of Prussian militarism; and the Allied Governments would, in my judgment, be acting wisely if they drew that distinction in their general attitude in a discussion of the terms of peace.

AN important Conference on the subject of the future of the German Colonies in Africa was held under the auspices of the Anti-Slavery Society on Wednesday afternoon. It was resolved that in any reconstruction of Africa which may result from this war the interests of the native inhabitants and also their wishes, in so far as those wishes can be clearly ascertained, should be recognised as among the principal factors upon which the discussion of their destiny should be based. It was also decided to send a copy of the resolution to the representatives of the Allied and Neutral Powers, and to the Russian delegates who are shortly to visit this country.

In the course of the discussion, which ranged over a great variety of topics, Sir Harry Johnson deprecated very strongly any form of international control on the ground that at the present time there is no such thing as an effective international conscience on such subjects as native labour and native rights. He also ruled out the suggestion that the natives might in some instances be allowed the choice of being masters in their own land, because in their own interest it is impossible for us to leave them to themselves. In East Africa, for instance, the withdrawal of control would lead to an instant revival of the slave trade and of devastating tribal wars. On these and some other matters there was a good deal of difference of opinion, but the Conference was unanimous in demanding that native territories should not be tossed about in a diplomatic wrangle as payment for little bits of Europe, and that this principle should be settled now before the Peace Congress is called together.

For the first time American Independence Day has been celebrated in this country with frank cordiality, and all rankling memories of our own blunders have been lost in the desire to do honour to our great friend and ally. If the ministers of George III. had listened to the warning voice of Burke the whole history of the world would have been different. But, as Mr. Balfour pointed out in his speech at the Independence Day banquet in London on Wednesday, we had learned the lesson of our mistake. We no longer supposed that people speaking the same language, having the same traditions and laws, having the same love of liberty and the same ideals, would consent to remain part of the Empire except on absolutely equal terms. Mr. Balfour went on to refer to the union of the two great branches of the English-speaking race "for one common purpose in one common understanding" as one of the most beneficent consequences of the present struggle. "It is a theme," he said, "that moves me more, I think, than anything connected with public affairs in all my long experience. We are working together for the best interests of all mankind and for the civilisation, not only of the old world, but of the new."

Mr. Hall Caine, who has been prominent in his demand for reprisals for air-raids as a wise and necessary policy, has now found a more excellent way. He has addressed an open letter "to the Mothers of Germany," in which he appeals with all the resources of his vivid pen to the deep instincts of motherhood and the sacredness which attaches to the thought of a little child in all Christian lands. The letter, which appeared in The Daily Chronicle on Thursday, is likely to be reproduced in the neutral press and in that way some fragments of it may reach Germany. In any case a tender appeal of this kind, cast like bread upon the waters, cannot fail to be productive of feelings of compassion and so to increase the influence of the forces which make for goodness and pure affection in the world.

'THE METHOD IN THE MADNESS.'

Under the arresting title 'The Method in the Madness' Mr. Edwyn Bevan has presented us with a fresh consideration of the case between ourselves and Germany. Those who know his other writings, and the atmosphere of brilliant scholarship and largeness of mind which pervades them, will expect from him something closely reasoned and really helpful on this tangled theme, and they will not be disappointed. Our appetite for war books is a little jaded, but here is one which holds our attention to the end because it emancipates our minds from their slavery to conventional judgments and provides us with fresh material for thought. Mr. Bevan has had special facilities for informing himself about the real drift of opinion in Germany since the outbreak of the war, and there can be few men among us who have his qualifications for making a pronouncement upon her present temper and aims. On these matters all reasonable people will attach unusual importance to his judgment.

At the present moment a book of this kind is most opportune. We are in grave danger in two directions. On the one hand there has been some natural hardening of temper in face of all that we have suffered and the terrible disillusion which our ideals of civilised life have suffered at the hands of Germany. It is difficult even for some of the most humane people in the country to believe that in spite of her ruthless methods of warfare there are still kind hearts and reasonable minds among her citizens, with whom it will be possible for us to find points of agreement after the war. Here Mr. Bevan is able to give us some reassurance. He is satisfied that a minority exists from whom we differ not in regard to ultimate principles but upon judgments of fact. "If Prof. Troeltsch or Naumann or Deissmann," he writes, "saw the facts of the German invasion of Belgium and North France, the facts of the German methods of warfare as we see them, I do not think their judgment would differ very much from ours; and if we believed the facts of England's action to be what they believe them to be, I do not think our judgment in England would differ very much from theirs. And there are no doubt a great multitude of people now our enemies of whom the same might be said." We fear, however, that this admission does not carry us very far in present circumstances, for Mr. Bevan does not claim, just because he would like it to be so, that this higher mind is present in any effective way in more than a small minority, or that we can treat it as a significant factor in the political situation. The breadth of his sympathies and his sensitiveness to the presence of goodness never blind him to the terrible menace of the average temper of the German people to common ideals of freedom and justice and a real partnership of the nations.

The other danger against which this book puts us on our guard is of even greater importance in view of the practical needs of the moment. Many of us are disposed to clutch at any phrase in a German newspaper or a semi-official announcement of policy, which seems to agree with our own aims, without taking the trouble to ask whether the agreement is really as close as we should like it to be, and can be accepted as a satisfactory basis for negotiation. Against this kind of superficial inference Mr. Bevan's whole discussion of the political situation in Germany is an impressive warning. In Germany itself there is a sharp divergence of opinion about the method in which war aims are to be satisfied, but there is practical unanimity that whatever happens Germany is to grow stronger at the expense of her neighbours. Thus it is possible for the "Mittel-Europa" party to announce with a great show of reasonableness that they have no designs upon Belgium and Northern France, because their scheme of expansion is eastward and in order to reduce Great Britain to a second-rate power they attach more importance to the Suez Canal than to Antwerp and the Channel ports. A broad survey of German aims as they are disclosed to us in books and the press and official documents, and in these pages we have such a survey written with a fairness of mind which it is impossible to praise too highly, leaves the impression that Germany's right to dominate is still accepted as axiomatic. Meanwhile from motives of prudence the German Government refuses to commit itself to any of the conflicting policies of expansion. It is, as Mr. Bevan says, waiting upon events.

> It is prepared [he writes] to get out of the war as much as ever it can. But its fuller knowledge of the military and international situation causes it to realise, as the Jingoes do not, how restricted the possibilities may be. If circumstances turned out such as to allow it to annex or to exact indemnities, there is little doubt that it would come into line with the Jingoes in this matter as it did in that of submarine warfare. If, on the other hand, it becomes obvious that annexations and indemnities are impossible it will make it appear that it had all along agreed with Scheidemann. And till decisive events take place in the military field, it continues to safeguard its liberty of action by a Delphic ambiguity. It is not by negotiations on the basis of the present war-map, but by the pressure of military events, that the German Government will be induced to set its seal to such a peace as may secure the tranquillity of the world in days to come.

It will be seen that with a mind deeply anxious for peace and predisposed to favourable judgments, where such judgments are possible, Mr. Bevan is convinced that the war must go on to a decisive issue. He sees no other possible cure for the German malady which is afflicting the world. In a singularly well-balanced chapter at the close of his book he discusses the question of future security against the German peril. That peril consists of two things, "Germany's power and Germany's will to use its power to the hurt of its neighbours." Security, he argues, must be found in a proper balance between a reduction of Germany's power of offence and the avoidance of vindictive measures which would keep alive her will to hurt. "We cannot be under any obligation to save Germany from the inevitable consequences of its own action. We can only see to it that we do not aggravate those consequences by any measures which go beyond self-protection. But if we might imperil the peace of the future by considering too exclusively the security to be got by diminishing Germany's power, the peace would be no less imperilled if we stopped short in our work and left Germany still strong enough to try again, and with the will to do so unextinguished." With this statement of the case we are in close agreement. Its firm grasp of the moral issue is as admirable as its political prudence. It leads directly to the following inference:—

> That will is largely fed by self-confidence and hope, and if the war were to end without a real and decisive military defeat for Germany, the Germans might continue to cherish the conviction that they were invincible. So long as that conviction is general in Germany, we may expect the craving for Macht to go on, making Germany still a peril. There is no evidence that the conviction of their invincibility has yet departed from the German people. This again is a psychological fact which it is idle to shut one's eyes to in eagerness to get the war concluded.... 'We are unconquerable (unbesiegbar)'—it is not only Pan-Germans who declare that; you find it affirmed continually with apparently deep conviction, repeated like a sacred formula of the faith, in the organs of 'Moderate' opinion. Till there has been a practical demonstration to the contrary, it would be no good trying to frame conditions of peace.

These are grave words, and they have in them no promise of quick escape from the stern duties in which we are engaged. But, unlike the vague peace talk of our sentimentalists and the wild fury of our jingoes, they are the words of a man who has weighed the evidence and sifted the facts, and thus has done all in his power to form a judgment, which is at once well-balanced, just and humane.

THE LAST ARRIVALS.

On June 7, at nine o'clock in the morning, the last batch of French prisoners from Germany arrived. None have come through for some time, and the excitement was very great. Clarens Station is not a large one, and the prisoners' arrival had not been announced beforehand, but there was a very big crowd nevertheless. Many people were there at 5 o'clock, and we, who only heard the men were coming when fetching our morning bread, did not go up to the station till nearly 9 o'clock, expecting only to look on from afar. Instead of which we got round behind the restaurant where they were to be fed, and were allowed to pass, by a friendly policeman, into an enclosure where we had no business to be, but we had a splendid view of all the proceedings. A hundred and twenty men, this time, who had nearly all been two years and eight months in Germany, and four whole weeks at Constance, never knowing, from hour to hour, if they would be sent on, or sent back to—horrors that we can only guess at! There were not many badly wounded, only one who could not walk, for these were the strong men, men whose physique had enabled them to recover—even in Germany—from what wounds they had had, and had never been in desperate straits enough to be sent to Switzerland with earlier batches. But never yet have we seen a more pathetic arrival. Crushed! Woe-begone! Utterly downcast! Not merely haggard, unshaven, dirty and ragged. Those things we are well used to, but from these men, as one by one they filed between the crowds from the train into the enclosure, there was never a smile, never a response, no lighting up at the enthusiastic shouts of "Vive la France!" In crushed silence they moved where they were bidden, and we felt we were looking upon a woe no present hope could reach or touch. Only one man turned his unsmiling eyes to the crowd, and cried hoarsely "Vive la Suisse!" but his solitary response made his fellows all the more pathetically silent. There was something unutterable in all those eyes, not madness, but something awful not very far removed from it. They moved and stared in a dazed way, wearily obeyed orders, and received kindness with an expression of "What next!" on their sunken faces that made us realise the horrors they have lived through in Germany more vividly than ever before. Many of the spectators wept to see them, even while the band (of interned French and Belgians already here) crashed out the Marseillaise, and people shouted, and flags were waving.

Two little scenes immediately before us were heartrending in their simplicity. A tall young Frenchman with a scarred face who was playing the cymbals in the band caught sight of a comrade in the silent procession, and clashing his cymbals wildly over his head, threw them away, and flung himself upon his friend, regardless of the triumphal march in which he was taking part. Then an elderly interné had been waiting near us with unconcealed impatience, and at last, when another burly elderly Frenchman appeared amongst the arrivals, he seized him in his arms, and the two old fellows kissed and kissed and wept, regardless of all spectators, who sympathetically wept too. They were all taken in to the usual breakfast and reception, their "baggages" deposited in piles in the enclosure. Oh! such pathetic possessions! Old bundles, old bursting bags, calico shirts tied up with cord! When breakfast and speeches were over, the men came back to the enclosure. The Swiss officer in command had told them that across the lake the mountains were their own France, and one after another they came, and gazed, and gazed, without a word. There was one adjutant whose eyes were tragic, and I think his expression as he looked at France will haunt me all my life. Unutterable sorrow, unutterable homesickness! Never had we so realised what two years and eight months' brutality will do to a man's soul! Many of the men were ill with fatigue and the Swiss officers hurried through formalities to get them sent off to their final destinations. The roll-call was held, and they were divided into groups and marched away. We went back to the garden, where birds were singing, roses smelling, breezes sweet with the scent of hay, and the nightmare of the war that had been brought so vividly again to our very doors seemed more than ever ghastly and un-Christian.

THE RELIGION OF THE FUTURE.

To the Editor of The Inquirer.

Sir,—Because I believe that speculations on the religion of the future should be founded on accurate knowledge of the religion of the past I feel obliged to question some statements made by Mr. P. E. Vizard. We are told that "up to little more than two centuries ago, the whole nation attended religious services." Two centuries ago takes us to the year 1717. It was a period of religious apathy and stagnation. Instead of the whole nation attending religious services the masses of the people were almost utterly neglected, and when Methodism arose, a few years later, large centres of population had been reduced to a state of heathenism.

From 1717 back to 1559, when the first Act of Uniformity was passed, inflicting a fine on all who absented themselves from church on Sundays and Holy Days without just cause, is a very long step, and I am inclined to think Mr. Vizard exaggerates its effect. It was chiefly used against avowed Nonconformists and Roman Catholics, and at no time forced the whole nation to attend religious services.

Mr. Vizard's attitude to religion appears to be expressed in his criticism of the Collect for the second Sunday in Lent: "Almighty God, who seest that we have no power of ourselves to help ourselves," &c. He says: "We formally repeat these words, knowing full well that all the help we are likely to get can only come from ourselves, and if we do not supply it no outside power will." This is not the confession of great and holy souls. The mightiest soul in history said: "I can of mine own self do nothing." St. Paul said: "Our sufficiency is of God." This is no trivial matter, for dark, indeed, will be the prospect for the religion of the future, if men are taught to despise and ignore the operation of the Holy Spirit.—Yours, &c.,

Clement E. Pike.

MEMORIAL NOTICE.

SECOND-LIEUT. K. GARRY.

We regret to record the death, from wounds, at a hospital in France, of Second-Lieut. Kenneth Garry, Northumberland Fusiliers, only son of Mrs. Garry, of St. John's Square, Wakefield. Mr. Garry, who was 24 years of age, was educated at Epworth College, Rhyl, and under his uncle, Mr. H. T. Facon, at Nottingham. On leaving school, he joined the staff of the Alliance Assurance Company. In August, 1915, he left the Southampton office of the company to enlist in the Infantry Battalion of the Honourable Artillery Company. After a few months of service with that battalion in France, he received his commission in the Northumberland Fusiliers. The Rev. A. R. Andreae, during whose ministry he was connected with the Church of the Saviour, Southampton, writes of him: "Kenneth Garry was a good friend and a delightful companion, straight, sincere, and simple, of considerable ability and rich in interests. His kind and generous heart won him the regard and affection of all in our Church at Southampton. In the twelve months before he joined up he lived in a caravan in a friend's grounds some miles out of town, and it was a constant joy to see him bubbling with pleasure as he struggled with the queer problems and tasted the peaceful charms of an unconventional life. Garry's van was a centre of gaiety for the young folk and a tonic for their elders. He had obligations and ties which made it very hard for him to join up. The whole idea of war was repugnant to him and military life had no romance for him. He hated the necessity which forced the duty upon him, but he went at the first possible moment, and, for the sake of those dear to him, went as cheerfully as might be. Those who knew him and his family best, know best how much he has given that we might be saved. In our unworthiness, the one comfort is that the sacrifice is not for us, after all, but for an idea and a future."

MEETINGS AND GENERAL NEWS.

BELGIAN HOSPITAL FUND.

The Belgian Hospital Fund is registered by the London County Council, under the provisions of Section I. of the War Charities Act, 1916.

The objects of the Fund are: (1) To aid the Belgian hospitals and convalescent depots in France, and the Belgian military doctors at the Front in Belgium. (2) To maintain a Civil Hospice at Calais. (3) To aid the Belgian School Colonies in France.

WEEKLY NOTES.

"Baby Week" is just over in England, but I hope our friends will not forget the needs of the Belgian babies we have taken under our care at Calais. I hope soon to have some photos of the wards, which I shall be glad to distribute to those interested. Photos have come this week of the hut we put up for the orphan boys at the Colonie Scolaire at Wisques. Written in large letters right across the side of the Hut are the words "Bien Charitables Anglais, les Petits orphelins vous disent: Merci."

I have received £25 towards the motor cycle for the doctor mentioned a fortnight ago. I find the greatest difficulty in getting a cycle, as it must be a very strong make, and of a kind of which it is easy to obtain spare parts, such as the B.S.A. If any motor cycle riders can help me by telling me of a suitable second-hand machine, I should be grateful.

The Canteen run by English ladies for the invalids at the Convalescent Depot at Camp du Ruchard has been removed to Soligny, as Ruchard is now given up. The Directrice asks me for a set of croquet, bagatelle boards, and bowls, as most of the games they had are completely worn out after nearly two years' constant use, and then a move! The men are all "nervous" patients, and games, especially out of door ones, are particularly valuable in enabling them to regain their mental poise.

List of special wants the same as before.

To be sold for the benefit of the Fund, grey knitting wool, 4s. 6d. a lb., carriage free. Apply to Mrs. Allen.

The name and address of sender and list of contents should be enclosed in each parcel.

Contributions of money and clothing should be sent to Mrs. Bernard Allen, 14 Gainsborough Gardens, Hampstead, N.W.3.

PRESBYTERIAN COLLEGE, CARMARTHEN.

ANNUAL ADDRESS BY DR. DAWES HICKS.

The Session was brought to a close on Thursday afternoon, June 21, when the prizes were distributed amongst the successful candidates by Miss Clennell of London. The chair was occupied by Dr. Dawes Hicks, Professor of Philosophy in the University of London. He was supported by the Rev. W. G. Tarrant, B.A., of Wandsworth, one of his colleagues on the Presbyterian Board, and by Mr. G. H. Clennell, the Secretary.

The Chairman, after referring in some detail to the work of the students, delivered an impressive address, from which with our limited space we can only quote the closing section:—

There is nothing, so far as I can see, that can excuse or palliate the criminal guilt of those, whoever they may be, who are really responsible for the occurrence of this war. Get behind its immediate causes, do what you will to prove its inevitableness, make the best of its justifications, try your hardest to mitigate its horrors, and the actual letting loose upon us of the weapons of destruction still remains an infamous act of treason against our common humanity—an act of treason more unspeakable and appalling, far, than the worst tyrants of former ages ever managed to perpetrate. And what it would involve must have been, to a large extent, obvious to those who plunged us into the hideous business. They could not but have foreseen that the most they could ever hope to gain from it would be but a pitiable recompense for the terrible damage to civilisation it was bound to entail. They cannot now arrest the malignant forces they have released from restraint; the evil they have done to mankind it is beyond their power to retrieve. For them there is no place of repentance though they seek it carefully with tears. Most assuredly, then, if these men ever cherished an ideal even of patriotism, that they have betrayed it cannot be questioned: the "unpardonable sin" lies on their conscience—the sin "against the Holy Spirit."

Of argument, surely, none is needed to bring home to us the enormity of the crime. Has it not been borne in upon you during the last few weeks how the serene grandeur and peaceful solemnity of the process of creation has been throwing into vivid relief the ugly and frightful devastation that is being wrought by the hand of man? Men are engaged upon destroying all that God is here working to produce. We have been passing through a late spring and early summer so beautiful as almost to defy description. Never have "the splendour in the grass and glory in the flower" been more conspicuously displayed. The sweet light of each returning dawn, the fading effulgence of the setting sun, the mantle of loveliness which invests earth and sea and sky—these have all been spread around us in rich profusion. Nature herself—Nature,

> Who never negligently yet
> Fashioned an April violet,
> Nor would forgive, did June disclose > Unceremoniously the rose —seems to have done her best to make us realise the madness of the folly which is turning her wondrous agencies into engines of destruction. Gradually and by the labour of centuries we have reached the stage of being able to interpret her ceaseless flow of life and energy. We have come to find in every minute organism, in every trembling leaf, in every fragile flower, the manifestation of a law, an order, a teleology that transports us into the very presence of a divine intelligence. Gradually and by the labour of centuries we have learnt to take nature into our confidence, until we have become masters of the pathway of the seas, won dominion over the air, are able to stem the ravages of disease, and to employ the invisible forces of the universe as instruments of our will. And suddenly all our science, all our knowledge, all our wealth, both intellectual and material, are being diverted from their beneficent purpose; physicists are busy inventing swifter aircraft, chemists are devising more deadly explosives, and almost every one who can is scheming fresh means whereby to slay and kill. Talk as you will about Nature being "careful of the type," and "careless of the single life," yet the contrast between her ways and ours at this time is vast enough to awaken in our souls some approximate estimate of the evil that is happening.

In the midst, then, of a crisis when it is not too much to say that civilisation itself is upon its trial, you, gentlemen, are going forth to be the bearers of the Christian Gospel to a world thus lacerated and torn by reason of treason and unfaithfulness to the spirit of man. You need not to be reminded that the Master to whom your allegiance has been given was no mere representative of national pride, but the revealer of human brotherhood in the widest and most comprehensive sense of the word. The Kingdom of which he announced the coming was to have no territorial boundaries; it implied the establishment of a moral community in which love and charity should bind together in fraternal fellowship men of all nations. By the irony of fate, he who was destined to become the greatest inspirer of the human centuries, himself fell a victim to the fury of a fanatical exclusiveness such as is once more blinding the eyes and hardening the hearts of men. Yet he gave his life as a ransom for many; and his crucifixion has meant for the world a transformation such as would not have been effected had that treason-wrong not have been done. Can you, then, whose aim it will be to follow so far as may be in his footsteps—can you, in some slight measure, repeat in your lives his function of a redeemer, and carry on the work he initiated by contributing your humble share towards the creation of that good which shall be the community's atonement for the treason by which certain of its members have darkened the beginning of the twentieth century of Christendom? Such, as I conceive it, is the sort of question which he who is assuming the yoke of Christ may well put to himself at this hour.

I am no prophet, but I venture to predict that your opportunities will be great. With all its frightfulness, the war has been, in one sense, a tremendous purgative; it has cleared away much of the dust that was tending to falsify our view of contemporary human life. It has revealed capacities of heroism and self-sacrifice we should hardly have dared previously to trust to or reckon upon. Those who feared—and there were many who did—that the old spirit of unselfish devotion to disinterested ends was dying out amongst us have at least discovered the fear to be groundless. That the youth of our own or of any other country have been induced to face the unparalleled hardships and dangers of the modern battlefield merely by a craving for excitement, by the love of adventure, or by the animal instinct of pugnacity, is a contention which it is impossible to sustain. All these things may have had, and I doubt not have had, their influence. But it is idle to insist that motives such as these have been the motives which have fired the courage and fixed the determination of the men who form the large majority of the citizen armies now contending with each other. The Asquiths, the Rupert Brookes, the Sorleys, the Pringle-Pattisons, the Lodges, and the thousands like them, who have laid down their lives at the call of duty, did not meet their deaths under the sway of impulses of that kind. No; in the spiritual as in the physical world there is such a thing as latent or potential energy, force that is more or less locked up and unapparent until conditions present themselves that call for its manifestation. And then, when the hour of emergency has come, an access of hitherto undeveloped power seems to accrue to men. Given the moment that demands high moral fortitude and strenuous exertion, and we get strange and unexpected revelations of the nobility of human character.

Yes; but revelations of that sort are now daily and hourly occurring as almost ordinary events which are naturally to be expected. Now, you have had demonstrated in a manner that admits of no question the inner depths of dignity and strength which the souls to whom your appeal will be made contain. The uneventful lives they had formerly lived, the commonplace routine of every-day experience, had hidden more or less from view their spiritual power, but now you know that it is there. What, then, can you make of it in the great work of social and moral reconstruction that will sooner or later await us with all its magnitude and imperativeness? Can you keep it alive, can you keep it operative, for the purpose of undertaking and effecting perhaps the most tremendous task which humanity has ever had to face? Can you convince those that return from the front and from the factories and munition-works that the ideals to be realised, the deeds to be accomplished, the ends to be reached, here in the home-land, and along the peaceful ways of human existence, will really need all the heroism, all the self-sacrifice, all the devotion, that is now being exhibited so plentifully in the trenches, or wherever the strife for victory is being pursued? If, in any slight degree you can help to do that—if by your own enthusiasm for the cause of truth and righteousness, by the persuasiveness of your plea for it, by the zest with which you are serving it, you can keep alive the living flame to which I have alluded, and direct it along the roads where it will be a means of sweetening and purifying and elevating the England that is to be—then, veritably, you will be offering atonement for the unpardonable sin, then you will have contributed your mite towards the creation of a new good that would not have been had this wrong not been done.

How supreme, then, the responsibility resting upon those who are to be the guardians of the Christian hope in this grave epoch of our history! There is a very real and very threatening danger that when the stress and strain of this war is over it will be followed, as has so often been the case after other wars, by a period of reaction, when a feeling of apathy will supervene, and a new generation will grow up, listless and enfeebled, under the shadow of a cloud of exhaustion and impoverishment. Do you strive with might and main to avert a disaster like that. It would mean a deterioration which would be fatal to the progress of our race. Brave and dauntless men have served the Church in the ages of the past. But let those who would serve it in our day call on the gracious God to help them now! More than ever before is it necessary that their word should be with power, their message true, their vision clear, their gospel convincing. Be you, then, through and through sincere, of single aim and steadfast purpose, and pray that in these hard times it may be granted you to utter the prophet's call and to keep your eyes fixed upon the goal of the reign of Heaven upon Earth:—

> God give us men! A time like this demands
> Great hearts, strong minds, true faith and hands!
> Men whom the best of office does not kill:
> Men whom the spoils of office cannot buy:
> Men who have honour, men who will not lie.
> For while the rabble, with their thumb-worn creeds,
> Their large professions, and their little deeds,
> Wrangle in selfish strife, lo! Freedom weeps,
> Wrong rules the land, and waiting Justice sleeps.

The Rev. W. G. Tarrant said that in the absence of the Rev. W. Wooding he had had to examine the students in Pastoral Theology. He had, therefore, presented himself to them as an average intelligent member of a congregation wanting to know what they had learned on these subjects. He ventured to think that the more the students of Divinity get into touch with persons and are affected by the mystery of personality the better preachers they will be. One grave danger is in dealing with abstractions. You cannot understand a book until you have understood the man who wrote the book. We shall never understand the meaning of the theology of the Gospel until we understand the Man who preached that message—until we feel that Jesus Christ was a pulsing personality, as full of life as any man to-day. It is an excellent thing to study the life of an author before endeavouring to understand his work.

Mr. Clennell said that he had a letter from Mr. Harold Baily who had been nearly two years in Malta, and who had motored ten thousand miles in that island. He was expecting almost any day to be sent to the Italian front to continue the Red Cross work. He had met in Malta one or two of the Carmarthen students, particularly Mr. Ben Davies and also the Rev. Waldo Lewis. He (Mr. Clennell) understood that Mr. Davies was likely to be sent to Salonika and to receive a commission.

Principal Evans, in thanking the Chairman for having come amongst them at great personal inconvenience to deliver the impressive address which they had heard that day, recalled the numerous occasions on which they had been similarly favoured. There was no College in Wales, nor perhaps out of Wales, that could show so fine a succession of addresses, and it was surely time that they should be given to the world in a collective and permanent form. In the name of the many hundreds who had hung on Dr. Hicks's lips he pressed for their publication—as a first series—to be followed in due time, as he hoped, by another volume in respect of the years to come. He desired to thank him, too, for the sympathy and encouragement which he never failed to offer to the professors and the students. Before proceeding to the more immediate business of the day he had a word to say of another veteran who had rendered yeoman service to the College in his time. He referred to the Rev. T. L. Marshall, the late Secretary of the Presbyterian Board, who had for forty-five years been one of the official Visitors and a central figure at their annual meetings. In his retirement at Exeter—at the age of 95—they were constantly in his thoughts, and his heart, he knew, was with them on that day. Writing to him some weeks ago, he had sent him a few words which he felt he must read: "I have been very ill since the beginning of the year and think the end cannot be long delayed. I hope that the College will long prosper, and that some of the old students, as well as the Principal and Prof. Moore, both of whom I have known so long, will bear me in kindly remembrance as I do them." Many of those who knew him best had by this time passed away, others were hard at work in widely distant localities, a few were present that day. All would desire, he was sure, that a message of sympathy and affection should be sent to Mr. Marshall from that meeting in acknowledgment of his touching remarks, and he would venture to see that it was done.

Prof. Moore joined in the request to the Chairman to publish the series of addresses which he had delivered at the College. He felt sure that there was not one of the students who would not give an account of himself in the serious work of life—in the Christian ministry.

After short speeches by Prof. Owen, Prof. Oliver Stephens, and the Rev. Rees Griffiths the Rev. J. Stephens closed the meeting with prayer.

The following letter from the Rev. T. L. Marshall has been received by the Principal in acknowledgment of the message referred to above:—

Dear Old Friend,—I am very much gratified by the telegram I have just received, conveying "sympathy and affection from the company assembled at the Presbyterian College on Prize-day." It is seventeen years since I visited the College as Secretary of the Presbyterian Board, and I have pleasant remembrances of the numerous friends I made there. There are many old students who have not forgotten their old examiner, and the portrait of him in the Common Hall will serve to remind them of a friend who in the course of fifty years' connection with the College and the Presbyterian Board has learned to honour and love his Welsh compatriots. With much respect and affection for his old friend the Principal,

I remain,

Always in the bonds of brotherhood,

Yours,

T. L. Marshall.

UNITARIAN HOME MISSIONARY COLLEGE.

The Annual Meeting took place on Tuesday, June 26. The examination of the students took place privately on Monday and Tuesday, the visitor being the Rev. W. G. Tarrant, B.A. On Tuesday afternoon the subscribers and friends of the College were invited to the public examination, when replies, written during the session, were read by the students.

At 5 o'clock the chair was occupied by the President, the Rev. A. Gordon, M.A., who was supported by the Principal (the Rev. S. H. Mellone, M.A., D.Sc.), the Warden (the Rev. H. McLachlan, M.A., B.D.), the Visitor (the Rev. A. W. Fox, M.A., Examiner for Gaskell Scholarship and Harry Rawson Prize), the Rev. G. A. Payne and Mr. D. A. Little (Hon. Secretaries), the Rev. Dendy Agate, the Rev. J. H. Bibby, Mr. F. W. Monks, J.P., Chairman of College Committee, Mrs. Mellone, Mrs. McLachlan, Miss Thomas, Miss K. Winser, Mrs. Woodhouse, Mrs. Little, Miss Redfern, Mr. J. Hall Brooks, Mr. John Taylor-Jones, Mr. J. O. Kerfoot, J.P., and a large number of ministers.

The Visitor congratulated the staff and students on having completed a most creditable session's work. There was need for the ministry at the present time—a ministry of usefulness in many directions—but there was need also of the student, for if ever the student were needed in the community he was needed now. The minister must also be prepared to afford guidance to distracted souls.

The Principal, in announcing the awards made, referred to the decision recently arrived at by the College Committee to suspend the academic work for the duration of the war. He said that arrangements were being made for the College to remain open, and to be used in a variety of ways which would make it of the greatest use to the churches. The Sharpe Prize (£10) was divided, the order being: (1) Mr. G. R. Jones, B.Sc.; (2) Mr. W. Murray; (3) Mr. C. Smith. The Harry Rawson Prize (£5 5*s.*) divided between: (1) Mr. W. Murray; (2) Mr. C. Smith. The Millson Prize (£2 2*s.*) and the Bibby Prize for Greek (£3) were awarded to Mr. Murray. The students who were leaving the College for the work of the ministry and who received their certificates were Mr. Charles Smith, who goes to Nelson, and Mr. Jones.

The President expressed great pleasure at seeing so many friends present at the meetings, and trusted that full use would be made of the College by ministers, teachers, laymen and laywomen, and by the churches generally, and called upon Mr. Monks, who, he said, was the most hard-working member of the Committee, to speak on behalf of his colleagues.

Mr. Monks referred to the loss they had all sustained in the death of Mr. J. R. Beard, whose father had founded the College, and said that the decisions which had been announced had not been arrived at without long, careful, and anxious consideration.

At the close of the proceedings tea was provided at Summerville, and in the evening the Valedictory Service was conducted by the Rev. J. M. Lloyd Thomas in Cross Street Chapel.

Mr. G. Randall Jones, B.Sc., one of the out-going students, has passed the B.D. examination in all five subjects, and has been awarded the post-graduate scholarship by the University.

THE MINISTERIAL FELLOWSHIP.

The Annual Meeting was held in the Memorial Hall, Manchester, on Wednesday, June 27, forty-one members being present. The Rev. Dr. Mellone, President, occupied the chair. Ten new members were elected, making a total of 237. The Annual Report and Accounts, which were deemed most satisfactory, were adopted. The investments now represent an outlay of £1,025 4*s.* 6*d.* The Rev. J. Collins Odgers was elected President. The Treasurer, the Rev. Dendy Agate, and the Secretary, the Rev. C. J. Street, who have held office for eighteen years, were reappointed. The Rev. W. Jellie was re-elected Secretary of the War Service Committee, with a place upon the Committee of the Fellowship, along with the Revs. J. C. Hirst, S. H. Mellone, and R. F. Rattray, who were chosen to fill vacancies. Mr. A. E. Piggott and the Rev. H. E. Haycock were appointed as Auditors. A resolution of sympathy in consequence of the death of two members, and the illness of four others, was passed, and a greeting was sent to five of the members who are on active service in the army. The delegates of the Ministerial Settlements Board, the Joint Committee for the Revision of the List of Ministers, and the Committee on the Supply of Ministers presented their Report and were re-elected. A number of grants was made from the Benevolent Fund.

UNITARIAN HISTORICAL SOCIETY.

A meeting in connection with this Society was held in the Memorial Hall, Manchester, on June 27, when a paper was read by the Rev. Herbert McLachlan, M.A., on the 'Unitarian Methodists of Rossendale.' In the absence of Mr. Warren, the President, the chair was taken by Mr. Francis Nicholson, F.Z.S. The lecturer gave an interesting account of the origin and development of the Unitarian Methodist movement in Rochdale, Padiham, the Rossendale Valley, and adjacent parts. He spoke of Joseph Cooke, the founder of the movement—hence the name "Cookeites" by which the members were sometimes known—and of the leaders John Ashworth, James Pollard, John Robinson, James Wilkinson, John Fielden, and others. He had been successful in identifying the various farmhouses and buildings used as preaching-stations mentioned on the early preachers' plans. At one of these John Bright made his maiden speech. On the motion of the Rev. W. R. Shanks, seconded by Mr. Albert Nicholson, a cordial vote of thanks was given to the lecturer.

The Rev. C. J. Street has just received through Miss Van Eck, of Holland, a letter from his old college friend, the Rev. Dr. Boros, dated May 4, in which the following passages of general interest appear:—

In spite of all the hard expressions used by combatants against each other, I am sure that people are not so bad, and not so angry as they show. As for myself, I hear almost every day the question put to me: "Well, then, are you still admiring the English, and do you wish to keep up contact with them?" My answer was very short. I never did care much for their high politics, but their diplomacy is admirable from their own point of view. Of one thing I feel sure, that those who knew us, and really took an interest in our inner affairs will be the same after the war also; nay, I may suggest that we all shall have learnt a good lesson out of this tremendous bloodshed, viz., that henceforth we shall have to feel a more sincere and deep respect for human life. There is no doubt about it that all of us have suffered a great deal, perhaps more than during our whole lifetime. I am sure I shall never recover from that heartsickening intercourse I have had with our Szekler refugees, my own brothers and sisters and fellow believers. I think that three peaceful years could not have made me as grey as I became during the six months since September, but, thank God, all is over now. My present new business is to register our widows and orphans, and I am preparing an orphanage at Torda, where our gymnasium High School was given up. This month I shall act as Superintendent at the Matriculation in Szekely Keresztur, and from there I go to see some of the congregation in those places where the Roumanian invasion took place. On the whole we get good and promising news from those country places.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Birmingham: Small Heath.—A Public Recognition Meeting took place on Wednesday, June 20, to welcome the Rev. Arnold H. Lewis, B.D., as the pastor of Waverley Road Church. The meeting was preceded by a short devotional service conducted by the Rev. Lawrence Clare, minister of the Church of the Messiah, Birmingham. The chair was occupied by the Rev. J. M. Lloyd Thomas, President of the Midland Christian Union, who offered Mr. Lewis a hearty welcome to a pulpit among the Free Churches of the Midlands. Mr. W. H. Nightingale extended the hand of fellowship on behalf of the congregation. The Rev. L. Clare made an eloquent appeal to the meeting, pointing out the necessity for them to do their share, by co-operating with the new minister to make his work a success. The Rev. Robert Lewis came to give a father's blessing, hoping the most cordial relationship would exist between his son and the congregation. Mr. Byng Kenrick emphasised the importance of the layman's duties in the Church's welfare: and a link with Mr. Lewis's previous congregation at Pendleton was supplied by Mr. J. Partington, who called upon them to note the fine qualities of their new leader's preaching and to value the sincerity of his friendship. Mr. Lewis received his preparation for the Ministry at Regent's Park Baptist College, London. He held the Baptist pastorates of Blockley, Worcestershire, 1907-1910, and Long Buckby, Northamptonshire, 1910-1913; was Secretary of the Northamptonshire Federation of Free Church Councils, 1912-1913, and Minister of Pendleton Free Church, 1913-1917.

London: Hampstead.—The Rev. Henry Gow is giving a series of addresses on 'Reconstruction after the War' at Rosslyn Hill Chapel on Sunday evenings during July. Last Sunday he spoke on 'Certainties and Uncertainties'; subsequent addresses will deal with ethical, social and religious reconstruction, concluding with 'Reconstruction in Church Worship and in Church Fellowship."

The Midland Sunday School Association.—The quarterly meeting of the Association was held at the Warley Institutional Church on June 23. The Committee are pleased to note that the interest in these meetings is as well maintained as in pre-war days, the number present on this occasion being about fifty. An excellent address was given by Prof. H. G. Wood, M.A. (Warden of Woodbrooke Settlement). His chief point was the necessity of enforcing in religious teaching a right idea of God, as manifested in living experience.

Mottram.—The Rev. H. B. Smith commenced his ministry at the Unitarian Church on Sunday, June 1.

Northampton.—The Sunday School Anniversary was held last Sunday, when three services were conducted by the Rev. W. C. Hall. In the evening Mr. Hall announced that a Garden Sale promoted by the ladies of the congregation and held on June 28 had been most successful; also that the effort of the congregation to discharge a deficit of £145 accumulated during the war had in four months realised £133 in contributions from members. A very beautifully illuminated Roll of Honour, designed and executed by Mr. T. C. H. Edwards, one of the wardens, has been presented by him to the Church. The work has occupied many months of his leisure time. It contains the names of forty-one of our young men who have gone into military service directly from the Church.

The Workers' Educational Association has just issued a full report of the National Conference on Educational Reconstruction held at the Central Hall, Westminster, on May 3. This Conference was composed of between 700 and 800 delegates, drawn mainly from working class organisations, but also largely representative of the Teaching Profession, Educational Associations, and Local Education Authorities. The programme placed before the Conference was most comprehensive, and laid down the broad principles for the reconstruction of our educational system. The discussion throughout was keen (at times vigorous), and during the day some important amendments to the resolutions as proposed were carried. The resolutions are reprinted on pages 53-55. From pages 56-74 there is a complete list of the delegates present. The pamphlet may be ordered from the Central Office of the W. E. A., 14 Red Lion Square, Holborn, W.C., price 3*d*., or 4*d*. post free.

The congregation of the City Temple agreed, on the suggestion of the minister, Dr. Fort Newton, last Sunday morning, to send a message of sympathy and affection to Dr. Hunter in his long illness. Mr. W. M. Dabbs, hon. treasurer, spoke in appreciative terms of Dr. Hunter's work and influence, of which most of those present, he said, probably had personal experience.

In order to celebrate the centenary of the birth of Henry D. Thoreau, it has been arranged to hold a meeting at the Caxton Hall, Westminster, on the evening of July 12. The Chair will be taken at 8 P.M. by Sir John L. Otter, J.P., and short addresses will be given by various speakers. Admirers of Thoreau's writings are invited to be present.

The Rev. Dr. S. H. Mellone, Principal of the Unitarian Home Missionary College, Manchester, is now in London, and will be engaged for some months to come in connection with the Geographical and Historical section of the Admiralty Intelligence Department. This will give some of our London congregations an opportunity of hearing Dr. Mellone preach. Next Sunday morning, July 8th, he will conduct the service at Effra Road, Brixton.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

The address for our Belgian Hospital Fund, to which cheques and parcels of clothing should be sent, is Mrs. Bernard Allen, 14 Gainsborough Gardens, Hampstead, N.W.3.

ONCE again on the Fourteenth of July we salute glorious France, our ally in war and our friend in peace. No person of education needs to be reminded of what we owe to the French mind in art, in political thought, and in the world of letters. The strong international ties which are being cemented by our common sacrifices for freedom and the other hardly won treasures of our civilisation are among the spiritual compensations of the war. It is in them that many of us see the surest hope for the future of the world. Not long ago M. Paul Loyson, speaking of the better understanding between England and France, said that we have got to turn the "mariage de convenance," which has already taken place, into a "mariage d'amour." It is to this task that we must devote whatever gifts of intelligence and imagination we possess, for the enrichment of our own life and in gratitude for all we owe to France.

MR. S. P. ILLINGWORTH, the director general of the French Red Cross in our own country, has written to the press in order to point out one very practical way in which we can help France in her time of need. She has suffered with a noble courage to an extent which it is difficult for us even to conceive. "I have just returned from a visit along the French front from Verdun to Reims [he writes], where I have been inspecting our ambulance convoys, canteens, and hospital units, all of which are doing wonderful work there. The first part of my journey was along the battle line of the Marne. It is one long trail of destruction; farms, hamlets, villages, and towns, mere heaps of ruins; the fields are thickly scattered with graves, single and by the hundreds, sad tokens of the heroic struggle which enabled France to hurl back the common enemy and hold him until Britain, and now America, could organise their forces for the final victory." The need of help for these hospital units is urgent. Knowing as we do from personal observation the difficulties with which France is confronted in order to maintain her medical equipment for the army on an adequate scale, we desire to give this appeal our strongest support. The address of the French Red Cross, to which gifts for France's Day may be sent, is 3 Knightsbridge, S.W.1.

WE fear that there is grave danger of the total destruction of the Cathedral of Reims. The Germans seem to be possessed by a special fury against this shrine of the French spirit. Writing on July 3, the special correspondent of The Times gives a terrible picture of the devastation. "The bombardment of the last three months has done far more damage than all the other months of the war put together. In the south wall especially and in the roof of the Choir, above the pile of rubble which marks the site of the high altar, there are wide, gaping chasms where shell after shell has enlarged the same openings, so that the wonder is that in these places the fabric holds together at all. Practically all the beautiful old glass is gone, and the floor of the nave, which looks like a rough road in the making, is thickly strewn with broken and twisted fragments of lead, chips of brilliant coloured glass, and masses of stone and mortar." How incredible it all sounds to any one who saw it three years ago in its radiant beauty, just before the storm burst upon it. In its haunting beauty and its noble strength, it was one of the spiritual treasures of the human race. Its destruction leaves us poorer for ever.

THE air-raid last Saturday has raised a considerable commotion in London. Of course there has been no panic—that is not our way, and life goes on just as usual; but there has been a good deal of frenzied criticism in the press. Some of it, like the fresh outcry for reprisals and the attempt to stampede the Government into giving public warnings, is simply the expression of angry feeling which will soon cool down. On the other hand there has been some temperate but anxious criticism of the speed and efficiency of our methods of defence, which deserves very careful attention. One of the most sensible articles on the subject appeared in The Westminster Gazette. The writer makes the suggestion that a guerilla attack against a German squadron in fighting formation is unlikely to be successful. "London," he says, "could be perfectly covered by two sufficiently powerful battle squadrons if they take the air as squadrons and fight as squadrons." From this point of view it is not so much the number of our machines that matters as the way in which they are handled. But numbers are also of great importance, and the disquieting fact mentioned by Mr. Lloyd George on Monday, that the strike in April last lost us between 150 and 200 machines, must not be overlooked. It is well for us to realise the bitter price which we have to pay for strikes.

TWO contradictory sides of the Russian Revolution have been shown to us this week. We have had a vision of a rejuvenated army and a programme of action, full of excellent promise for the future. On the other hand there has been the strange document in which the Provisional Government dissociates itself from the decision of the Allies to take stern action against King Constantine without the vote of the people. There is no suggestion that under the system of military terrorism a plebiscite of the Greek people was possible; nor is anything said about the duty of the Allied army to guard itself against treachery. If the world is to be governed by abstract phrases without reference to particular circumstances and the judgments of common sense, it is the tyrants who will flourish. On the theory that nobody must touch them without the vote of a free people, they have only to break all the machinery of constitutional government in order to secure themselves in power. The action, to which the Russian Government objects on the ground of "general principles," was the only practical method of restoring to the Greek people some measure of control over their own forms of government.

It is clear that something deeply significant is going on in Germany. Political tension seems to have reached the point at which almost anything may happen. It is natural that all people in this country who have staked their hopes for the future upon the possibility of a German revolution should be deeply interested. But we must avoid the folly of jumping at once to favourable conclusions and of accepting certain political watchwords at their face value, as though they must necessarily mean what we want them to mean. If the more liberal groups succeed in the present struggle the first step may have been taken in the direction which we desire, and consequently our hopes would be brighter than they have been for a considerable time. Beyond this cautious statement wise men will not feel it right to go. The imperfect and heavily censored information which reaches us points to the first mutterings of discontent. We cannot accept it at present as evidence of a radical change of heart.

The Lower House of the Convocation of Canterbury dealt with two questions of reform last week, and on the whole came to sensible though by no means revolutionary decisions. The first has reference to the question put to Deacons on the occasion of their ordination regarding their belief in Holy Scripture. At present the question is in these terms: "Do you unfeignedly believe all the Canonical Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments?" After discussion it was decided by a large majority to recommend that the question should be put in the following form: "Do you unfeignedly believe all the Canonical Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments as conveying to us in many parts and in divers manners the revelation of God which is fulfilled in our Lord Jesus Christ?" If it is adopted the change will give some relief to uneasy consciences, but it strikes us as weak and unsatisfactory. Verbal changes introduced into an old formula are of little permanent value when we are face to face with a new world, and men with the gifts of courage and vision are not attracted by them.

The other question referred to the use of the Psalms in public worship. It was agreed to recommend that Psalm lviii. and portions of other Psalms should be omitted as unsuitable. We doubt whether the proposed reform goes far enough, but it is a step in the right direction, for it admits the right of the living Christian conscience to judge the moral value of ancient literature. We say this without wishing to get rid of the visions of judgment, which sometimes repel us by their sternness and make guilty men tremble. Recent events have given a new meaning to many passages in the prophets from which we were inclined to turn away in days of prosperity and ease. But nothing has happened to soften our objection to the vengeful cries of the imprecatory psalms. We do not want to include among the satisfactions of the righteous man that "he shall wash his feet in the blood of the wicked," or to dwell upon this picture of vengeance in our meetings for Christian prayer.

FALSE INFERENCES AND WRONG CONCLUSIONS.

We publish a letter to-day by Dr. James Drummond in which he joins issue with a passage about non-resistance in Mr. G. G. Armstrong's recent presidential address to the Provincial Assembly of Lancashire and Cheshire. We are deeply indebted to him for doing so, as it is a matter upon which he speaks with authority from the point of view both of special knowledge and spiritual judgment. We are most unwilling to revive controversy about a matter upon which most of us have made up our minds long ago, but it is clearly necessary to renew our protest from time to time against the assumption that the pacifist who stands aside is a more genuine Christian than the man who flings himself with ardour into some great conflict in defence of his country and the agreements of civilised life. We might argue with a far greater show of reason that those who will do nothing to vindicate the liberties of the world against insolent aggression, and leave the weak to be the prey of the spoiler, have forfeited their claim to be the helpers of mankind. But let us quote Mr. Armstrong's words before we offer our readers a few comments upon them. Referring to our decision three years ago "that at this stage in our civilisation we must repel force with force," he writes:—

> Many of us said—nurtured as we are in the traditions of sincerity and simplicity—that we would not attempt to say that what we had decided we must do was in consonance with the teaching of Jesus of Nazareth. We had to make up our minds that we must say in grief and humility that in this thing here and now we disagreed with our Master. But, disagreeing on this point, the ethical point of our relation to force, we surely strove all the harder to stem any alienation, any differentiation, in any other direction from the teaching in which we had been nurtured. We held on with all the greater dseperation and determination to the desire to keep something if we might of His spirit in our outlook on the affairs of mankind.

If we may judge from this passage Mr. Armstrong is a disciple of Tolstoy, who is haunted by a sense of his own guilt and deprived by that initial act of unfaithfulness of any strong and kindling energy for the stern duties of this time. He enables us to understand his apologetic tone and the absence of any deep conviction of the splendour of our cause. We do not agree with him. We should esteem ourselves of all men the most miserable if we did. It would be better to go over to the strictest sect of the pacifists than to fight our battles with half our mind. But fortunately we have been saved from this dismal fate, partly we hope by the guidance of the Christian conscience in our own life, but also by our early training and the traditions which move in our blood. When Mr. Armstrong speaks of his decision to support the war as in conflict with the teaching in which he has been nurtured, we wonder whether the memory of the world's great battles for freedom never thrilled his generous youth. One of the early recollections of the present writer is the stories of the heroism of the American Civil War told by one who had served as a chaplain in the field, a man endowed with the mystical passion of St. John who bore the honoured name of Channing. Later came an absorbing interest in Garibaldi and Mazzini and the other heroes of the Italian risorgimento, men who poured out their own lives like water for the sake of the freedom of their country. Are we to look with only half-hearted admiration upon Lincoln and his cause, because it was inconsistent with Christianity to fight for the freedom of the slaves? Would the Italian patriots have been nobler servants of righteousness, if they had been content to write pamphlets about liberty and international ideals while the sword rusted in the scabbard and their country writhed under the Austrian heel? An argument which would land us in conclusions so contrary to moral common sense must be treated with grave suspicion.

We believe that the fallacy, which even moving emotional appeals cannot hide, consists in the attempt to treat Christianity as a catalogue of precepts. That is the position of the narrow, doctrinaire mind. It is the evil legacy which Tolstoy, who was a man of genius, has left to many Christians of this generation that in recovering the moral emphasis of the Gospel they have lost much of its spiritual freedom. To them it is a moral ideal, which can be summed up in certain select phrases of the Sermon on the Mount, rather than a creative spirit which works with practical power amid the real conditions of the world. At a time when we must make critical decisions, which affect the whole future welfare of the society of which we form a part, we may either bind our action by accepted rules of conduct, for which we plead the authority of Jesus Christ, or we may exercise an independent judgment based upon Christian principles and historical knowledge and imaginative insight into the real meaning of the situation. In the latter case alone is living morality involved. No a priori doctrine about non-resistance can save s from the duty of deciding whether in certain particular circumstances it is right for us to use force or not. We live in a world where it is sometimes right and sometimes wrong, and we are traitors to every principle of noble living if we refuse to use it on the right occasion. We have no sense of shame in our present acceptance of the challenge of war, for in company with a vast multitude of good men and women—among them are numbered the noblest and happiest Christians of our land—we are simply following the highest dictates of an instructed conscience. If vital Christianity is in direct conflict with an act of faithfulness of this kind, we are left wondering where its moral power resides that any good man should desire it. We cannot accordingly agree with Mr. Armstrong in the crippling mood of "grief and humility" with which he goes forth to meet his duty. Let him rather rejoice hat in the day of trial he has been kept ithful to the great Captain of all brave nd loyal souls, when less worthy instincts might have led him into the way of barren negation and indelible shame. His attempt to withdraw the august sanctions of Christian faith and affection from some of the noblest decisions of human virtue is a clear case of false inferences and wrong conclusions.

JANE AUSTEN.

Born Dec. 16, 1775. Died July 18, 1817.

Examine well, ye writers, weigh with care
What suits your genius; what your strength can bear. HORACE.

SOME few years ago I made a pilgrimage on a bicycle from Reading to Jane Austen's village of Steventon. The village is still aloof and unobtrusive. It has no public-house. The little church is to be seen. But the parsonage is gone. Here Jane was born and here she lived for twenty-three years. Here was developed that dainty taste in comedy. Here she wrote her first three novels. In the corner of a room where elders were talking and laughing, and youngers romping and shouting. A good nursery for the gentle art of detachment. In 1775, when Jane was born, the great line of male novelists had become extinct. The burly Fielding was a pale shade, Goldsmith had taken cherubic flight, Sterne had doffed his motley for ever. The novel now passed into the hands of women, who made it, as Mr. Collins would say, "consistent with the true delicacy of the female character." Jane was not the first of these. Fanny Burney and Maria Edgeworth were her seniors. In 1778 Fanny Burney published the adventures of that die-away miss, Evelina. It was "extremely quoted" by Johnson, and admired preposterously by Gibbon and Burke. It shows a vigour in describing detached scenes which reminds us of Boswell. The last time I read it I found the Branghtons as deliciously vulgar as ever, but the only people in the book with an elementary idea of truthfulness, and I must confess that I laughed more at the authoress than at her creations. Maria Edgeworth made a magnificent start in 'Castle Rackrent.' A touching bit of pathos, that makes you laugh and cry. But Maria's sense of dutifulness to her meddlesome, didactic father spoilt her work. It was impossible to suppress altogether her rich and rollicking comedy; the flashing epigram, the spice of dare-devilry, the perfume of wit; but, alas—"elle se perd dans votre triste utilité." But Jane Austen in her corner at the parsonage conducted the courtship of philosophy and art, and brought about their union with fine feminine tact. Like Gulliver, she manages Lilliput without taking unfair advantage. She is very quiet and unobtrusive, very kindly, very much interested, very much amused, and very happy. By the time she was 20 she had reached an exact understanding of her powers. She respects her office, but knows it to be that of an entertainer and loves to entertain us. She is almost free from the didactic ardour of the eighteenth century. She can differentiate comedy from realism with just that delicate touch of discretion which Lamb demanded, so that she teaches us to laugh at fools whom but for her we might be so weak as to hate, and to see the vanities and snobberies of the world as a precious addition to "the public stock of harmless pleasure."

Our Jane was nearly 21 when she wrote 'Pride and Prejudice,' a little masterpiece of social comedy, which a publisher refused by return of post. It is generally acclaimed as the best of her novels. I do not know that I think it the best. But it seems to me to have been the most difficult of all the stories to manage. And it is managed with a sureness of touch, and an adroitness and audacity, that are wonderful when we consider that it was the first work, and also the age and experience of the writer. It is full of real wholesome goodness, never forced, but gently pervading the ironic comedy. Hearts are indeed trumps in this delightful love-game. The story centres in the Bennet family. The father is an odd mixture of sarcastic humour, reserve and caprice. The mother is a silly, vulgar woman, whose sole aim is to get her daughters married. Jane, the eldest girl, is as good and beautiful as the most inveterate novel-reader can desire. She is amiable enough to be stupid. But she is not stupid. Elizabeth, the second girl, is the heroine. She is prejudice. She is a very human person, and Jane was brave in making her so. Elizabeth frankly admits that she could not forgive Darcy his pride because it mortified her pride. When she sees Darcy's beautiful home she has some regrets for having refused to marry him. Sir Walter Scott winced at this. But then Sir Walter knew everything except young ladies. The young ladies in his books are drawing-room "touch-me-nots."

The comedy opens with the arrival in the neighbourhood of Bingley and his friend Darcy. Bingley falls in love with Jane. Mrs. Bennet publishes the banns of marriage. Darcy is pride. And pride and prejudice are soon at strife. But all love begins in strife. Darcy is in love with Elizabeth. But he fights against it, repelled by the vulgarity of her mother, the cheap fastness of her sisters, and her commercial relations. There can be nothing quite so delightful as to make a man fall in love with you in such circumstances, and dearest Elizabeth thoroughly enjoys herself. A generous providence adds another delight in the form of a proposal from the Rev. Mr. Collins. Marriage with him will not merely be an honourable estate. It will also convey the priceless privilege of being patronised by Lady Catherine de Bourgh. Only heroines can afford to scorn such advantages. Mr. Collins soon found a candidate for his honours. He goes a-wooing elsewhere. The lady "saw him from an upper window, and set out to meet him accidentally in the lane." Then follows later Darcy's proposal. Borne on the tide of double passion, he pours out to Elizabeth all his love and all his repulsion. Was there ever a proposal at once such an insult and such a compliment? And how perfectly it reveals the innate truthfulness of Darcy's nature, glowing through all his limitations. Is not Jane the perfect mistress of her art here? So Elizabeth's proud refusal, though it looks like the end, is really the beginning of reconciliation. The reconciliation is brought about by Darcy's sudden return when Elizabeth had gone with some relations to look at his house and estate. Again Jane shows her cunning strength in a difficult situation. No wonder that she scorned Mrs. Bennet's attempts at matchmaking, which never soared out of sight of the obvious. The other two books written at Steventon are not up to the standard of the first. 'Northanger Abbey' is a delightful skit on a forgotten romance. And I would as soon go to Bath with Jane Austen as any one. Nor have I ever met any one there more charming than the heroine of this tale. Is Jane quite dispassionate in 'Sense and Sensibility'? I quarrel gently with her. There are admirable things in the book. Mr. and Mrs. Dashwood are flawless satire. But I do not relish this monosyllabic moral. And I am sorry that Marianne found happiness in a colonel who had come to the prose and flannel age. "Sermons and soda-water the day after" may be necessary: they are not glorious.

The last three novels were written in the cottage at Chawton. I have visited this cottage by the pond, and lingered under the tree where Jane is said to have written in summer-time. In general character the last three novels resemble the first three. But the comedy has a sharper edge of satire, and there is a more gracious inclination to sentiment. 'Mansfield Park' is an admirably constructed story. The faculty of composition is at its highest here. The three Miss Wards have made marriages of varying degrees of importance. One has captured a baronet—"even her uncle declared she hardly deserved so much." One, as it is sweetly phrased, "found herself obliged to be attached" to the Rev. Mr. Norris. The third married "to disoblige her family," and did it very thoroughly. The heroine, Fanny Price, comes from the poor home, which is the result of the third marriage, to Mansfield Park, the result of the first. One of the boys champions her in distress, and his chivalry rouses her affection. So the plot is developed. The Crawfords arrive on the scene. Henry Crawford is a brilliant, sociable fellow. His sister is a siren, full of grace and wit, and, as a siren should, plays enchantingly on the harp. Scenes of flirtation and love are delicately manipulated. The theatricals and the sudden arrival of the baronet in the midst of them are comedy and farce blended by a subtle alchemist. I submit to the conclusion, but not without a mild expostulation. Crawford, is, in my opinion, the most fascinating of all Jane's men. The possibilities he reveals when he falls in love with Fanny make me desire their marriage. It would have been a risky proceeding. But what woman would not have preferred a hazard with him to a dull certainty with the stodgy young Bertram? But the inexorable Jane will not countenance such ideas. In 'Emma' we get two delightful women. Emma with her passion for match-making, and Jane Fairfax with a touch of mystery to make her adorable. To Emma's matrimonial schemes for others we are indebted for some rare comedy complications, and such joys for ever as Mr. and Mrs. Elton. Jane Fairfax not only endears to us her divine self, but makes us intimate with Miss Bates. The healthy vivacity of the whole book has perhaps made it the favourite. 'Persuasion' was written in sight of death. It moves in an even smaller sphere than the other novels. It is not so well constructed. But it is a very beautiful work, rich in meditative pathos and humour. It has an autumnal atmosphere, a misty feeling. There is a muffled tone. I love Anne Elliot, the heroine, best of all. She makes a personal appeal. We never see her in the first flash of her love. That is behind, and she moves in its memory, a wistful figure. She is that rarest gift of God, a silent humorist. There are such—as Shakespeare knew. But for the most part, your humorist, like Signor Benedick or Mr. Bernard Shaw, "will still be talking." She is the daughter of Sir William Elliot, whose pride is delineated in a way that might have made Lamb envious. There are two sisters. The stupid letters of one of them are superb masterpieces of fatuousness. They mark the top in the comic, as Hardy's letters of Tess do in the pathetic. In such surroundings the refinement and delicacy of Anne stand out in gentle relief. She merges in the autumnal atmosphere, and the whole makes a perfect piece of sentiment. Thus she persuades her lover back. And thus sense and sensibility are no longer enemies, but meet and kiss, and are to be happy ever after. The fairy godmother's task is done.

CHRIST AND THE USE OF FORCE.

To the Editor of The Inquirer.

Sir,—Mr. George G. Armstrong, in his fine Presidential Address to the Provincial Assembly of Lancashire and Cheshire, uses these words: "Those of us—and I among them—who made up our minds that at this stage in our civilisation we must repel force with force, had to make up our minds, saying that, how we stood to the Founder of our religion. And many of us said—nurtured as we are in the traditions of sincerity and simplicity—that we would not attempt to say that what we had decided we must do was in consonance with the teaching of Jesus of Nazareth. We had to make up our minds that we must say in grief and humility that in this thing here and now we disagreed with our Master." This is tenderly, reverently, and honourably said. But the statement raises such serious questions that it is important to ask where Jesus lays down the doctrine that the State is never to use force. I know of no such doctrine within the pages of the New Testament; and certainly Paul, who, in spite of modern criticism, probably knew more of Christ's teaching than we do, held no such doctrine (see Romans xiii. 1-4). The precept that his disciples individually should not return insult for insult, or blow for blow, seems to me to have no bearing on the question; and it is happily a precept that is now largely observed in civilised communities. I call the question serious, because it is one thing to perceive that in matters of ordinary knowledge Jesus accepted the opinions of his time, and quite another to regard him as an incompetent dreamer in a moral question affecting the very foundations of human society. That he was opposed to a selfish and cruel exercise of force, and to the violent gratification of personal ambition, goes without saying; but on the abstract question of the use of force by the State I cannot find any pronouncement. I hope I am not, in this, violating our "traditions of sincerity and simplicity."—Yours, &c.,

THE RELIGION OF THE FUTURE.

To the Editor of The Inquirer.

Sir,—Mr. Pike criticises my statement that "up to little more than two centuries ago, the whole nation attended religious services." His criticism is sound as regards the "two centuries," but, as regards my main point, quite unimportant. Instead of "two," I ought to have said three or four centuries. My main contention is largely supported by such facts as that in the City of London, one square mile in area, there were, in the sixteenth century, over a hundred parish churches, and the existence in the country of large churches and of abundance of churches in districts where now there is scarcely any population.

Mr. Pike further criticises my objection to such prayers as "Almighty God, who seest that we have no power of ourselves to help ourselves," and my contention that the help we need must come from ourselves and not from some outside source. What I maintain is that the modern attitude as regards prayer is in many respects absolutely different from the old. The present attitude is typified by what God is recorded to have said to the Israelites in Ex. xiv. 15: "Wherefore criest thou unto me? speak unto the children of Israel, that they go forward." Mr. Pike quotes the words of Jesus: "I can of mine own self do nothing." If Jesus were living to-day I suggest he would probably have said: "I can of mine own self do everything." And so now, in our time of trouble, instead of attending meetings for prayer we attend munition and other war works. My critic is quite wrong if he thinks that I "despise or ignore the operation of the Holy Spirit." My contention is that, in view of the religion of the future our "forms" of prayer in many respects need re-forming.—Yours, &c.

P. E. Vizard.

Hampstead.

To the Editor of The Inquirer.

Sir,—The Rev. Clement Pike's statement that the early eighteenth century was a period of religious apathy and stagnation is, of course, in agreement with the usual belief. But the great old Dissenting meeting houses with double galleries date from very much this period, and the hideous great galleries which disfigure so many ancient parish churches appear to have been added at about the same period. Can the two facts be reconciled? Surely the ugly galleries must have met a felt need, or they would at least not have been added to buildings never intended for them, which they disfigure so much.—Yours, &c.,

BOOKS AND REVIEWS.

THE PHARISEES AND THE TEACHING OF JESUS.

Studies in Pharisaism and the Gospels. I. Abrahams, M.A. Cambridge, at the University Press. 6*s.* 6*d.* net.

When Mr. C. G. Montefiore published in 1909 his commentary on the Synoptic Gospels, he held out the prospect of a third volume to be prepared by Dr. Israel Abrahams and to provide an appendix of Rabbinical illustration. The hope then cherished by his readers has been only partially fulfilled; and, after eight years, Dr. Abrahams has decided to publish so much as he has been able to prepare, finding, as he frankly says, that the task originally planned was more than he could accomplish. There is, therefore, no pretence of completeness in the collection of notes and excursus which make up the volume before us, nor would it be fair to treat it as such by attempting a detailed review of its contents. None the less it contains a great deal of most interesting and valuable matter, presented in a studiously moderate and uncontroversial spirit. Dr. Abrahams does not seek to make a case for the Pharisees, but to present with the resources of his wide learning the Pharisaic point of view in regard to various questions raised by the study of the Gospels. The value of these notes and short essays is by no means exhausted by their merits as an appendix to a commentary. It is not at all necessary for the reader to have at hand Mr. Montefiore's two volumes in order to profit by Dr. Abrahams's instruction. Every reader of the Gospels is at a disadvantage in so far as he is unable to understand the Judaism which forms the background of the narrative. There is no need to force a comparison between Pharisaism and Christianity or to justify or demur to the condemnation of the former which has been habitual amongst the advocates of the latter. But it is well to learn, from one who has the first hand knowledge of the subject which only a Jew can have, what kind of ideas the Pharisees actually held upon religious and moral questions; and to realise, as the result of such learning, how much of ordinary human nature there was in them.

This is just what can be learned from Dr. Abrahams's book. Apart from what is said upon particular topics, this seems to me to be the outstanding feature of the book, that which gives to it its greatest value. The Pharisees are so unfavourably presented in the Gospels that the reader who is not familiar with the Rabbinical literature almost inevitably draws the conclusion that Pharisaism must stand condemned on every count. The conclusion is not warranted by the premises, because a great deal of the Pharisaic teaching and practice is not referred to in the Gospels, either for praise or blame. Moreover, it is evident from the Gospels themselves that there was a considerable amount of common ground between the teaching of the Pharisees and the teaching of Jesus. What may be called the fundamentals of Theism were taken for granted on the one side as on the other. There was little difference between them in regard to the chief practical virtues, and the Pharisees had no reasons which would lead them to challenge the Sermon on the Mount, except so far as it might be intended only as temporary till the establishment of the Kingdom.

Upon some of the great questions raised in the Gospels, such as divorce, the Pharisees differed indeed from Jesus, but only as men who set one considered opinion against another considered opinion. There were Pharisees who would agree with him. If Pharisees heard him tell the parable of the Pharisee and the Publican, they would certainly have condemned the former as an unworthy member of the body to which they belonged, assuming that he acted from the motive implied in the parable; and they would have said that the publican did precisely what a true Pharisee would do in such a case.

The differences which sharply divided the Pharisees from Jesus were chiefly two. The one was that he definitely repudiated the form of external precept which they gave to all their teaching, so far as it related to the service of God. The other was that he represented a fresh spiritual impulse in humanity, and they represented one which, though deep and strong, had operated for a long time. It was akin to the opposition between the revolutionary and the upholder of settled government. That is what is indicated in the statement that "he taught as one having authority and not as the Scribes." Neither in regard to the one nor to the other of these grounds of difference was reconciliation possible. The Pharisees had adopted and developed their system of positive precept for reasons which seemed to them good; and they were not prepared to abandon the system in deference to a criticism which they did not admit to be just. That the peculiar form of their teaching had its special dangers, they were well aware, and did their best to guard against them. That they did not always succeed is not wonderful; but they are not alone in this respect, amongst men who have had a high and austere ideal.

The fact that Pharisaism had four centuries of history behind it, since the days of Ezra who founded it, accounts for a good deal of the irreconcilable opposition between the Pharisees and Jesus. It was a case of the new wine and the old wine-skins. The latter could not receive the former, without being destroyed. But that is not to say that the old wine-skins were not best fitted for the old wine, or that the old wine was not worth preserving. Pharisaism had no doubt many of the faults of long establishment, such as always excite the wrath of progressives whether in religion or politics or any other field of thought. Its adherents were not steeped in hypocrisy nor clothed in self-righteousness. Neither did they live at any dizzy height of saintliness. They were men with a very definite purpose of serving God and doing his will amongst their fellow-men; they had a rather restricted outlook upon the world, and felt themselves debarred from some forms of human fellowship, social, intellectual, moral and spiritual. They suffered the consequences of that isolation to an extent perhaps greater than they have realised. But they have tried to be true to a very difficult ideal, one which was exceptionally fitted to expose them to misconstruction and ill will. Their faults, real or supposed, have been dwelt on with more than sufficient eagerness and with much less than sufficient knowledge, ever since the Gospels were written. In these days of change, when old attitudes of mind are reconsidered, it may be possible to realise that even the Pharisees were after all very human; and to find, beneath the unfamiliar form of the Tradition of the Elders, a love to God and man in which Jew and Christian are at one.

'THE HIBBERT JOURNAL.'

The Hibbert Journal for July (London, Williams & Norgate) opens with six articles on Reconstruction. The first, by Prof. James Ward, is his Presidential Address to the Civic and Moral Education League delivered last May. Its subject is 'Personality the Final Aim of Social Eugenics.' Of the others the most startling is the one on 'The New Religion' by the Countess of Warwick, but not the least useful is 'Towns to Live In' by Mr. W. R. Lethaby, because it deals with concrete things over which we can exercise some immediate control. On the subject of public memorials he writes as follows:—"Where funds are small it is wise to spend them on one thing. A great unhewn stone from the nearest source, with just a name and a date in good lettering, would be far more appealing than a monument of the same cost where most of the money has been spent in bringing marble from Italy and granite from Aberdeen, and the rest has been expended in chipping and polishing these into the necropolis mode. The only way, however, in which a successful monument of any sort is likely to be obtained is to ask someone who can best be trusted to get it done; many of our public works have died of too much committee before they were practically begun." Among the other articles we may mention 'Survival and Immortality' by the Dean of St. Paul's, and 'The Theory of Survival in the Light of its Context' by Dr. Jacks. The latter is a Presidential Address to the Society of Psychical Research. Dr. Jacks also contributes a vigorous review of Mr. H. G. Wells's recent book 'God, the Invisible King.' "Mr. Wells," he writes, "has written a very provocative book about the least provocative of subjects—God. It is probable that nobody can write a book about God, or even preach a sermon about Him, without doing violence to something that is essential in the Divine nature: for God is precisely that Being who by no manner of means can be made into public property. He sees and is seen in secret, when we have entered into the inner chamber and shut the door. This our author knows very well, and it is the great merit of the book to betray that he knows it, and to leave a clear impression at the end that he has found God, or rather that God has found him. My conviction of this fundamental fact is not the least impaired by the other, equally strong, conviction that Mr. Wells is philosophically all astray in the account he gives of the Divine Being. However, in presence of the central discovery his philosophical errors matter very little either to himself or to anybody else. And to God, perhaps, they matter not at all."

The first number of the Lawrence House Bulletin has just been issued. It opens with a cordial greeting to each of the 6,000 men belonging to the group of Unitarian and other Liberal Christian Churches who will, if postal arrangements do not miscarry, and information has been received in regard to changes of address or of rank, receive a copy in due course, and full details follow as to the whereabouts of the Hostel, the prices charged for accommodation there, and the purpose which it is intended to serve. Some short articles, including one on 'How we carry on,' some personal paragraphs, the Declaration of Principles in time of war issued by the American Unitarian Association, and some "odds and ends" make up a chatty little periodical of sixteen pages which will bring memories of home to many of the members of our churches and schools who are far away. A picture of Essex Hall and Lawrence House and a photograph group of Unitarians in Malta are among the illustrations.

MEMORIAL NOTICE.

THE REV. E. L. H. THOMAS.

The death of the Rev. E. L. H. Thomas, B.A., minister of Cross Street Chapel, Manchester, which took place on Friday, July 6, removes from the ranks of our ministers a quiet, scholarly preacher and a personality of singular charm and attractiveness. Born in Ceylon in 1859, he was educated for the ministry at the Unitarian Home Missionary College, under the Rev. William Gaskell, at Manchester New College under Dr. Martineau, and, as Hibbert Scholar, at the Universities of Paris and Berlin. He commenced his ministry as missionary at Liverpool, North End, 1890-93, and subsequently served in the ministry at Scarborough, 1893-1900, Dean Row and Styal, 1900-12. Since 1912 he has been at Cross Street Chapel. Possessing wide acquaintance with languages and literature, ancient and modern, Mr. Thomas was endowed with a poetic insight and a prophetic vision. With these rare qualities of mind and heart he united a delicate humour and a literary style, which made his discourses as perfect in form as they were lofty in spirit and powerful in appeal. He was a welcome contributor to the pages of The Inquirer, in 1904 published a small volume of verse 'Hortulus Pastoris,' and in 1907 translated Etienne Giran's 'Jesus of Nazareth.' From 1903-11 he was hon. secretary of the Unitarian Home Missionary College, and, to the last, one of its most energetic officers; more recently he served as a member of the committee of Manchester College, Oxford, and as hon. secretary of the Widows Fund in connection with the Provincial Assembly of Lancashire and Cheshire. Those who were associated with him in administrative labours knew and valued the idealism of his aims and the wisdom of his counsels. Seldom has a minister more completely won the confidence and love of his brethren. A man of peace, he was not at home in a world at war, and felt keenly the misery and anguish induced by the present conflict of nations. To his many friends, his loss is irreparable. It is greatly to be desired that a selection of his sermons be published so as to reveal to the members of our churches generally the wit and wisdom, the lofty aspiration and profound spirituality of one who was, in no conventional sense, a minister of Christ and servant of God. The funeral took place on Wednesday. A service was held at Cross Street Chapel, followed by the interment in the beautiful graveyard attached to Dean Row Chapel.

WEEKLY NOTES.

The following letters received this week are specially interesting:—

From a hospital dug-out.—"Thank you so very much for all the lovely things already received. The air cushions were disinfected and used within an hour of their arrival. On the 21st, during a bombardment a shell fell right before the farm and killed poor young Dr. T—— (the medical student to whom you had already sent a wallet of surgical instruments). They had been bombarding us right and left—dozens of shells fell within a hundred feet of us—then two quite close, only six and twelve yards, and the third right on us. It is awfully sad, as he was a widow's only son and such a nice boy. He was running from his dug-out to help us carry the wounded from the ward to the big operation theatre dug-out. I was there with my wounded when the shell fell three yards from our windows, but fortunately behind, so all the pieces went ahead and we only came in for the dreadful shock and broken glass. I did not budge and kept as calm as if nothing had happened and so was able to keep the men calm till they were able to be carried to the dug-out. Still it has been a nasty shock, but I haven't lost my nerve and am going steadily on. For ten days now shells are flying night and day....The instruments have arrived—the doctors are simply delighted. We can't believe we are so rich! What it will mean to the poor wounded when there is rough work going on! Even 10 minutes gained means a life, or rather the chance of saving one. It is so kind sending me the invalid food too. It will be such a comfort and delicacy for my poor men."

From a doctor to whom we sent a Red Cross satchell a year ago, but at the moment of receiving it he was wounded by a shell, and the satchell utterly destroyed. Since then he has lost his leg, and on returning to service asked us to replace the lost satchell. In acknowledging its receipt he says: "Thank you very much indeed. For the moment, I am having a holiday before rejoining for service at Port Villez, where I am going to work for my brethren in mutilation. I am glad to re-assure you and to tell you that with the loss of my leg, I have not lost my gaiety or joy in life. I am quite convinced that a loss like mine can be so excellently replaced by an artificial leg, that life can still be of the same value, both materially and morally, and is only a little changed in actual fact."

NON-SUBSCRIBING PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH OF IRELAND.

The eighth ordinary meeting of the General Synod of the Non-Subscribing Church of Ireland was held on June 20, in the First Presbyterian Church, the Rev. H. J. Rossington (out-going Moderator) presiding at the opening of the proceedings. In the course of his address Mr. Rossington described the year which had just come to a close as a most eventful one, and referred to the wonderful achievements which had been accomplished by the British army in the Somme offensive, and also in the more recent offensive, which was marked by so many acts of conspicuous gallantry and bravery. The revolution in Russia was, they hoped, an omen of better things for that land and an assurance of increased help to the Allies, while the entry of America into the war, with all her wonderful resources, removed any doubt that might have existed as to the ultimate victory.

On the motion of the Rev. J. A. Kelly, seconded by the Rev. A. O. Ashworth, the Rev. J. H. Bibby (Ballee) was unanimously elected Moderator for the ensuing year. The new Moderator, in taking the chair, expressed his thanks for the honour which had been bestowed upon him. The Revs. G. J. Slipper and J. A. Kelly were re-elected as clerk and treasurer respectively. The following resolution was proposed by the Rev. G. J. Slipper: "We, the members of the Non-Subscribing Presbyterian Church of Ireland, in Synod assembled, desire to re-affirm our confidence in the principles of total prohibition of the drink traffic during the continuance of the war and six months after, and our demand for its adoption. The experience of the last two-and-a-halt years warrants the view we desire to express, viz., that the tremendous shortage of grain, sugar, and other food-stuffs necessitates the safeguarding of the material as well as the moral resources of the nation; and should the Government decide, as has been suggested, to purchase the liquor traffic, we call upon it to embody in any such measure the principle of local option so that the people may have the control of this traffic in their own hands." A lengthy discussion followed, and ultimately the resolution was passed with the addition of the words "with compensation" after the words "total prohibition of the drink traffic." A resolution placing on record the opinion of the Synod that "religion cannot be dissociated from all that pertains to the physical, mental, and moral well-being of the people, and that the problem of the better housing of the people is one of the most practical and urgent to be laid stress upon at the present time," also a resolution expressing loyalty to the King, were passed. In the evening a public meeting was held in the Church. The Rev. J. A. Kelly presided, and delivered an address on 'The Church's Opportunity.' The Rev. H. J. Rossington spoke on 'The Church Militant.'

The annual Sunday School Conference was held on June 2, when about 280 people were present at one of the most interesting and successful gatherings which has been held in recent years. The Moderator occupied the chair, and the service was conducted by the Rev. Alfred Turner. The subject of 'Moral Education' was dealt with in a suggestive manner by Mr. M. W. Robieson, M.A., of Queen's University. A discussion followed in which the Revs. G. L. Phelps, W. G. Anderson, J. G. Davies, E. H. Pickering, K. Dunbar, R. Philipson, Messrs. Gregson and Erskine, and the Chairman took part.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Bristol.—The Rev. W. H. Drummond visited Bristol on July 8 on behalf of the Belgian Hospital Fund. He preached at Clifton in the morning and at the Domestic Mission in the afternoon. In the evening at Lewin's Mead he spoke of the help which the Fund has brought to the Belgian Hospitals, and of his recent work among the Y.M.C.A. huts in France. Collections were taken at the three services on behalf of the Fund.

Chesham, Bury.—At the Unitarian Sunday School Anniversary Services on July 8 the sermons were preached by the Rev. F. Munford of Heywood, and the Rev. John Evans of Rochdale. Excellent music was rendered, under the direction of Mr. Herbert Thompson, and the collection, amounting to £46, exceeded that of last year by £18. Messages of encouragement were received from old scholars at the front.

Coalville.—Members of the Bridge Street congregation are continuing through the summer their Wednesday evening meetings, the average attendance being between twenty and thirty. On June 20 the Rev. H. W. Stephenson, of Loughborough, gave an address on 'Individual Responsibility in a Christian Church.' On July 4 Mr. Stephenson again conducted the service. The speakers were the Rev. W. H. Burgess (Plymouth) and Alderman Wm. Moss, J.P. (Loughborough).

Ditchling.—The anniversary services were held on Sunday, July 1, in ideal summer weather. The preacher was the Rev. Vint Laughland, of Islington. During the day friends were present from London, Bournemouth, Horsham, Dorking, Lewes, and Haywards Heath, a large contingent from Brighton augmenting the evening congregation. The local friends entertained their visitors from a distance with their customary hospitality.

Kendal.—The Rev. C. E. Mercer settled recently as minister at Kendal. He preached to good congregations on July 8 on the occasion of the Sunday School anniversary. On the following evening the summer festival was continued, when the school-room was crowded for a service of song by the children.

London : Lewisham.—A Garden Fête was held here on Saturday last. The air raid affected the attendance, but an enjoyable time was spent by those who were present, including a number of wounded soldiers from the Military Hospital. The programme included entertainments of various kinds. The Kilmorie Road Boys' School Orchestra played a selection of music in the afternoon. Flower Services were held on Sunday last. At the morning service the young people of the congregation presented flowers which were received by the minister, and afterwards forwarded to the Military Hospital, which is quite near to the church.

Mottram.—The Rev. H. Bodell Smith entered upon his second ministry here on June 1, and there is to be a public Welcome Meeting on August 11. On June 6 the oldest surviving member, Mr. Wm. Sidebottom, died, aged 77. The interment was at Mottram Cemetery on the 9th, and a Memorial Service was held on the 10th, both occasions being numerously attended. Since then news has come that a nephew, Arthur Sidebottom, one of the Mottram scholars and workers, died from wounds received in action in France on June 15, and a Memorial Service was held at Mottram on July 1. These losses caused widespread mourning and have been keenly felt by the relatives and the congregation. The School Treat and Field Day, June 30, passed off satisfactorily, and the Annual School Procession and Prize Distribution on July 8 was most gratifying in the large attendances,—130 in the procession and at afternoon service, and nearly 200 at night.

North Cheshire.—The annual picnic of the North Cheshire Unitarian Sunday School Union was held at Gee Cross on the 7th inst. About 160 took part in the ramble. Mr. J. D. Nuttrell acted as leader. After tea, at which all the guests brought their own provisions, a vote of thanks to the hosts was passed on the motion of the Rev. H. Bodell Smith, seconded by the Rev. D. W. Robson.

A CONFERENCE of Clergy of an interdenominational character, organised by the League of Nations Special Conference Committee, will be held on Tuesday, July 17, at 3 P.M., at the Central Hall, Westminster. This is the first meeting of the kind in this country arranged with the view of giving expression to the opinions of representatives of different religious bodies, and considerable interest attaches to it for that reason. The Bishop of Oxford will take the chair, and the speakers will include Monsignor Henry J. Grosch, the Right Hon. W. H. Dickinson, M.P., and Dr. Selbie. Tickets of admission, available for the clergy only, can be obtained from the Secretary, League of Nations Special Conference Committee, 47 Victoria Street, S.W.1.

IT has been arranged to hold a Summer Meeting to consider Problems of Reconstruction after the War at the Hampstead Garden Suburb from August 3 to 17. The President is Mrs. S. A. Barnett, and the Chairman of Committee is the Rev. W. Hudson Shaw. Among the list of lecturers and speakers are the Bishop of Oxford, Canon Masterman, Mr. Sidney Webb, Miss Maud Royden, Mrs. Creighton, the Master of Balliol, Mr. Guy Kendall and Mr. Graham Wallas. The price of tickets for the whole meeting has been fixed at £1 1*s.* or for one week 12*s.* 6*d.* A list of hostesses receiving paying guests in the Suburb will be available for members residing at a distance. All applications for tickets and inquiries should be addressed to the Secretary, Miss M. Bolden, The Institute, Central Square, Hampstead Garden Suburb, N.W.4.

MR. H. K. SINGH, whose long illness deprived the churches in the Khasi Hills, India, of his devoted services as a lay preacher for several months, sent one of his sons to America last year to be educated for the ministry, with the purpose of returning to the Khasi Hills as a missionary. The boy is 15 years of age, and is studying at Andover, N.H., in preparation for Meadville. A son of the Rev. David Edwards, the only ordained minister the Khasi Hills churches have ever had, whose death last year was deeply felt, has been studying for two years in Calcutta with a view to the Unitarian ministry, and money is being raised to give him a period of training at Meadville also.

The Christian Register draws special attention to a new pamphlet by Dr. Gannett, 'The Household Altar in Homes of the Liberal Faith To-day,' which, the editor thinks, ought to start an important movement for making religious education in the home a subject of serious consideration. We hope that it will soon be available for readers in this country.

BIRTH.

CURREY.—At Vermilion, Alberta, the wife of James Elliot Currey of a son. (By cable, July 7.)

DEATHS.

CHATFEILD CLARKE.—On July 12 at 66 Inverness Terrace, W.2, Howard Chatfeild Clarke, F.R.I.B.A., P.P.S.I., deeply beloved husband of Gertrude Chatfeild Clarke, in his 57th year. Funeral Service will be held at Essex Church, The Mall, Kensington (near Notting Hill Gate Stations), on Monday, the 16th inst., at 2.30 o'clock, interment afterwards at Highgate Cemetery. Friends please accept this as the only intimation.

THOMAS.—On July 6, at 57 High Street, Manchester, S.E., the Rev. E. L. H. Thomas, B.A., Minister of Cross Street Chapel, Manchester.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

The address for our Belgian Hospital Fund, to which cheques and parcels of clothing should be sent, is Mrs. Bernard Allen, 14 Gainsborough Gardens, Hampstead, N.W.3.

THE announcement of the change made by the King in the name and titles of the Royal Family will be generally received with approval. "The House and Family of Windsor" will henceforth take the place of all German titles, whether of Saxony or Saxe-Gotha. The new title revives certain English traditions. The fame of Windsor goes back to very early times in the national history. The change now made may appear to be more a matter of sentiment than anything else. But sentiment is a very powerful factor in public as well as private life.

MEANWHILE events in Germany bear witness to a shaking of autocracy—even that of the Kaiser Bethmann-Hollweg has fallen, and the Kaiser has appointed a minor official, Dr. Michaelis, in his place. It is almost a comedy—as if Mr. Lloyd George had resigned to be succeeded by Mr. Kennedy Jones. The appointment appears to be something of a compromise between the extreme war party, headed by the Crown Prince and Hindenburg, and the advocates of parliamentary government. Amid the obscurities of the situation one thing clearly emerges with significance—the demand of the Reichstag first for internal reforms, and second, for a peace without annexations. The Russian revolution, followed by the Russian offensive, could not but exercise a wide and deep influence on opinion in the German and Austrian states. It is much that the Reichstag should have come to see that the great hope of peace is in the democratisation of the German peoples through the machinery of really representative government. It may not come to-morrow, nor the day after; there may be another period of repression; but in the long run, and the run may not be so very long, Germany will find that peace is only possible by the setting up of free institutions and the breakdown of Kaiserism with its glorification of might and military dominance. There will be rejoicings, at least in Belgium, over the fall of Bethmann-Hollweg. The man who declared that the invasion of Belgium was wrong, but that "necessity knew no law," the man who on that ground justified the outrages of Louvain and all the nameless abominations that fill the page of Germany's history with dishonour, disappears from the scene unwept—the discarded tool and puppet of more powerful interests than his own.

YET it may be said that nothing in Bethmann-Hollweg's career is so much to his credit as the reason of his downfall. Rumour, as we all know, is a lying jade, but unless Reuter and numerous well-informed correspondents are all in the wrong, there is something more than rumour in the assertion that it was Hollweg's insistence on a new declaration of Germany's war aims, which should include the adhesion of Germany to the formula, "peace without annexation," that brought about his resignation. Both Austria and Bavaria have more or less officially accepted that step towards peace, and it would appear that it was only the intervention of the Crown Prince and Hindenburg that prevented the Kaiser from agreeing to his Chancellor's advice. The decision taken must be regarded as a victory for the Reactionaries. Everything points for the time being to a military dictatorship under Hindenburg. It is not likely to last very long. The new Chancellor is to make a statement in the Reichstag on the situation, but if the majority still hold to their non-annexation policy he will find himself in a cleft stick. It is quite certain that the German peoples apart from Prussia are clamorous for peace, and even Prussia can only be kept acquiescent by Hindenburg's promise of victory. The non-fulfilment of that promise will bring military dictatorship to an end. Then the demand for peace will be irresistible. It is up to the Allied Powers to hasten that day by more and more vigour in every field of the war.

IT would appear that the most important political event in home affairs during the last few days has been the uprising of Parliament, reasserting its authority and independence. In a state of war it is the inevitable tendency of the executive to increase its power by encroaching on the representative institutions of a nation, and by limiting their functions and their rights of criticism. In the battle for freedom it not seldom happens that freedom itself suffers. The business of Parliament is simply to endorse the action of the executive and to provide the funds demanded. In our own country the House of Commons has time after time refrained from debate and allowed the executive to govern without Parliamentary control on the plea that "we are at war." But the last three weeks have witnessed a remarkable change in the attitude of the lower House. It has set up a committee to inquire into the tremendous expenditure by the Government on the war, amounting now to eight millions a day. It has revolted against the mishandling by the Government of the Mesopotamian scandal, and it has compelled the authorities to give London adequate warnings of the approach of enemy aircraft. This does not mean any weakening of its resolve to continue the war at any cost until the great cause is victorious. But it does mean that the House of Commons is the supreme and final authority in war as well as in peace.

THE changes in the Government announced on Wednesday had been generally anticipated. The return of Mr. Churchill to office, while bitterly opposed by the Northcliffe press, restores to the public service a brain and personality of extraordinary vigour, and in the Munitions Department these will find ample scope. The advance of Sir Eric Geddes to the Head of the Navy is perhaps the most startling of the changes made. Sir Eric is the one conspicuous success of the appointment of the business man to high office, and in his previous posts has shown administrative qualities of a very high order. Dr. Addison's lifelong interest in social reform will find a better sphere for his energies in the work of Reconstruction than at the Munitions Office. The claim that the Government has been strengthened by these changes is a little premature. Time alone will justify them.

The Annual Meetings of the Wesleyan Conference, begun in the present week, will be remembered for the presence of two Anglican bishops, London and Chelmsford, on the platform. Among the younger Wesleyan ministers a movement has lately been on foot for some sort of union with the Church of England. Delicate feelers have been put forth, which, indeed, commit nobody, and it may be that the presence of two bishops will prove an encouragement to the leaders of the union movement to draw a little closer and speak with a little clearer voice. The older men in the Conference are entirely out of sympathy with the suggested approachment. There is to be a debate on Mr. Shakespeare's scheme for a Federated Free Church, about which the Conference has not so far shown itself enthusiastic. Many of the influential men among them, both laymen and ministers, would prefer that the various Wesleyan bodies should unite as one church, and stand aloof from proposals for union with either the Anglican or the Free Churches. The question of 'Heresy and Heretics' is also to be raised, so that we are promised a lively time.

When popular novelists like Mr. Wells and clever journalists take to writing on the reconstruction of God and the reconstruction of Christianity, it may be well to ask, what is meant by "reconstruction" in such cases? How are our prophets going to reconstruct the God of the Twenty-Third Psalm or the Christianity of the Beatitudes? Institutions, organisations, rites, metaphysical creeds, popular catechisms, churches, with all their offices and paraphernalia, may be reconstructed, but God and Christianity do not seem to come under the category of things liable to changes and reforms. Surely what is wanted is neither a new God nor a new Christianity, but greater loyalty to the God and Father revealed by Jesus and to the spiritual ideals of his gospel. Reconstruction—no. A more searching and thoroughgoing loyalty—yes.

Once again we draw attention to the special 'Order of Service' drawn up by a Committee of the National Conference for use in our churches on Sunday, August 5—the third anniversary of the declaration of war. It is entitled 'A Service of Remembrance and Renewal of Purpose,' and is built upon the idea of endurance to the end. Great care has been given to its preparation, and it is hoped that it may be generally adopted for use on the day appointed. Nothing can be more desirable at the present time than an expression of prayer and praise which unites in feeling and worship and high resolve.

THE DYER'S HAND.

Where even the versatile nature of Shakespeare was "subdued to that he worked in," ordinary mortals may not hope to escape. We are all limited in some degree by specialism. Steeping our mind daily in the particular work we have to do we alter, more or less consciously, into a type. Our contemporaries discern it, probably, sooner and more clearly than ourselves; we readily see it in them. What is too often forgotten is that the dye on the dyer's hand is not really the colour of his skin. Beneath all the disguises imposed by our occupations and habits there is a "nature" which, were it not thus limited and crippled, might be fruitful in many a more satisfactory direction.

Not that specialism is wholly a loss. We divide spheres of influence the better to conquer the world. Not all men can do all things, and even where the range of native ability is wide the skill of an expert can only be acquired by practice in some one art to the exclusion of the rest. The individual's loss in the narrowing of his province yields a gain to the community in service of special dexterity. Doubtless a similar profit to mankind at large arises from the varieties of temperamental emphasis in different men. One has developed a massive commonsense, another a delicate acumen, a third is at home in exalted sentiments which are not reached by most without considerable effort, if at all; a fourth exhibits a lively humour. Our intercourse with one another certainly becomes more interesting as these temperamental factors in the social medley are raised respectively to their higher powers, and our sense of mental and spiritual values seems to be best educated, here as in other fields, by the observation of exaggerated examples. All this and more may be conceded to the credit of the order in which men fall into ranks widely differing from one another.

And yet, what Shakespeare deplored in his own case is to some extent lamentable in all. We are all warped from the state of the full-rounded nature into shapes too often approaching the deformed, now and then laughably odd, sometimes pitiful. The actor recalls his proper self with bitter regret in the midst of the motley show which he has made of his life. But who is exempt? Where is the vocation that does not stamp the man, changing him more or less into the wearer of a livery and the bearer of a mask? If the bland parson flatters himself that his hand has escaped the dye, let him listen awhile to the not unkindly echoes of his tone, and note the bearing and attitudes with which the mimics reproduce his type upon the stage. Now and again one meets a man a little difficult to class; but usually an hour's talk is fully enough to decide into what group he must be placed—manufacturer, traveller, journalist, solicitor, doctor, schoolmaster, farmer, or what not. Of course, it would be somewhat puerile to resent this result of the years. A man may be content to be obviously anything but a rogue—so far content, that is, as still to be conscious of ranges beyond those in which his daily round has been prescribed, and still to cherish a hope, and in measure, to follow a practice, of preserving his life against the worst perversions and limitations.

It is delightful to see the specialist in a man putting off the uniform and trying to give his unused self a new chance. Holidays afford opportunity for this, to those who in these days can afford them. Holy-days at least are, one would hope, within the reach of all. What wiser use can we make of hours when the world's demand for our bit of special work ceases awhile, than to prove that we are really men and not cogs on a wheel! Amateurs are sniffed at by professionals, but when a man does anything simply for love of it—and modestly abstains from pretence to authority—let his action be welcomed. It is one more proof that life is more than mechanism, one more suggestion that we are all greater than we know. Sometimes, no doubt, one smiles at the antics of the self escaped from drill. We knew an admiral who spent his leisure philosophising—like an admiral; whether the risks were greater than if a university lecturer had tried manœuvring the Channel Fleet need not here be argued. Just now the latent strategist is stirring in a host of veteran breasts; we can hear, if we care, in every club and inn how to block the seas, how to triumph in the air, how fields should be won. It is all very amusing to any one who has a smile left in him, but it really is rather touching. All these awkward flights of a nature which is so much cribbed, cabined, and confined, testify, at least, that if it only could, it would be an altogether larger thing.

Two remarks, we hope, may be usefully added. These years of warfare, though eloquent of feelings that draw all of us into a deeper national unity than we ever knew before, have strikingly revealed to us alike the advantages and the dangers of military specialism. To the hand that is dyed in khaki we owe so much that many of us are reluctant to scrutinise its actions too closely. The "army man," for his part, apparently unconscious that any one else can serve the State, regards the "politician" as—we would rather not say what. The expert in markets and tariffs finds his line of patriotic advance in a very different direction from that which he would choose who thinks more of the world's peace and common prosperity than of particular national interests. While such varieties of mood and opinion exist let us tell ourselves that no one of them is or can be absolute. Civis sum, should be the corrective word for each of us, when we are tempted to forget that our own accent is not the only one in which true patriotism can be uttered. As we learn better to say civilis nihil a me alienum puto, extending our conception of the State far beyond the confines of the particular duties which we have personally to fulfil, including in our view all that makes up the life of a nation, all material wealth-making, all spiritual, we shall be better prepared for a step that is far more difficult. What Terence said, of course, was Homo sum—not merely civis—humani nihil a me alienum puto. If some of us, many of us, can endorse that magnificent saying only with a reservation apparently irreducible, if Germany now seems to lie utterly beyond the pale, let us trust that the great pagan poet will pardon his Christian successors. They have seen and suffered much. Yet, are their natures so finally subdued by the blood-bath of to-day that they may never hope again for the vision of world-wide amity that used to make a to-morrow, however far off, that was worth living for? CHRIST AND THE USE OF FORCE.

To the Editor of THE INQUIRER.

SIR,—I thank Dr. Drummond for the kind and helpful tone of his criticism of a passage in my presidential address to the Lancashire and Cheshire Assembly. He asks where Jesus lays down the doctrine that the State is never to use force. May I ask in return where Jesus lays down a distinction between an individual's use of force on his own behalf and his use of force as the mandatory of the State? The answer to both questions is, "Nowhere"! The State is an agglomeration of individuals, and its conscience an agglomeration of individual consciences. It can only act through individuals, and individuals cannot get rid of the responsibility of deciding on the morality of using force by pleading the mandate of the State. But even if we could accept the suggestion that Jesus either made or implied such a distinction, it would afford no relief to those who hold, as I do, that upon occasion the individual, like the State, "must repel force with force" on his own behalf; and I gather that Dr. Drummond would admit that here, at any rate, we do "disagree with Jesus."

As Dr. Drummond says, individuals in civilised communities have largely ceased to strike each other. But it is to be feared that that is less because of the precept of Jesus than because the law, backed by organised force, undertakes either to protect them from attack or to punish the attacker and indemnify the attacked. States will show the same signs of civilisation when international law, with the same backing, is able to give and impose the same guarantees. In the meantime States, like individuals, will resort to force on what appears to them to be adequate occasion. And while Christ's interdict against force will to that extent and for so long be disregarded, the general spirit of his teaching will steadily modify opinion as to what constitutes adequate occasion—for States as for individuals.

I find no help in Dr. Drummond's citation from Paul (Romans xiii. 1-4). The passage appears merely to inculcate non-resistance of peoples to all governments and so to discountenance in advance the deposition of the Tsar and the extortion of parliamentary government from the Kaiser. The precept of Jesus in this matter seems to me perfectly explicit and absolutely inclusive. In saying after saying, without any kind of qualification, he forbids resistance. Those who examine the teaching of the creeds in the belief that its acceptance is vital to their salvation, will interpret them not in the manner closest to the literal meaning of the words but in the manner nearest to their own capacity of belief. One suspects that many people less clear-headed than Dr. Drummond, rejecting the dogmas about the person of Jesus, nevertheless start their examination of his teaching with the acceptance of the dogma that that teaching is binding upon them; and therefore tend to give it the interpretation easiest to conform to, rather than that most clearly indicated by the text. At any rate, many of those who start with no such assumption find, as I do, that his teaching and the judgment with which God has endowed them do not in every particular point to the same conclusion.

But the passage which Dr. Drummond so gently criticises was only the exordium to an address intended to enforce—and I think accepted by my hearers as enforcing—the need for a closer application of the general spirit of the teaching of Jesus to the problems of the day than is to be discovered in some public utterances upon them. And it is to a consideration of this need that I would rather commend your readers as well. I hope they will judge the address for themselves by getting it from the Essex Hall bookroom (1½*d.* post free). In doing so they will judge also the justification for your own reckless misinterpretation of my attitude towards the war in your leading article of to-day. I am not a disciple of Tolstoy, who accepted the teaching of Jesus in its entirety, as I do not. I admit no "act of unfaithfulness" to Jesus in following the conscience given me by his Father and mine. I am conscious of no lack of "strong and kindling energy for the stern duties of this time"—the sternest of which is to fight paganism in whatever disguise and environment and by every available weapon of honourable warfare—even "pamphlets." My "conviction of the splendour of our cause" is as deep as any man's: my quarrel is with many men's interpretation of it. My pulse beats as fast as yours at the thought of the great historic fights for freedom; I remember still my grief at being unable to fight for Crete and Armenia against the Turk.—Yours, &c., GEO. G. ARMSTRONG.

MEMORIAL NOTICE.

MR. HOWARD CHATFEILD CLARKE.

THE death of Mr. Howard Chatfeild Clarke, after a severe and trying illness, before he had completed his 57th year, is a grievous loss to the profession in which he held an honoured place, to many institutions and societies whose adviser he was, to our religious community, to a wide circle of personal friends, and above all to his sorrowing wife and family. He was the eldest son of the late Mr. Thomas Chatfeild Clarke, and was born November 15, 1860. Educated at Clifton College, trained in his father's office, a Fellow of the Royal Institute of British Architects, he became the head of the well-known firm of architects and surveyors in Bishopsgate. One of his earliest professional appointments was that of surveyor to Dr. Williams' Trust; the Cordwainers Company, the Fishmongers Company, and several leading insurance offices followed. Many buildings in the City and the West End were erected from his designs, among them the new hall for the Cordwainers Company. The Unitarian church at Kilburn is one of the most recent of his church buildings; and almost the last task he undertook previous to his illness was the preparation of plans for the Lawrence House Hostel adjoining Essex Hall. His services were in great request as an expert witness and arbitrator in compensation cases under the Land Clauses Consolidation Act and other measures on behalf of property owners and public authorities. One of the best known cases in which he was concerned was that of the acquisition of property for the Mall approach to Buckingham Palace. He was actively engaged up to the time of his illness in connection with surveys and valuations made at the request of the Ministry of Munitions. Mr. Howard Chatfeild Clarke married a daughter of the late Mr. J. J. Galt of Fernhill Park, Isle of Wight; and he had a family of three sons and three daughters.

The interment at Highgate Cemetery was preceded by a memorial service at Essex Church, Kensington, on Monday, July 16, conducted by the Rev. J. H. Weatherall, minister of the church, and the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie, secretary of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association. There was a very large attendance of relatives, friends, and representatives of societies and public bodies, including his widow, two sons and three daughters, his brothers, and other near relatives. The British and Foreign Unitarian Association was represented by the President, the Rev. Dr. Carpenter, the ex-President, Mr. J. F. L. Brunner, M.P., and many members of the Executive Committee; the Ministers' Pension and Insurance Fund by the Rev. W. G. Tarrant and Mr. Harold Wade; Dr. Williams' Library by the Rev. R. T. Herford; the London Domestic Mission by the Rev. F. Summers. Among those unable to be present was the Rev. F. H. Jones, who had to fulfil an engagement in Wales.

At the service there were three hymns; one of them, 'Fair waved the golden corn,' was sung because it was a favourite of the deceased, learned in his childhood. Mr. Weatherall in his address spoke of the certainty and meaning of immortality. The unseen things of thought and life—the wisdom, goodness, and love of man—had their true and full development in the abiding wisdom, goodness, and love of God. The address by Mr. Bowie, given below, is an appreciation of Mr. Howard Chatfeild Clarke, spoken by one who knew him long and well:—

The impression made upon us by our fellow-men and the judgment we form of their character and work are largely determined by the nature and extent of our knowledge of them and the degree of our personal intimacy. Men engaged in professional work are naturally judged by their clients by standards very different to those applied by their friends and families. A man may occupy a high place in his profession or in the estimation of the public, and yet attract few friends; and his family may have to endure much hardness through living with him. We are assembled to-day to pay our tribute of appreciation, respect, and affection to the memory of Howard Chatfeild Clarke—a man whose professional career was upright and honourable, whose many friendships were loyal and sincere, and who was endeared to his wife and children by an affection that never wavered or wearied.

Of his professional attainments and achievements as an architect and surveyor, those well qualified by knowledge and experience to judge have testified in terms of high commendation. The landmarks of his industry and skill are to be found in the City of London and beyond its borders. He held several important positions where his advice was valued and trusted; and his services as arbitrator were in frequent demand because of the ability, fairness, and courtesy with which he expressed his opinions.

Many men become so engrossed in their business or profession that they give no thought or time to anything else. The larger, wider interests and needs of mankind are no concern of theirs—at least not until they have made their pile of money, or until they have become old and grey. Howard Chatfeild Clarke was not one of these. From early manhood he gave no small share of an arduous and busy life to educational, philanthropic, and religious work. His large common sense, his steadfast loyalty, his unfailing courtesy made him an admirable colleague on the various committees upon which he served. He was also a charming host; and his "at homes" and official receptions were always most enjoyable. Some men by the excellence of their life and work command our admiration and respect: only a select few awaken our affection. To that select few, I venture to say, Howard Chatfeild Clarke belonged. I knew him in some measure for nearly thirty years; and during the last ten years few weeks passed without my meeting him. He was intelligently and earnestly devoted to high and noble ideals of citizenship and religion. He made no pretence to book-learning, but he followed with genuine interest the trend of modern thought; and he could exercise an independent judgment upon the political, social, and religious movements of his time.

Mr. Chatfeild Clarke was exceedingly generous in his intercourse and dealings with those who became afflicted by illness or overwork. Perhaps, if a few years earlier he had been equally solicitous of his own health, his illness might have been warded off. But he could not endure the thought of an idle and useless life. Some months ago, when there was a question that his life might possibly be prolonged if he abandoned his profession and went to live quietly in the country, he told me that such a thought was unendurable: he would fight for life that he might work, or he would die.

The war has had its martyrs at home, as well as on the seas and in the lands beyond. Mr. Chatfeild Clarke, before his illness, rushed about the country by day and night, as a volunteer, surveying factories and munition works, that soldiers in France might not run short of supplies; and he fell in the fight at the early age of 57. One of his sons led his men from the trenches in an attempt to win a victory for freedom and right, and he fell wounded on the battlefield, and was "missed" when the roll call was made. Father and son were alike inspired by a brave and unselfish desire to be of service: both were called away; and all that is left for us is to speak our word of benediction, and reverently to thank God that courage and faithfulness have not deserted the manhood of the nation.

There are many institutions and societies represented here to-day which have lost in Howard Chatfeild Clarke a true friend and generous supporter. I can only briefly refer to one or two which lay outside the sphere of his business and professional career, though in connection therewith his benevolent activities were important and numerous. The British and Foreign Unitarian Association, of which for ten years he was the honoured treasurer, had in him a loyal and whole-hearted friend and earnest worker; his fellow-officers and members sincerely and deeply regret his death. The ministers of the small religious community, to which by inheritance and conviction he was attached, mourn the loss of a friend who rejoiced that as treasurer of their Pension and Insurance Fund he was privileged to assist in relieving their declining years from the burden of anxiety. With the London Domestic Mission Society he was associated for twenty-five years, having as a young man taught in the Sunday School. To this church in which we are met he rendered conspicuous service at different times and in several ways.

England is happy in possessing a great multitude of men and women who by their devoted unselfish service help to keep pure and free and strong the higher and better life of the nation—to that heroic host Howard Chatfeild Clarke belonged. And so, while we mourn his death, we rejoice that he lived, and that many of us knew and loved him. We would not, if we could, enter the sacred shrine of that intimate personal sorrow which has touched the hearts and darkened the homes of those nearest and dearest to him. We can only offer them our silent and respectful sympathy in the hour of their great bereavement; and we trust that in the days to come they will look back, as we shall look back, with happy grateful hearts upon a life well spent in the service of God and man.

WEEKLY NOTES.

I am once more in Calais, and arrived just in time for a fête at the Hut on the anniversary of its opening a year ago. The fête was arranged in the open air, and there were booths where all sorts of things were sold, such as fruit, cakes, flowers, toys, &c., and there were about a dozen side shows, mostly very funny, and so crowded that I could not get near them. One most amusing entertainment was a mock court house, and men dressed as gendarmes of a hundred years ago went about the crowd and arrested well-known officers and brought them up for trial on most ridiculous charges. They always had preposterous sentences passed on them, which were commuted to fines paid on the spot! A band was playing all the afternoon and there was a huge crowd. The proceeds are to go to a Fund for providing homes for disabled French and Belgian soldiers after the war, and I think a very good sum was realised. It seemed to me a good idea that the men should make the anniversary celebration an occasion for helping their wounded fellow soldiers.

A LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

An interdenominational Conference of ministers of religion was held at the Central Hall, Westminster, on Tuesday afternoon to discuss the plan of a League of Nations. This is the first of a series of conferences which it is proposed to hold with the object of enlisting the support of men in the various professions, and educating public opinion on the whole subject. The Bishop of Oxford was in the chair, and the speakers were Monsignor Grosch, the Rt. Hon. W. H. Dickinson, M.P., and the Rev. R. C. Gillie, who took the place of Dr. Selbie. A letter was read from Dr. Selbie expressing his regret at being unable to be present, and emphasising the necessity of every right-minded man taking very definite measures to secure the future peace of the world. The only means to that end which had been suggested with any show of authority was the establishment of some international organisation to secure peace and to support public right and international law, and there was no doubt that the close co-operation between the Allies which the war had necessitated and the entry of the United States into the conflict would make such action more feasible than it had hitherto been. The Churches ought to bring much weight to bear in the effort to get a sufficient body of opinion organised in this matter.

The Bishop of Oxford on the hopes of the future.

The Chairman said they were approaching a most horrible anniversary, the day on which this tremendous war was begun three years ago. The war had exceeded in horror tenfold anything which the most pessimistic would have imagined possible when it started, and there were no signs of its coming to an end; "and yet I, for my own part," he continued, "am impenitent, finally impenitent, on the subject of the war. I am confident that it was our duty to enter into it, so confident that I could hardly conceive what life would have meant if we had failed to do so, and I am confident, also, that it is our duty to prosecute it until the military power of Germany—not Germany itself—is publicly and signally discredited. That is to say, I am among those who feel that before peace you must put victory. But a man who believes that this price has to be paid, and whose imagination has taken in something of the enormous horrors of war, not only those horrors that we read about in the newspapers but the deeper horrors which lie under the surface, and which, it seems to me, have let loose just those forces which make for the destruction of civilisation and all morality, will want to know what answer he must give to people who are always asking, 'is it worth while?'—and how deeply and widely that question is being asked I fancy we know. The answer also we know, and it is that it is worth while, if through this war we attain such a position among the nations as shall enable the ends for which we went to war to be fulfilled; I mean, the ends of justice, liberty and peace. By justice is meant the restoration to their proper position among the nations of Belgium, Serbia, and the Armenians. I can conceive of nothing that can justify the failure of the nations of Europe to secure those ends. And liberty, though it admits of less easy definition,—we know what liberty means and stands for, in spite of all the military perils. I have exulted in the revolution in Russia because it has made more secure the fact that we stand for liberty, and I have exulted for the same reason in the coming in of the United States. It has made clearer the fact that what we have in view is that no group of people deserving the name of a nation shall be left under the heel of a sovereignty which it abhors. Justice, liberty,—and also peace. I suppose we can hardly exaggerate the passion and desire in our souls for peace; but we know what an immeasurable interval separates such an aspiration from its realisation. Yet we feel that unless a permanent security for peace is found, those great hosts who have given their lives will have given them in vain. And if it has been their business to fight and die, it is our business to see to it that they have not died in vain. That is why we are here."

"It is a tremendous task," the speaker continued, "this League of Nations, but two things especially inspire me—and I do not find it easy to be optimistic—first, the kind of men who are found speaking on behalf of it. I have seldom read a more impressive pamphlet than that containing a report of the great meeting which was held on May 14 by the League of Nations Society. I was specially struck with the speeches of General Smuts and Lord Buckmaster. They are men of the kind who do not say things unless they have some hope of their practical accomplishment. Secondly, there is something much bigger and greater that inspires me with hope, and that is the immense strides which democratic feeling appears to be making during the war. I was afraid at the beginning of it that its tendency would be to promote militarism, but it now seems to me that the war has destroyed militarism instead of promoting it. We have seen the vast outbreak of democratic feeling in Russia, we have seen the coming in of America, and we are hoping, not against hope, that the ending of the war may come through the outbreak of some similar movement in Germany. At any rate, when I look round in my own country, I see that there is an extraordinary strengthening of all forces which make for democracy, and though we cannot be blind to its tremendous dangers, yet if we substitute democracies for dynasties we substitute something that is pacific for something that is, on the whole, warlike. I believe that there is immense hope for the future if the democracies can be inspired with the resolution that they will have nothing to do any more with war. It is because of that that I dare to say, under the banner of a cause which I know a great many men regard as highly idealistic, that there is no more practical movement than this movement which the League of Nations Society has innovated."

In conclusion, Bishop Gore referred to the question of the diminution of armaments, which he regarded as a necessary part of the scheme, and to the enormous importance of seeing to it that all nations should be admitted into the League if they wished. He distinguished profoundly between the German nation and the German Government, and wished that it should be understood by every German that his people were to have a fair chance among the nations of the earth after the war.

Mr. Dickinson on the League of Nations Society.

Mr. Dickinson very ably recapitulated the work which had been accomplished previous to the war at the Hague Conferences, and outlined the main objects of the League of Nations Society. There were, of course, several schemes in existence which aimed at the establishment of some system which should, as far as was humanly possible, provide for the maintenance of permanent peace. Some proposed the total and immediate disarmament of the nations, others the establishment of a great world federation that would rule over the destinies of all mankind. The first was an ideal which every one would like to see realised, and which he believed would ultimately be carried out, but they were bound to realise that it was almost impossible to conceive that anything of such magnitude would take place immediately after this war. On the other hand, the establishment of a great world-federation meant the subordination to a greater or less extent of all the nations to some unthought-out executive or World Parliament which it would be difficult to devise, and which, in the present state of national feeling, would be unlikely to prove successful. And so they had to find some middle course which, while keeping the great ideal in view, might be adopted under the present conditions of European civilisation. Firstly, it must deal with independent free nations; secondly, it must not lose sight of a possible world federation in the time to come; thirdly, we must have machinery that will tend to disarmament ultimately. There were three organisations that during the war had been turning their attention to this problem, the League to Enforce Peace, in America, the Organisation Centrale pour une Paix Durable in Holland, and the League of Nations Society. These three societies were agreed in one respect, that nations which bound themselves by treaty should undertake to use their military and economic forces jointly to prevent any nation from going to war in defiance of that treaty. Whatever the dispute, if one of the number ventured to go to war without waiting for the question to be investigated, it would meet with the forcible opposition of every member of the League. That would be an enormous gain upon anything which we had had before. If such a condition of things had existed in 1914 the present tragic war might never have taken place. This was the one practical proposal they were putting forward and which they desired to bring before the people of this country. But it would be extremely difficult after the war to get people to look at this question with the same friendly feelings that existed before it broke out, and unless statesmen and diplomatists were made to feel that there was a great pressure of public opinion in the direction of securing a permanent peace things might be in a more backward condition than before the war.

Monsignor Grosch on the influence of the Papacy.

Monsignor Grosch, who said he did not speak to them as the representative of Cardinal Bourne, though he hoped His Eminence would approve of what he was about to say, approached the subject from the point of view of a member of a great religious communion which had no national boundaries, and which enjoyed very special opportunities of bringing home to three hundred millions of Christians the moral implications which ought to be foremost in their considerations, but which were not mentioned in the objects of the League of Nations Society. It was essential that in supporting this movement they should be guilty of no narrow-mindedness, misled by no insular prejudices, and that they should secure all the support which was available. Mgr. Grosch went on to say that the assistance of the Holy See should be sought. The Papacy was, at least, a great moral factor in the history of the world, and when the Pope spoke he had an audience, dwelling in every country, far greater than that which could be reached by any single power or by any collective power. Such a force disarmed criticism, even amongst those who did not admit its authority, by its disinterestedness, for it had no material objects to gain, and might be relied upon to give true and impartial judgments when appealed to. The speaker urged that the gates of the Hague Convention (which had been closed to Leo XIII. when he desired to find a place in it) should be opened to the Holy See, and claimed that it would give them a very great deal of assistance which it would be disastrous for them to ignore.

The Rev. R. C. Gillie spoke on the failure of the churches to avert war, and the inadvisability of making Germany an outcast from the League of Nations, so creating the very position they desired to avoid.

It was agreed to appoint an interdenominational committee to consider the possibilities of working as an auxiliary of the League of Nations Society.

WILLASTON SCHOOL.

At Willaston, as at most other schools, the holding of Speech Day is at present in abeyance. Advantage is therefore taken of the hospitality of these columns to make some report, for those who are interested, on the position and prospects of the school.

Willaston has suffered through the war in the same way that other schools have which are similarly placed. Young boys have been taken away for financial reasons, or have not entered; and—much more serious—senior boys have left at an earlier age than they would naturally have done. The military training given by the School Cadet Corps seems powerless to prevent this, for the reason that boys cannot remain in it over the age of 18, and must leave even earlier if they are to escape service in the ranks when they join up. This denial to cadet corps (the only form of organisation open to schools since the war began) of the privilege of keeping their cadets beyond the age of 18, and passing them straight into officer cadet battalions when they leave, although they are doing the same work as O.T.C.'s, which have these privileges, is felt to be something more than a hardship. In spite of these disadvantages, however, the school has grown steadily, and is now only two short of its full complement (with existing accommodation) of sixty.

With these numbers all cause for anxiety would under normal circumstances have been removed, as the fee was fixed at a figure which would cover expenses with fifty in the school. The increased cost of living, however, has made the sixty guineas inadequate; and though ready generosity has been shown in many cases in the making of additional voluntary payments, an adverse balance has still to be faced. In addition to this, there is still the loss on earlier years to be made good. An appeal to reduce this deficit is being made, and it is greatly to be hoped that there may be a generous response. The amount so contributed is not to be sunk in capital, but used for the extensions which seem likely to be needed before very long. These include more dormitories and class-rooms, additions to the library and music-rooms, and a chemical laboratory. The last may, perhaps, find a donor in someone who foresees an increased demand for science in the coming years: not that the provision of a laboratory would make Willaston any less alive to the supreme value of the humanities in education.

As to the general condition of the school, apart from its increase of numbers, it must suffice to say that it is healthy and vigorous, and has suffered as little as may be from the distractions of those fresh activities which have been rendered necessary by the war.

Lastly, more than a word must be said about those who were formerly members of the school. The Roll of Honour now contains the names of seventy Old Boys. To some of these names are attached marks of special honour—one has the Victoria Cross, two the Military Cross, and three have been mentioned in dispatches. And there is still greater cause for pride, though also for infinite regret, in the fact that seven have made the supreme sacrifice. High as this proportion is, the numbers in no way represent the magnitude of the loss. The only consolation to the school lies in the knowledge that she has had some share in the making of men. Justification for such a claim is forthcoming in the bequests of Lionel David and Philip Hirsch to their Alma Mater, in Mr. Rawsthorn's foundation of the Eric Rawsthorn Leaving Scholarship, and in Mr. Hirsch's undertaking to supply a long-felt need in the school's equipment for the training of the body.

The form of the school's own memorial to her fallen sons has not yet taken definite shape; but there can be little doubt what is the fittest way for her to commemorate service that has not shrunk from sacrifice.

H. Lang Jones.

The Willastonian recently contained the following greeting to former scholars at Willaston School now on active service by the headmaster, Mr. H. Lang Jones, under the title of the 'Old Boys' Club':—

"Fellowship" would be a better term than "Club" in the title of this column; for these words are addressed to every one of the old Willastonians who are now engaged in making our history in the great world outside. How great our pride in you is, and how it increases day by day, it is useless to try to express. Alas! that the pride should be once more mingled with sorrow! The two fresh losses that have to be recorded are such that there can be no one but will feel a sense of personal bereavement in the one case or the other. And what it means to our whole body to have lost such fellows as Ronald Thomson and Philip Hirsch, even those who were not their contemporaries will not need to be told. An account of their careers will be given, with their portraits, in the next number of the Willastonian. I will only mention now, for your information, that Thomson was grievously wounded by a chance shell the moment after he had come out, half dressed, from his dug-out. His mother and brother were able to see him before the end. How Hirsch died, you will read elsewhere.

And this brings me by a swift transition, from sorrow back to pride. When Sydney Harper gave us our first distinction by winning the Military Cross we felt that, with our small numbers, we had no right to look for more to come. Yet Hilton Spence has now won the same reward for gallantry; and, on the very day that we heard of his decoration (it was the anniversary of Rawsthorn's death), came the news that the supreme tribute of a soldier had been paid to the memory of Philip Hirsch. If we were proud before of what you are doing at this time, what must be our feelings now! The inspiration of your deeds—and I refer not only to those that are more outstanding, but also to every single instance of duty done—is of inestimable value to your successors here, not only now, but for generations to come.

How those who at present constitute the School have been carrying on, you will read in the pages that follow. I have only to add that we are going even stronger in the present term; and I hope and pray that when the great time comes for a reunion to be once more possible, you will find that, as we have increased in size, so also we have grown in strength and worthiness.

For the present, then, this brings you our warmest and most hearty greetings, and Godspeed!

THE NATIONAL CONFERENCE.

SERVICES OF COMMEMORATION.

The Committee of the National Conference has decided to recommend all our churches to unite in holding Services of Commemoration and Reconsecration on August 5, at the opening of the fourth year of the war. A special form of service is being prepared, and will shortly be ready. Copies may be obtained from 13 Bream's Buildings, Fetter Lane, London, E.C.4, price 2*s.* 6*d.* for 100 copies, 1*s.* 6*d.* for 50, 1*s.* for 25, carriage paid.

WAR MEMORIALS.

It is hoped that individuals or committees who contemplate the erection of war memorials in their churches will consult the recently appointed Advisory Committee in connection with the National Conference before proceeding to a definite scheme. This committee includes several members who have special knowledge and experience in such problems as will arise in relation to those proposed War Memorials, and, although it is not intended primarily to undertake to carry out War Memorials (though it would be willing to do so if requested), it is in a position to give preliminary guidance as to the kind of memorial suitable for any particular church, and as to the best artists for such a scheme as may be decided on. The Advisory Committee will be glad to offer advice and suggestions as to any form of architectural, sculptural, and decorative work, the composition of memorial inscriptions, the requirements of a church building from the musical point of view, or the more general treatment of the surroundings, or the improvement of the approaches to the church.

SUSTENTATION FUND.

A Meeting of the Managers of the Sustentation Fund was held at Essex Hall on Tuesday, July 10, the President, the Rev. C. J. Street, in the chair. The annual applications for grants were dealt with. Ministers and secretaries of congregations are asked to note that owing to the special circumstances of the time it will not be possible for information to be sent to them till the beginning of August. The first half-yearly payment of the new grants is made at the end of September.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Cape Town.—A copy has recently been received of a sermon on 'The Historical Pageant of Unitarianism and Liberal Religion,' which was preached by the Rev. R. Balmforth in the Free Protestant (Unitarian) Church last April. The Church will celebrate its fiftieth anniversary this year, and it is announced that a Jubilee Historical Pageant of Unitarianism and Liberal religion will be held in August. Mr. Balmforth pictured the dramatic scenes amidst which men like John Wyclif, Michael Servetus, the Rev. John Biddle, Milton, Sir Isaac Newton, Dr. Priestley and many others laboured in the cause of religious freedom and liberty of conscience, emphasising in conclusion the importance of securing complete liberality and freedom of thought without forcing opinions upon others. He reminded his hearers, "First that we must not recall these scenes and stories and great personalities of the past with any feeling of intellectual or sectarian pride, but rather, with a sense of humility and gratitude for things accomplished, and with feelings of renewed self-consecration and self-dedication to ends that are greater than we know. Second, that we must not look down upon others or cast them out of religious fellowship because they cannot accept our beliefs. We cannot all think alike. Uniformity of belief is impossible. Let us ever bear in mind that a man may be a Liberal without being a Unitarian, and that there may be Unitarians who are not always Liberal. To attempt to force our views upon others, or to deny to others that spiritual freedom which we claim for ourselves would be to stamp ourselves as illiberal, and untrue to the religious principles we profess."

Coseley.—The 118th Sunday School Anniversary Services were held on Sunday, July 1, when the Rev. John Ewart, M.A., B.D., of Stowbridge, occupied the pulpit of the Old Meeting House, morning and evening. In the afternoon the children and choir rendered the cantata 'The Path of the Pilgrims,' with Alderman G. E. Brown—a local Wesleyan—as chairman. The congregations were excellent, the church being crowded at both services. On Sunday, the 15th, the concluding service was held, when the Rev. H. Warnock of Walsall (President of the Midland Sunday School Association) conducted the service and the cantata was repeated. On the former occasion, the church was decorated with flowers, provided by the Guild and members of the congregation, and presented a most attractive appearance. The total collections amounted to £28, being £6 12*s.* in advance of last year. Mr. H. Millington presided at the organ.

Guildford and Godalming.—The Rev. Priestley Prime has received and accepted a unanimous invitation to become minister of the two congregations at Ward Street Church, Guildford, and Meadrow Chapel, Godalming, and has already begun his duties.

London: Bermondsey.—On Sunday, July 8, at the Unitarian Church, Fort Road, a Commemoration Service was conducted by the minister, Mr. S. P. Penwarden. At the conclusion of the address he unveiled a New Roll of Honour, on which appear the names of twenty-five young men who have gone from the congregation. Three of them, Albert Bryant, Arthur Favell, and J. Watts, have made the supreme sacrifice. Special music was rendered during the service.

London: Hackney. A correspondent writes: As there is so much difference of opinion on the subject of School Treats this year, it may interest your readers to hear of one war-time Treat that has been quite successful. Perhaps I should say first, that, being Londoners, the children are accustomed to take life as it is, and not as they might like it to be, and are always ready to enjoy any good thing that comes in their way, and so are very easy to please. Having decided to have a War-time Treat, foodless and costless, our minister, the Rev. Bertram Lister, explained to the children the reasons for it, so that they all thoroughly understood why it should be so; and then everyone set about making it a success. The children were asked to come as soon as they had had tea, and before 5 o'clock the hall was full. Ball-games of various kinds had been lent, and the first part of the evening was devoted to these and "Aunt Sally," and frog races. Then came musical chairs and other running about games, followed by songs, recitations (all by the children), and dumb crambo. One teacher got up a charade, with her class as actors; and the elder boys and girls dressed up as Niggers with black faces, and sang plantation songs. Next we had a Magic Lantern Entertainment, Mr. Lister telling the stories, and one of the teachers working the lantern. The lantern is our own, and some little friends who also have one lent us seventy or eighty slides to go with it. After this we had a jumping game over a string. The evening finished with the hearty singing of the National Anthem, and at a quarter to ten a very happy and enthusiastically merry party broke up. Everyone, teachers and children alike, had enjoyed it; it had cost nothing, and no food had been consumed.

London : Kilburn.—The eighth annual display of the Unity Girls Club was held on Wednesday evening, the 11th inst., at Unity Hall, Quex Road, when the items of an interesting programme, consisting of physical drill and some graceful costume dances, were executed by the senior and junior members under the direction of Miss E. Cranbrook, M.G.T.I., and Miss Dorothy Hammond. Mr. Richard Pain presented the prizes to the successful competitors, and explained that although the Boys' Club had been re-opened for a short session this year it had been found impossible, in the limited time, to form and train the teams. Mr. Chaney had most kindly given his services in drilling the boys, but required more assistance for special exercises. All the old gymnastic instructors and many of the members and workers are now serving in the army. Part of the proceeds of the tickets sold for the entertainment was given to the funds of St. Dunstan's Hostel, and Miss Dorothy Pain, who directs the Braille classes of that Institution, in thanking the Committee, gave a brief description of the work which is done at the Hostel. Miss Poole and Miss Warburton were congratulated on the success with which they had carried on the Club under many difficulties. On Sunday, July 15, the Sunday School Anniversary Services were conducted by the Rev. J. Arthur Pearson.

Midland Sunday School Association.—The Annual United Service for the scholars of our Birmingham schools was held at the Church of the Messiah on July 8. The church was nearly full, and the whole service very successful. The Rev. A. H. Lewis of Waverley Road conducted the devotional part, and the Rev. H. H. Johnson of Evesham gave an excellent address on the 'Blue Bird.' An anthem was rendered by a small choir of elder girls, who had been admirably trained. This service is very helpful in bringing the schools together on at least one occasion during the year.

REPRINTS have been sent to us of two sermons preached by Dr. Amherst Tyssen at the Theistic Church at Pembroke Hall, Pembroke Gardens, entitled respectively 'The Problem of Religion,' and 'The Doctrine of the Trinity.'

THE Fight for Right Movement will hold an International Meeting at the Mansion House on Friday, August 3, at 3 P.M., to mark the third anniversary of the Declaration of War. The Lord Mayor will preside, and the speakers will be Lord French, the Italian Ambassador, and the Russian Minister. The Royal Artillery Band will play. Invitations can be obtained on application to the Secretary, Fight for Right Movement, Cunard House, 29 Cockspur Street, S.W.1.

MR. H. G. CHANCELLOR, M.P., will preach at Unity Church, Islington, on Sunday morning, his subject being 'War and Conscience.'

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

The address for our Belgian Hospital Fund, to which cheques and parcels of clothing should be sent, is Mrs. Bernard Allen, 14 Gainsborough Gardens, Hampstead, N.W.3.

IT would be well if critics of the Government took to heart some words of Mr. Churchill's addressed to his constituents on the occasion of his appointment to office as Minister of Munitions. Speaking of the opposition to his appointment by the yellow press he said: "I can quite understand their opposition in view of the part I have borne in past great responsibilities. There is hardly any public servant of position in any of the countries at war who has been exposed to the full brunt and shock of this unparalleled convulsion who has escaped in the discharge of his duties without being bruised or wounded by the fury of events. We are in a period of titanic events and men must be judged by the earnestness and loyalty of their efforts, and not simply by their power to achieve impossibilities." It is not that criticism is to be silenced because of titanic events happening, but that great allowance must be made for human fallibility. Of course the cry "Hold your tongue and get on with the war" may easily be used to cover up all sorts of delinquencies which actually hinder the war. But the kind of criticism of which we hear so much, and to which we refer, is the criticism on the one hand of ignorance and on the other of personal spite or political rancour.

THE maiden speech of the Kaiser's new Chancellor is an excellent specimen of facing-both-ways. There are the usual assertions that Germany did not begin the war, had no lust of power or territory, is certain of victory, &c. And then follows the usual assertion of her desire for peace—only it must be a German peace, a peace that will guarantee Germany's security, &c. It was a speech with sops for the Reactionaries and Junkers, and sops for the Socialists and peace advocates, so that whatever the course of events the speaker would be in the right. The reply of Mr. Lloyd George says all that need be said in exposure of the Chancellor's unrealities. In a true passage Mr. George points out that with all his platitudes about peace, Herr Michaelis has not a word to say about Belgium and its independence:—

> The determination of the Allies is this, that Belgium must be restored as a free and independent people. Belgium must be a people and not a protectorate. We must not have a Belgian scabbard for the Prussian sword. The sword must be Belgian, the scabbard must be Belgian, the soul must be Belgian.

THE most disquieting news of the week is from Russia. The refusal of certain regiments at the front to obey orders has seriously endangered the Russian offensive. How far their mutiny is the result of German agencies, and how far the work of reactionaries in Petrograd, remains to be seen. The situation is grave in the extreme, and will need the most careful and at the same time the most courageous handling.

AT the Wesleyan Conference lately held the Bishop of London made a bold bid for some kind of practical union between the Anglican and the Methodist Churches. We noticed last week that a movement had sprung up among the younger members of the Methodist ministry which might in time lead to a closer connection between the two communions. It is not surprising that the Bishop took occasion by the hand. He emphasised the fact that only a thin partition divided the Wesleyan Church from the Church of England both in doctrine and practice. He told the Conference they could not too often remember that Wesley had said: "I live and die a member of the Church of England." Speaking unofficially he went on to say:—

> His vision was something like this: every Wesleyan minister recognised as a prophet in connection with the Church of England, a committee appointed by the Pastoral Conference to confer with a meeting of Bishops on what terms and conditions further co-operation might be secured, a much more universal recognition of the sin of having two great Churches of practically the same aims, the same ideals working apart from one another, and a prayerful longing at all costs that what God had joined together no man should be able to put asunder.

How many a minister present must have asked himself: "But what does the Bishop mean by recognising every Methodist minister as a prophet? Does he mean recognition as a fully accredited minister even though he has not been ordained by a bishop? Or is it meant that the prophet must submit to re-ordination by one in the apostolical succession before he can be regarded as on ecclesiastical level with the parish priest?" A good deal wants clearing up in the Bishop's vision. The latter sentences indeed suggest not so much co-operation between two equal churches as absorption of the one by the other. Naturally, the chairman of the Conference did not rise to the bait, and gave a perfectly non-committal reply. A good deal of water will flow under the bridges before we see a non-episcopally ordained Methodist minister preaching in St. Paul's.

THERE is, however, a very genuine desire among a section of the clergy, mostly Broad Churchmen, for such a reform of the Church of England as might bring the Bishop's vision a little nearer fulfilment. This has found public expression in a meeting held under the presidency of that very able and popular clergyman, the Rev. W. Temple of St. James's Church, Piccadilly. "Life and Liberty in the Church" was the watchword of the gathering. Mr. Temple and his colleagues claim for the Church the right to control its own affairs, liberty to adjust its offices to modern needs, power to advance in democratic directions without the necessity of first seeking permission from Parliament. It was pointed out that only as the Church democratises its own methods can it hope to appeal with success to a democratic age. Subsequent speakers urged the necessity of a full representation of the laity in the government of the Church, the necessity of converting the clergy from stiffness and aloofness to human friendliness, the profound mistake of associating the Church with the Conservative party—and if all this can only be effected by Disestablishment, then Disestablishment must be welcomed. "Liberty for the sake of life" was their plea. It need hardly be said that such a plea has our deepest sympathy. We who differ profoundly on doctrinal points from the Anglican Church and are not inclined to bow the knee to the idea of "Apostolical succession," have yet the most earnest desire to see that great communion set free from the shackles of State control, that she may fulfil her true mission of hope and blessing. And in attaining her freedom there may be some chance of the Methodist minister appearing in the pulpit of St. Paul's!

THE Commissioners appointed by the Government to inquire into the great social disease known as "Labour Unrest" have issued their report, in which they enumerate eight reasons for the discontent which prevails in the industrial world. The most important of these are the first and last—profiteering and distrust of all Government pledges. Labour knows, as every one knows, that huge fortunes have been made out of the necessities of the war, and it not unnaturally ascribes the increased cost of living chiefly to this scandalous trafficking in the nation's exigencies. Lord Rhondda promises us some relief from profiteering in the matter of food by fixing prices all round. It is confessedly a difficult problem, for in some cases profits go up automatically. It is true wages go up also—but not so fast as prices advance. We need not wonder at the discontent of labour when it finds that it takes a pound to buy what before the war could be bought for eight and sixpence.

YET, perhaps, the distrust of all Government pledges is a more alarming revelation of the mind of the workingman. It would appear that this distrust is deep-seated and of long standing. Labour has learned in the past that unless it can fight for its own hand it will receive scant attention from Parliament. "Fine words butter no parsnips," said Sancho Panza, and Labour has been too often put off with that substitute for the real thing. Of course, there is an historical background for this condition of mind in the treatment of Labour during the great revolution of industry brought about by the introduction of machinery in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries. Any one who needs proof of this statement should read Mr. and Mrs. Hammond's new book, 'The Town Labourer, 1760-1832.' The degrading position of labour in that period is too apt to be forgotten by the well-to-do, but its memory remains in the minds of the working classes and must be taken into account by those who fail to understand Labour's suspicion and distrust of Government pledges.

IS THE TRIUMPH OF DEMOCRACY A GUARANTEE FOR PEACE?

MR. LLOYD GEORGE, in his speech in honour of Belgium at the Queen's Hall last Saturday, repeated even more emphatically what he said in his Glasgow address some weeks ago.

"Whatever manner of Government they choose to rule over them is entirely the business of the German people themselves; but what manner of Government we can trust to make peace with is our business." In a later part of the same speech he said: "The freer Germany is, the more independent Germany is, the better we like it. Those who are the enemies of the freedom and independence of Germany are their own rulers and not the Allied Powers. We prefer a free Germany. We could make peace with a free Germany, but a Germany dominated by autocracy we cannot make any terms of peace with." We all know that President Wilson, in his great address when the United States entered into war on the side of the Allies, expressed the same thought. It was not a crushing defeat of the German people he desired but the democratisation of their Government. There seems to be emerging out of all the chaos and misery of this war a renewed faith in democracy. We are inclined to believe that if Germany and Austria had been democracies there would have been no war. We most of us hope that the end of the war will come through the uprising of a democratic movement in Germany against the Emperor and the military caste. Most of us feel with Mr. Lloyd George and President Wilson that if and when it comes it will change the whole condition of things.

The great and growing faith of our time is a deepened faith in democracy as making for international peace. We believe that autocracy makes for militarism, and that democracy makes for union among the nations.

This faith cannot be proved from history, but it is supported on the whole by history. The nations which have sought for world-wide dominion by conquest and the destruction of free peoples have, on the whole, been autocratically governed nations. Egypt, Assyria, Babylonia, Persia, Macedonia in ancient times were nations whose Governments were autocratic. Spain and Austria and France were autocratically governed nations when they were deluging Europe in blood.

The chief historical difficulties for those who maintain the faith that democratically governed free peoples are peace-loving peoples, willing to live and let live, are Athens and Rome and Great Britain. The self-aggrandising ambition of these peoples must make us feel that we cannot speak with absolute certainty about democracies always making for peace. At the same time it would be justifiable to argue that so far as they were aggressive and militaristic and aiming at the suppression of the freedom in other nations, they were not complete democracies. A large part of the population of Athens was a slave population. Further, it can be said that as a democracy, however incomplete, she was the saviour of Greece from Persia, and that her Empire came to her in the first place, not as the result of intentional conquest, but at the request of the islands and colonies who sought her protection. She failed to keep them because she did not dare to treat them on democratic principles, as we dared to treat South Africa after the Boer War. So far as Rome is concerned it might be argued that when she was most democratic she defeated Pyrrhus and Hannibal, and secured the partial unity of Italy. It was under the increasing autocratic rule of Marius and Sulla and Pompey and Cæsar, when she was a republic only in name, that she became essentially a military and aggressive Power. So far as Great Britain is concerned, although it would be idle to maintain that she has always been a peace-loving nation, it is certainly true that we have never been as a whole possessed with the spirit of militarism in the same sense in which Germany has been possessed by it. It is also true that, wide as the Empire is which has come to us, it has been with the growth of democracy among ourselves increasingly an Empire of free, self-governing, self-respecting peoples, bound to us by affection and mutual interest, and not held down by us in chains.

Upon the whole, faith in democracy as making for freedom and for peace is supported by history, although we cannot say that democratic government is an absolute security against war or against the oppression of little peoples. It is abundantly evident from history that democracies can fight effectively against aggressive Powers. The success of Athens against Persia, of Rome against Hannibal, of Holland and England against Spain are proofs of the triumph of democracies when engaged in resisting the oppression of autocracies.

Upon the whole the witness of history supports our faith that democracies do not prepare for war or desire war as readily as autocracies, but that when their liberties are assailed they are capable of a great and generally victorious resistance.

A free nation which has learnt self-government and which respects order and discipline and knows the value of obedience is a companionable nation. The instincts and the character of a free nation tend to make it desire the friendship and not the enmity of other nations. Democracies may be carried away at times by wild unreasoning passion, but they do not make the long and selfish calculation and plans for world-wide domination which are common among autocracies.

We may rightly rejoice that this war is essentially a conflict between democratic and autocratic principles, and may believe that the triumph of democracy would assuredly make for the peace and unity of the civilised world. H. G.

AN EASTERN THINKER ON EDUCATION.

IN the volume of lectures delivered in America, reproduced with the title 'Personality,' Sir Rabindranath Tagore presents us with his views on What is Art? the World of Personality, the Second Birth, Meditation, Woman, and offers a striking essay on 'My School.' He confesses that his school was the product of "daring inexperience," and was started at Bolpur in Bengal, when he was nearly 40 years of age. Tagore is not himself a school-teacher, but an educationist, plunged into educational experiment, into which so many pioneers have been drawn, by the remembrance of their own unhappy schooldays. "Our childhood should be given its full measure of life's draught....This is what our [of course, he is speaking of India] regular type of school ignores with an air of superior wisdom....It [the ordinary school] is a manufactory specially designed for grinding out uniform results." As a child on entering school, Tagore found his (real, i.e., child) world "vanishing from around, giving place to wooden benches and straight walls staring at me with a blank stare....I was not a creation of the schoolmaster—the Government Board of Education was not consulted when I took birth in the world. Was that any reason why they should wreak their vengeance upon me for this oversight of my Creator?" Is it not strange that the demand for freedom for the child to lead a life in accordance with his stage of life comes from a Rousseau, on the very eve of the French Revolution, and in Russia, from a Tolstoi; in India from a Tagore? It is no use ignoring this unity in demand amidst such a variety of human environment.

The delightful glimpses of a C. D. G. Roberts, in his 'Red Fox,' of a youth brought up in complete sympathy with animal life and nature, shows that East and West meet all the world over, in this matter of an education for children, which shall not ignore, but give full play to, child-nature. We rarely realise how artificial child-training has become. Psychologically, educationists learn the value of training observation through the eye. But why not train other sources of nature-knowledge? "I have no hesitation in asserting that the soles of children's feet should not be deprived of their education, provided for them by nature free of cost. Of all the limbs we have they are the best adapted for intimately knowing the earth by their touch." The feet, therefore, "lose their dignity, and are pampered with socks, slippers, and shoes of all prices and shapes and misproportions." But he is a nature lover, and a forest-lover at that. Absolute simplicity and even poverty, he declares to be educative, for "living richly is living mostly by proxy, and thus living in a world of lesser reality."

With education carried on in this freedom-loving, nature-environed, life-developing manner, no point could be of more importance than the choice of teacher. Tagore has had to find two directors of the work of his school, and it is interesting to note the unity underlying educational tendencies is typified by the fact that his first teacher was a Hindu, but his successor is (mirabile dictu) an American. The first, Satish Chandra Roy, barely 19 years of age, was of a poetic temperament, with a wonderfully spontaneous nature, in touch with boyhood at all stages, but alive to all outward nature, and also a lover of the greatest writings of literary genius—who had no "feeling of distrust for boys' capacity to understand. He made his teaching personal, he himself was the source of it, and therefore, it was made of life stuff, easily assimilable by the living human nature. The real reason of his success was his intense interest in life, in ideas, in everything around him, in the boys who came in contact with him." This wonderful teacher read to the boys Shakespeare and even Browning, explaining them in Bengali. If one wishes to gauge this achievement, let us ask when will the teacher in Great Britain (the ruling power over India) be sufficiently in sympathy and knowledge with Hindu classics to interest his class in the ideas of Hindu writers? Of course, it will be said: "It would be absurd."

Well, it is precisely this unthinkable enterprise (and more) that the American, Mr. W. W. Pearson, the successor to the native teacher of Tagore's school, has taken in hand. West meets East. The George Junior Republic of boy-self-government in America is paralleled in the arrangements of the Bolpur school. "It is the boys' own world; they have their place in school administration and their own Courts of Justice." Moreover, it is of importance to remember that the American teacher, Mr. Pearson, has to administer the school in the spirit of a living (Oriental) religion. Tagore says: "Religion is not a fractional thing that can be doled out in fixed weekly or daily measures as one among various subjects in the school syllabus....It is the true centre of gravity of our life." Openairness, simplicity, leisure, space, fresh air are essential for the spiritual, as well as for the physical education.

It has been said that "there is very little that we [in England] could copy" from Tagore. It would be equally true to say that there is a great deal that we should do well to follow. For there is the whole spirit of educational freedom, of aspiration towards human ideals, and of trust. Our schoolboys are trained, in England, in "playing the game," and are often rightly and justifiably placed on their honour. But listen to the account of the boys in Tagore's school: "When an examination takes place the boys may be seen in all sorts of positions writing their answers, even in such inaccessible places as the fork of some high tree....In their examinations they are left to themselves and put on their honour." Such is the Bolpur effort. They confess failures at times, with some boys.

The volume 'Shantiniketan' gives Mr. Pearson's account of the school and its educational principles, whilst the volume 'Personality' contains the important essay of Tagore, 'My School.' The idea of open-airness, physical, moral, and spiritual, and activity directed from the child's point of view, not from that of the State or even of the parent, doubtless has the future before it, and the strikingly interesting point to note is that a fine native humanist of India is united with the best Western educationists, on common ground, and from within his own conditions he shows himself at least as an equal in educational thought.

A STORY OF THE CHRIST-CHILD.

From the Russian.

THE Christ-child's garden roses grew,
And morning, noon and eve
He watered them, that one day He Himself a crown might weave.

Now when the flowers had bloomed, He called
The Hebrew children there;
But they did gather every bloom

"How wilt thou weave thy crown? No rose Thy garden now adorns."
"Ye have forgotten," answered Christ,
"There still remain the thorns."

So with the thorns they wove for him
A pointed crown; and lo!
Instead of roses, round His brow
Bright drops of blood did show.

CORRESPONDENCE.

CHRIST AND THE USE OF FORCE.

To the Editor of THE INQUIRER.

SIR,—I do not suppose that I shall alter Mr. Armstrong's mature and considered opinion in a matter of delicate impression and interpretation. He frankly concedes, indeed, that Christ lays down no rule about the exercise of force by the State; but he assumes that Christ does forbid all use of force by the individual, and argues that the State, being composed of individuals, is bound by the same rule. Neither the argument nor the assumption appears to me to be sound.

1. While I believe that the laws of morality are binding on the State, I cannot admit that their form is precisely the same for the State and the individual. It is, in general opinion, the constant duty of the State to repress crime, but it is not the constant duty of the individual; and, surely, there is a wide moral difference between the punishment of crime by an impartial tribunal, regulated by the general conscience of the community, and the exercise of similar force through private resentment. If this be so the prohibition of the latter does not involve the prohibition of the former.

2. I do not admit that Jesus forbids the individual ever to "repel force with force." The commandment not to resist the evil man is found only in one passage of one Gospel, not, so far as I am aware, "in saying after saying," and is a Greek translation of a remembered Aramaic address, and therefore its application and range, as originally intended, are exposed to some uncertainty. To me it seems that it is equivalent to "Do not be hasty, quarrelsome and revengeful," and in this sense I think it is binding on both the individual and the State. It may also be observed that the word "resist" does not imply force, and, if that word is to be taken literally, Christ's whole career was in deadly opposition to his own precept. Paul boasts that he "resisted" Peter to the face (it is the same word in the Greek, Gal. ii. 11); but there is no suggestion that he struck him.

If any one suppose that the above interpretation is rather lax, let him consider whether Christ intended literally that, if a man did strike a revengeful blow, he was to cut off his offending right hand. We may refer also to the saying: "Think not that I came to send peace on the earth: I came not to send peace, but a sword" (Matt. x. 34), where the "sword" is already softened by Luke into "division" (xii. 51). I think some softening explanation of such vehement sayings is quite legitimate; but if in the one case, why not in the other?

There is, further, evidence of some importance that Jesus never intended to forbid even individual self-defence. According to all the Gospels one of the disciples (according to Luke, two) carried a sword at the Passover. The sword was in all probability intended to defend the party against the robbers who infested the road up from Jericho to Jerusalem, and we must suppose that its use in case of necessity was sanctioned by Jesus. That he would not allow its use against the legal authorities is no evidence against this supposition. Socrates would have done the same, and he was no non-resistant. Jesus, also, according to Luke, gave the strange commandment: "Now....he that hath none, let him sell his cloak, and buy a sword" (xxii. 36). What was the sword to be used for? Or is it figurative? I am inclined to think the latter; but it does not sound like a stern prohibition of self-defence. I think, also, there is some significance in the high encomium bestowed on a Centurion, without the smallest hint that his calling was improper. It is further to be noted that in some of his parables Christ introduces a forceful punishment of evil-doers, as though it was quite the right proceeding.

The point in Romans is not that we are to be passive in the hands of government, but that the government is "a minister of God, an avenger for wrath to him that doeth evil." This certainly seems like an assertion that the State was under a divine obligation to use force for the suppression of crime.

Let me, in conclusion, assure Mr. Armstrong that I have read and re-read his address with high appreciation of its tone and spirit, and would not willingly write a word that could weaken its noble Christian appeal. But on the one point where I was unable to follow him I seemed called upon to indicate, I hope in no carping spirit, that it was possible, in all sincerity, to take a different view.—Yours, &c.,

James Drummond.

Oxford.
July 23, 1917.

To the Editor of The Inquirer.

Sir,—Many will thank Dr. Drummond for his letter of the 14th under this heading. To my mind it recalls a memory of words once spoken by Dr. Martineau at a gathering of ministers. Adverse criticism had been passed on the sayings of Jesus inculcating non-resistance. Martineau's reply, as I have ever remembered it, was to this effect. Suppose an English missionary was carrying on his work among savage tribes, say in Central Africa. Suppose he had won some converts and was desirous of utilising their services in further spreading Christianity. Suppose as he sent them forth among wild and lawless opponents he laid upon them a strict charge not to resist evil by force and to allow no provocation to lead them to retaliate in kind, should we say that such injunctions were either unwise or pusillanimous? How else could such missionaries hope to do anything? Under such conditions the policy of non-resistance was not only wise but the only policy that would not have been hopelessly foolish. The circumstances were essentially the same when Jesus was sending out his first missionaries in Galilee. They were free from all political responsibility, they could do nothing by force, they could do much by non-resistance. But they were Jews steeped in the conviction that the Kingdom of God would be established by force, and that it was their duty to help in the exercise of this force when the time came. The strongest demands of Jesus were therefore necessary to compel them to take the other way. But to treat commands which Jesus laid on special men as he sent them forth for special service as though such commands were essential to all discipleship under totally different conditions, this is indeed unwarrantable.

That Jesus did not mean his words to be turned into a universal proposition, applicable to all times and circumstances, is amply proved by his own conduct. Once, and probably only once, in his life, Jesus had an opportunity of overcoming evil by force, and he immediately took it, overturning the tables of the money-changers and turning the dealers out of the Temple. Had the multitude borne him to power and laid on him political responsibility, it is not in the least likely that he would have continued to advocate unqualified non-resistance. It is not for us to dogmatise on what he would have done under circumstances which did not arise. But this is precisely what is being done by those who assume his authority for what they think right now under the changed conditions of our own times.—Yours, &c.

Parkstone, July 15, 1917.

To the Editor of The Inquirer.

Sir,—It is probable that most of your readers will acquiesce in Dr. James Drummond's judgment as to the relations of New Testament teaching to the right and obligation of a state or nation to carry on war, although I believe it is true that our modern conscientious objectors are following the precedent of the early Christians in refusing all military service. His letter, however, has reminded me that there is another, perhaps even more important, respect in which the so-called "pacificists" misinterpret, or mis-apply, Bible teaching. Some time ago, if I remember, we heard a good deal about the Christian duty of forgiving our enemies. But if there is no passage in the New Testament absolutely condemning war in however just a cause, still less, I venture to think, is there any which advocates the doctrine of unconditional forgiveness. There may be some passages which seem to do so, as that in which Peter asks how often he must forgive his brother's offences, and the Great Teacher answers not only seven times, as the disciple suggested, but seventy times seven. But here Luke gives a turn to the incident as recorded by Matthew, which at once supplies the obviously needed qualification: "If thy brother sin, rebuke him; and if he repent, forgive him. And if he sin against thee seven times in the day, and seven times turn again to thee, saying, I repent; thou shalt forgive him" (Luke xvii. 3, 4). In short, forgiveness without repentance and promise of amendment, whether on the part of an individual or a state, is little else than injustice of the most stupid kind.—Yours, &c.,

Robert B. Drummond.

Edinburgh, July 15, 1917.

To the Editor of The Inquirer.

Sir,—One is surprised to read Dr. Drummond's letter in your issue of the 14th inst. Surely Jesus is clear enough as to the duty of individuals. Is anything plainer than the Sermon on the Mount? Is not the State a collection of individuals, and is not what is true of the one equally true of the mass? Why, then, Dr. Drummond's special pleading? Surely Lord Hugh Cecil is more accurate when he says we should "love" the Germans. Are they not our brothers, singly and as a nation? But it is unpleasant to find him more accurate than one of our important and respected leaders.—Yours, &c.,

To the Editor of The Inquirer.

Sir,—Your note after Mr. Armstrong's letter in Saturday's Inquirer can hardly be allowed to pass without a word of protest. Why should Mr. Armstrong be "grateful" to you for publishing a letter necessitated, not by any uncertainty or ambiguity in the expression of his views as understood by all who either heard or read his impressive address, but by your own "reckless misinterpretation" of his attitude? I imagine your readers will agree with me that the publication of Mr. Armstrong's letter is simply a matter of elementary courtesy; and if gratitude is due one would have thought it was due to Mr. Armstrong from the Editor of The Inquirer.—Yours, &c.,

"FALSE INFERENCES AND WRONG CONCLUSIONS."

To the Editor of The Inquirer.

Sir,—In your leading article with the above heading it appears to me that you are most unfair to Mr. Geo. Armstrong and commence with "a false inference." You say: "We might argue with a far greater show of reason that those who will do nothing to vindicate the liberties of the world against insolent aggression, and leave the weak to be the prey of the spoiler, have forfeited their claim to be the helpers of mankind," and as immediately you go on to quote Mr. Armstrong's words you thereby infer that he is such a pacifist, and my sense of fairplay is at once in revolt. How different was the treatment of Mr. Armstrong in Dr. Drummond's letter in the same issue of THE INQUIRER. That letter I read with thankfulness, as it confirmed my own belief that we need not necessarily feel that in taking the decision to repel force by force we disagreed with our Master. The relations of one state to another Jesus never discussed, and it seems to me almost impossible to say what action he would have taken under existing circumstances. But on the general question of our attitude towards the war, I believe many of us feel more in sympathy with Mr. Armstrong's attitude than with yours. We cannot rejoice, as you suggest, that we have had to take this course, it is with a sense of repugnance that we have been forced to accept this savage and barbarous way of settling international disputes. It is with "grief and humility" we have to admit that no other course was left open to us. I look upon this war as a moral call upon men to perform a hideous duty, and that is the view of it taken by thousands of our noblest and best who are in the army. I know in my own experience of young men who dreaded as a nightmare the coming of the moment when they should be called upon to thrust cold steel into a brother man, to prove their Christianity. The war is a horrible necessity into which this country has been forced, but, for God's sake, do not teach that any man can take part in it except with a sense of loathing!—Yours, &c.,

[Our correspondent is mistaken in his suggestion that we have rejoiced because we have had to go to war. We cannot remember that such a sentiment has ever appeared in our columns, and it is certainly deeply repugnant to our own feelings. The difference upon which we have insisted several times is between a constant harping upon the odiousness of our task, which seems to cloud our vision and cripple our energy, and the confidence of the man of faith who having shouldered a terrible duty proceeds to put into it the full strength of his will and the whole ardour of his soul. Would Garibaldi have won the Sicilian campaign if he had gone into it with a sense of loathing instead of with the joyous confidence of the soldier of freedom?—ED. OF INQUIRER.]

THE RELIGION OF THE FUTURE.

To the Editor of THE INQUIRER.

SIR,—Without doubt many of our forms of prayer do need revision, but does Mr. Vizard seriously think that the utterance of Jesus, "I can of mine own self do nothing," is out of date? If it is, then religion is in a bad way. To suggest that were Jesus now alive he would change it into "I can of mine own self do everything" is well-nigh irreverent, and it runs counter to the experience of all the strongest men who have followed the Nazarene. Mr. Vizard would probably accept Cromwell as a type of human strength, but when he was the most powerful in action he was the readiest to repeat the saying of Jesus, "I can of mine own self do nothing." This cry has not come from the weaklings, but from the strong. No, self-sufficient boasting does not belong to the religious mood.—Yours, &c.,

F. MADDISON.

July 16, 1917.

To the Editor of THE INQUIRER.

SIR,—Mr. Vizard's courteous reply to my criticism and the letter of Mr. Alfred Wilson in your issue of July 14 invite an answer. Mr. Wilson asks whether two facts, the provision of galleries and religious stagnation in 1717, can be reconciled. I think he will find that "great old dissenting chapels with double galleries" dating from that year are not a fact. The "great galleries" also "which disfigure so many ancient parish churches" will be found, in most instances, to be of a later date, though congestion of a district with its demand for increased church accommodation does not necessarily mean a religious revival.

Mr. Vizard has altered his "two centuries" to "three or four," and cites the great number of parish churches in London and other districts as evidence of the assertion that in the sixteenth century "the whole nation attended religious services." I should doubt it; but the proportion of lay attendance at religious services in mediæval times would be difficult to ascertain.

To come to the religion of the future, Mr. Vizard's notion of prayer, which he supposes to be modern, is, indeed, absolutely different from the doctrine of Christ; but is it modern? I fail to see anything in it more modern than the Deism of the eighteenth century, or even the Pelagianism of the fourth century. Much might be written in defence of these positions, but they are not exactly modern. Mr. Vizard suggests that "if Jesus were living to-day he would probably have said: 'I can of mine own self do everything.'" As to that, I think Jesus is living to-day: I recognise him repeatedly; but I should fail to recognise him in the egotistical prig who made such an assertion.—Yours, &c.,

H. G. WELLS AND RECONSTRUCTION.

To the Editor of THE INQUIRER.

SIR,—I regret to see your comment on this matter because it seems to show a lack of appreciation of a really remarkable event. Of course the phrase "reconstruction of God" is wrong, it is the reconstruction of our thought of God, and that is always going on among thoughtful minds which take an interest in the great problems. The necessity is laid upon us to fit all our knowledge into our conception of Deity.

Here is one who has been a sceptic for many years boldly announcing to the world that he has found God, that he finds in Him a dear companion and a friend, and in the transforming light of this great discovery he can no longer live for self, but for the good of all. Surely, this is a remarkable thing. How many could make a similar confession? There is such a thing as knowing God "by report," to use a phrase of Dr. Martineau's, but if our knowledge be of that description it is best, if we have to teach, to use the phraseology of the schools. When, however, our knowledge is of experience the soul has a language of its own, and is independent of external authority.

As I understand Mr. Wells he could enter into the joy of the writer of the 23rd Psalm, but being a twentieth-century Englishman he would not employ the same symbolism. He certainly would not say: "Thou hast anointed my head with oil," nor would he probably desire that a table should be prepared for him in the presence of his enemies. Let not reverence for the past hide from us the divinity of the present.

There is a theological problem advanced by Mr. Wells into which I will not enter, but let the Unitarian professors furbish up their armour, for in the next war of ideas there is ample evidence that their opponents will be numerous and well equipped.—Yours, &c.,

EDWARD CAPLETON.

A MESSAGE TO THE SUNDAY SCHOOL.

A CORRESPONDENT sends us the following address written for a Sunday school anniversary by a young officer at the front:—

You might perhaps like to hear a few words, my dear friends, from an old scholar and teacher on your Anniversary Sunday afternoon, for I am sure you will be thinking of those who are absent to-day, just as they will all be thinking of the Sunday school. We are all trying to do our best to make the world a better place to live in, I hope, whether we are fighting out here, or staying at home in England. You must not think that, because you cannot all come out here to do your bit, you have nothing to do towards helping our country. You can help; and I am going to tell you how.

Be patient, be helpful, be brave;—you must be patient, for things will be worse before the war is over; you must be helpful, because when we help each other everyone gets along ever so much better; you must be brave, because English people are always brave! And above all you must be very regular at Sunday school, and come to service at the Church as often as you can; because that is the only way for you to grow up into really useful people. I can always tell which of my men used to go to Church and Sunday school in England, because they are the best men.

If you were to come out here and stay with me for a little while, you would soon see the use of Sunday schools in helping to make useful men, and in giving us a store of pleasant memories to live on when the present times are not very pleasant. And above all, you would see that the same Heavenly Father whom we worship at home takes care of the boys out here, and he is with us even though we walk "through the valley of the Shadow of Death." So be sure that in his good time we shall have peace on earth once more, and all meet again—either at home, or elsewhere—when all these dreadful wars are over. Meanwhile, it is for you to "carry on" bravely at home, despite all the troubles and dangers which seem to be around us both in England and everywhere else. Perhaps our next Anniversary Sunday will find us back again at home in Peace, with the victory won and the evil conquered; I think it will. So the Sunday school must keep up its numbers and good work, and "Keep the home fires burning till the boys come home."

With very best wishes for renewed prosperity in the next year, your old friend and scholar, S. T.

Our readers will be interested to read the following extract from a letter written by the Rev. H. E. B. Speight (Berkeley, U.S.A.) to an English friend:—

For some little time my services have been loaned by the Church—for what they are worth—to the Red Cross, and I have been visiting towns where till lately there has been no Red Cross organisation, speaking at public meetings, interviewing committees, mayors, ministers, and others to get things started. Now I am to have a vacation, though I do not like to take one just now. We are really in the war now, and it is at last coming home to the American people what war means. I was one of the 10,000,000 men between 21 and 31 (being just inside the limits) to register here in preparation for the selective "draft," but America is wisely avoiding as far as possible having a heavy burden cast on the community for the upkeep of dependent wives and children. How often I have wished I could return and do a little bit somewhere, but without being able to make some kind of provision for my dependents I cannot do it. So I have been trying to do it here, endeavouring to clarify the issues for such people as I reach, trying to organise into effective service the humanity and compassion of people in all parts of this big State. We are just in the midst of our campaign for £20,000,000 for the American Red Cross, having over subscribed the Two Billion Dollar Liberty Loan (about £400,000,000). Truly the great war is teaching us to count by millions and billions, even when we count the dead and wounded. But the dawn that must follow this black night will be one that brings light to all the world and to all generations to come.

A pamphlet I am sending you under separate cover (a speech by the American Chancellor of the Exchequer, though he is not called that) will, if it reaches you, show you the spirit of the American government. And the orderly registration of ten million men for military service, the over subscription of the Liberty Loan, and the generous contributions of a people who are still thousands of miles from actual warfare show that the mass of the people can be counted on to support the Government and, with Mr. Britling, "see it through."

LECTURES FOR SUNDAY SCHOOL TEACHERS.

The Unitarian Home Missionary College, in co-operation with the Manchester District Sunday School Association, is offering the following Lectures for Teachers, to be delivered by the Warden of the College, the Rev. H. McLachlan, M.A., B.D., viz.: (1) 'The Use of the Bible in the Sunday Schools,' four lectures; (2) 'Chapters from the History of Unitarianism in England,' four lectures; (3) 'History as a Subject of Sunday School Teaching,' two lectures; (4) 'The Formation of Teachers' Reference Libraries,' one lecture.

The lectures can be delivered at any centre to the teachers of any affiliated local Union, or groups of teachers from several neighbouring schools, and at any time which can be conveniently arranged between October 1 and December 12, 1917, on payment of travelling expenses only. Mr. McLachlan will also give one lecture on some aspect of Sunday school work at any ordinary quarterly or monthly meeting of the local Sunday School Union by special arrangement. This is a great opportunity for bringing Sunday school teachers into direct contact with the work of the College, and of securing at a minimum of cost such valuable help as will make for greater efficiency in Sunday school instruction, so very important to the welfare of our scholars. Replies must be sent in to the Rev. H. Bodell Smith, Hon. Secretary of the Manchester District Association, not later than August 10, stating what lectures are desired, at what centres, and specifying the dates suggested, in time for the meeting of the Special Committee of the Association, August 14, which has the arrangements in hand.

THE REV. SAMUEL R. CALTHROP.

The death of the Rev. Samuel R. Calthrop, LL.D., at his home in Syracuse on April 11, in the 87th year of his age (says The Christian Register) removed a most unique and picturesque figure from the Unitarian Church. He was one of the splendid Old Guard who bore the banner of the liberal religion through the trying period of the last half of the nineteenth century. For forty-eight years he had been pastor and pastor emeritus of May Memorial Church. Through all these years he was the inspirer of the city's best life. He made the church a centre of light, and a potent influence for civic righteousness. His roots sunk deep into the life of the community. It is hard to think of city or church without him.

His scholarship was broad and deep. All the wisdom of the ancient world was his. His interests were universal. Nothing was alien to him. A ripe scholar, a powerful preacher, a great teacher, a lover of nature, a splendid athlete—he drank deep of the water of life, and was glad in the sheer joy of it. The foundation of his splendid scholarship was laid in the fine old English school of St. Paul's. He was captain of the school for many years. He became Pauline Exhibitioner at Trinity College, Cambridge, and completed the course with highest honours. He could not, however, receive the degree he had so well earned without signing the Thirty-nine Articles of the Church of England. And so, with sturdy independence of thought, he declined it. Speaking of the incident later, he said: "It seems hardly possible that such folly could have been in full power within the span of one man's life, when contrasted with the freedom of to-day. Sometimes I think I will go back and get my degree, for the restrictions are removed now; and yet, what is the use?" He did not have to go back to get his degree. Long years after his graduation his Alma Mater conferred on him the degree of LL.D.; and in 1900 Syracuse University, in the home of his adoption, honoured herself by conferring the same degree.

From the first he had a consuming ambition to preach; but the way did not seem clear, since he could not accept the faith of his fatners. Then, at twenty-two there came to him a searching religious experience, and the way became clear. "It was no sense of my own sin that led to this," he said. "It was a deep sense of the exceeding sinfulness of a bad God. My whole soul rose in protest against this; and at last I said, If God is good I will worship him, serve him, love him; but if he is bad, I absolutely refuse to bow the knee. Then a deep peace and joy fell upon me. I had been very silent, but now I seemed to have the gift of tongues."

This intense, personal realisation of the goodness and love of God became the mainstay of his life and work. It never deserted him. "The light that never was on sea or land" became his guide. His faith was sure and cheery. His trust was absolute. He found the God he worshipped, in flower and star and human hearts. He walked with God as with a companion and a friend.

OXFORD SUMMER MEETING.

The Oxford University Extension Delegacy, although realising that to organise a Summer Meeting of the ordinary type or usual duration at the present time would be inadvisable, deem it important that the Summer Meeting of this year should not be abandoned, and have accordingly decided to hold it from Thursday, August 2, to Tuesday, August 14. For the subject announced for 1917 ('The Near East'), 'The Near Future: Problems of Construction and Reconstruction, Social, Economic, and Educational,' has been substituted, and opportunities will be given for conferences, while attention is specially drawn to the classes which are to be held daily in connection with each of the four main branches of the subject. The inaugural lecture will be delivered in the Sheldonian Theatre on Thursday, August 2, by the Rt. Hon. Herbert Samuel, M.P., late Secretary of State to the Home Department. Among others who have promised to lecture are the Earl of Selborne, Lord Emmott, the Dean of Christ Church, the Master of Balliol, the Rt. Hon. John Hodge, M.P., Mr. J. R. Clynes, M.P., Sir George Newman, Sir Robert Baden Powell, Mr. Cecil Chapman, Miss Constance Smith, Canon Scott Holland, Principal Selbie, and Dr. Jacks. The Duke of Marlborough, Lord Haldane, and Lord Henry Cavendish Bentinck, M.P., will preside over conferences on Imperial Reconstruction, Educational Reconstruction, and Industrial Reorganisation, and special sermons will be preached by the Bishop of Oxford, the Bishop of Winchester, the Rev. W. Hudson Shaw, the Rev. E. A. Burroughs, Dr. Selbie, Dr. Jacks, Dr. Forsyth, and Dr. Carpenter. All inquiries and applications for tickets should be endorsed "Summer Meeting," and addressed to the secretary of the Delegacy, J. A. R. Marriott, Esq., M.A., University Extension Office, Queen's College, Oxford.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Derby.—The Friar Gate congregation have given their minister, the Rev. W. E. George, leave of absence in order that he may engage in Y.M.C.A. work for some months among our soldiers. He will proceed to France at the end of July. With the generous approval of the congregation of the High Pavement Church, Nottingham, the Rev. J. C. Ballantyne has very kindly arranged to conduct the evening services at Friar Gate during Mr. George's absence. This act of friendly sympathy and co-operation is much appreciated by the Derby friends. The morning services will be carried on by lay members and friends of the congregation.

Dundee. — The Rev. Henry Williamson, minister of the Unitarian Church, convener of the Dundee Play Centres Committee and chairman of the Dundee Mill and Factory Workers' Union, is a great advocate of band concerts in the parks to attract the children away from the "sickening streets" in which too much of their time is spent. The development of the play centre movement has, of course, his enthusiastic support, and he expressed his gratification in an interview recently that the Government has listened to the persistent call of those who are interested in child welfare, and that it is now willing to pay half the cost of play centres for children which local Boards may institute. "It is in the winter time, however," he says, "that the School Boards have their great opportunity to tackle this matter. In the winter time the parks have no attraction for the children, and again the streets fill the gap. All the long Saturday, Sunday, and weekday evenings our big public school buildings stand empty, barred to the little ones who need them. Throw open their doors! Call the children to come in and enjoy themselves! Build up roaring fires for the wintry nights! Put capable teachers in charge, and give the 'weans' the means of amusing themselves—toys for the toddlers and tools and games for the older ones! Will they come? None who has gone down some of the miserable streets of our cities on wintry nights and seen the shivering bairns huddling together in some unsanitary 'close' will ask that question. The children will flock in thousands to the schools at night, eager for healthier amusement and cleanliness."

Exeter.—A presentation has been made to the Rev. R. H. U. Bloor, who has been minister of George's Meeting for the last ten years and is shortly leaving Exeter, by the members of the congregation. Mr. E. Lemmon presided, and Mrs. Palmer and Captain Vyvyan presented the gifts, which comprised a silver tea service, some books, and a cheque, and were accompanied by an illuminated scroll containing an address and the names of upwards of a hundred subscribers. The latter said that Mr. Bloor's sermons and lectures had been delightfully instructive. He had kept them at a high level. They had been marked by great thought, deep reasoning, and broad-mindedness. Many of them had been gems of intellectual force and deductions brought out from the store-house of his memory and his poetic spirit. His sermons had never degenerated into discussions on political matters, and there was no trace of that unctious attitude which left a nasty taste. It was difficult, at that moment, to form a true perspective of the value of his contribution to the fullest religious thought, but it would certainly turn out to be very much. It was a great advantage to the congregation that he had been able to get away to the great centres, where he had come into contact with men of letters. He had thus been able to come back with fresh subjects and illustrations for his sermons and lectures. He would be a difficult man to replace. Both Mr. and Mrs. Bloor had endeared themselves to the congregation, whose best wishes would go with them. Mr. C. Matthews, Mrs. Fletcher, Mr. C. Taylor, and the Chairman added their tributes. In reply, the Rev. R. H. U. Bloor said that at George's Chapel he followed a remarkable man, the late Rev. T. Chignell, who was one of these rarities, a genius. In following the steps of Mr. Chignell he felt that one thing he had to do was to try to keep the pulpit of George's up to the high level which his predecessor had established, and what he prided himself on was that some of his firmest supporters were staunch admirers of Mr. Chignell. In conclusion he paid a tribute to officers and helpers at the chapel.

Maidstone.—The congregation of the Unitarian Church has recently purchased land next to the chapel, and also a piece behind the chapel, on which to erect much needed Sunday school buildings and to make necessary alterations and improvements to the old chapel. This was the original desire of the congregation when deciding to build, but the land was not then available. Much satisfaction is now felt that the congregational activity will be continued and extended on the present, central, historic site.

London: Bethnal Green.—A very successful Flower Show and Industrial Exhibition was held at Mansford Street on Wednesday evening, July 25. There were 173 plants and over 50 samples of work exhibited; 39 competitors, arranged in three sections, entered for the table and vase decoration. These were judged by Miss Alice Longhurst, and the plants by Mr. Ellis. The Rev. Henry Gow presided, and the prizes were presented by Mrs. Wallace Bruce.

Newcastle-on-Tyne.—The name of the Rev. Alfred Hall appears in the list of the successful candidates for the Final B.D. of London University published on Saturday.

MARRIAGES.

CHALK—BRIGDEN.—On July 23, at Essex Church, The Mall, London, W., by the Rev. H. Gow, Rev. Percival Chalk, of Banbury, to Gretchen Elisabeth Stovold Brigden, daughter of the late H. Stovold Brigden, of Hove.

JOHNSON—HALL.—On the 18th inst. at St. Mary's Church, Hanwell, by the Rev. W. P. Besley, Canon of St. Paul's, assisted by the Rev. W. Farquhar, Capt. Oscar Johnson, M.C., 15th Cheshire Regt., second son of Mr. and Mrs. T. A. Johnson, West House, Hartford, Cheshire, to Clarice, youngest daughter of the late W. H. Hall and Mrs. Hall, Cuckoo, Hanwell, Middlesex.

DEATHS.

SMITHELLS.—On the 21st inst., at "Rivington," Birkdale, Southport, in her 91st year, Martha, wife of the late James Smithells.

POYNTING.—On the 13th inst., at a nursing home, Southport, Edith Harland, youngest daughter of the late Rev. Thomas Elford Poynting and the late Mrs. Poynting of Monton, near Manchester.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

The address for our Belgian Hospital Fund, to which cheques and parcels of clothing should be sent, is Mrs. Bernard Allen, 14 Gainsborough Gardens, Hampstead, N.W.3.

THE King gave some excellent advice to the cadets at Sandhurst the other day.

> You will soon become commissioned officers in the army [he said]. As such you will occupy a position of the highest responsibility, that of command, in the discharge of which the lives of others may be in your hands. Here at the Royal Military College you have learnt the first principles of command, namely, to obey. Discipline is the bedrock of the whole military structure ; without it an army is worse than useless. It is the growth of steady training, and above all of mutual confidence between officers and their men. Always try to realise the individual characteristics of those you command ; study their interests, supply their wants, ask nothing of them you are not ready to do yourself. This war has shown with what devotion officers and men have stood by one another to the death.

These are words which apply with almost equal force over the whole area of our social life. In no sphere of human activity can we enjoy the blessings of freedom unless we are prepared to pay the price of discipline and obedience.

AMID the warfare of speeches there is something distinctly refreshing in Mr. Lansing's blunt declaration. "There is but one way to restore the peace of the world," he said, "and that is by overcoming the physical might of German imperialism by force of arms." This is no doubt a hard truth for the people who cling to the belief that some satisfactory way out can be found by negotiation before the German mind has ceased to idolise its invincible military power. When once it is recognised that the idol has feet of clay there will probably be a political revolution in Germany and the Kaiser's heroics about a war for the defence of the fatherland will fall upon deaf ears. But there is little chance of driving this conviction home in the midst of a great war except by a signal defeat, the one conclusive form of argument which a military nation understands. It is to achieve this end, and not for any purposes of conquest or vindictive punishment that our soldiers are fighting in Flanders.

MR. BALFOUR'S speech on Monday night upon our aims in the war was rich in political wisdom. He refused to commit himself and the Government to the precise details of a settlement in the Near East, which must depend upon endless circumstances of great complexity. "How can we go into details," he asked, "and anticipate now the work that will have to be done by the final Peace Congress ?" On one matter he ventured to be more precise. He insisted that we who entered the war with little in our mind besides the necessity of defending Belgium, and the necessity of preventing France being crushed before our eyes, must support France while she fights for Alsace and Lorraine. "I do not see," he said, "how anybody who has supported France, believed in France, can doubt that we must go on supporting, believing in, and helping France to restore herself to what she was before the attack engineered against her by Bismarck in 1870." But for the rest he deprecated the attempt to urge the Government to go into details about future arrangements, which do not depend upon ourselves alone or upon the Government of any other single State. "We are dealing," he said, "with forces far too great, far too complex, to be dealt with in that manner. What we have got to do is to make clear to the world that we are not fighting for fighting's sake."

THERE must be stern protest against the riotous behaviour which resulted in the wrecking of the Brotherhood Church in Southgate Road last Saturday, and it must not be weakened from any fear that it may be misinterpreted into sympathy with the opinions of the promoters of the meeting. It is impossible to punish a mob, and it is useless to blame the police in circumstances where they might have been overpowered, unless there is strong evidence that they failed in their duty. But ringleaders can be prosecuted if they are known, and the soldiers who were implicated should be punished severely by the military authorities. There are always people spoiling for a row or easily inflamed by senseless cries of violence. Let all good and loyal citizens set their faces like flint against every form of outrage and disorder.

THE welcome announcement has been made that after some delay the German authorities have accepted the scheme, recommended by the recent conference at the Hague, for mitigating the hardships of prisoners of war. There is nothing sensational about what has been achieved, but various causes of petty annoyance will be abolished, punishment for the offence of attempting to escape will not be so severe, steps will be taken to ensure the speedy delivery of parcels, and most important of all there will be a large extension of the system of internment in neutral countries. For the latter purpose Holland has offered to place 16,000 places for military and civilian prisoners at the disposal of the two Governments. Of these 7,500 are to be allotted to invalid combatants, 6,500 to officers and non-commissioned officers who have been in captivity for eighteen months, and 2,000 to civilian invalids, 1,600 of whom will be German and 400 British. The request of the British delegates that privates should be included amongst those interned on the ground that they have been eighteen months in captivity was refused. According to Lord Newton the reason for this refusal may be found in the fact that the Germans have no intention of parting with any one who can work. It is gratifying to learn that practically no complaint was made in regard to the treatment of prisoners in this country.

WE have been asked to call the attention of our clerical readers to the special course for ministers, which it is proposed to hold at Manchester College, Oxford, next term. The closing down of the activities of the College owing to the demands of military service has given it an opportunity of rendering important service to older men. We have often wished that it could be regarded as part of the function of a theological college to receive its old students back, say once in every ten years, for a period of thought and study and religious meditation. We are certain that many men would welcome this kind of help, if it were offered to them. Minds grown dull with the long strain of work would become fresh and keen again, and preaching would gain in intellectual breadth and power.

AT the present time the difficulties in the way of attendance, especially in the autumn term, are very great. The busy minister, who craves for just this kind of spiritual help and mental refreshment, is probably tied down by Red Cross work, or hospital visiting or some other form of national service, which he cannot possibly neglect. We understand, however, that some names have been received already. Dr. Jacks, who is very anxious to make the scheme a success, cannot complete his arrangements until he knows whether it will receive adequate support. Accordingly ministers who wish to attend are requested to make their intention known at once. All letters on the subject should be addressed to the Rev. H. Gow, 12 Glenloch Road, Hampstead, N.W.3.

IN our issue for July 21 we inserted a letter from Mr. G. G. Armstrong, in which he emphatically repudiated as unfair and inaccurate our criticism of the previous week. To that letter we appended the following note: "We are sorry if we have misinterpreted Mr. Armstrong's attitude, but we certainly think his choice of language was unfortunate." This was intended as an expression of regret for any error into which we may have fallen. Unfortunately we added the ambiguous remark, "In any case we hope that he will be grateful to us for giving him an opportunity of making his position clear." Of course we did not mean anything so ridiculous as that any writer should be grateful for the publication of a letter correcting a mistake. We simply intended to suggest that the necessity of correcting us had given Mr. Armstrong a welcome opportunity of stating his own position with fresh clearness and force. But we see that the words were capable of being read in another way and even of causing some irritation. In these circumstances we wish to repeat without any qualifying remarks our expression of regret that we put upon Mr. Armstrong's words an interpretation which upon closer scrutiny we do not think they can legitimately bear. With this statement we must ask our readers to regard the controversy as closed.

IN THE DAY OF BATTLE AND WAR.

WHILE our soldiers are engaged in one of the most critical battles of the war in Flanders, we their friends and fellow-citizens at home must consecrate ourselves anew to the common cause of freedom and right. It is ours as well as theirs, and if we are worthy we shall serve it with the full vigour of our manhood and womanhood, laying aside all selfish fears and weakening anxieties and giving to it the strength of life's most precious gifts. It needs for its success not only money and time and labour, and the abandonment of many things which at other times are profitable and good, but also all our spiritual powers, the sense of dedication to duty, sympathy which never falters in the cause of the wronged and the oppressed, the ardour which is kindled by the presence in the soul of glorious hopes for men.

For three years this terrible struggle has gone on. For three years it has tested our courage and endurance night and day. So far we have come through the fiery trial without any wavering of purpose. The country as a whole is as deeply convinced of the righteousness of its cause and of the need of going on till victory is won, as it was in the first wonderful days when the whole youth of the nation rose up in its strength to fight. But it would be rash to say that in no direction has the national spirit suffered loss. Anxiety and sorrow have done their work. In the babel of tongues it has been hard to keep our purpose simple and clear. The clash of competing policies and the infirmities of human temper have made us less buoyant than we were. In all this there is nothing for either surprise or dismay. It is always so when irksome duties are prolonged. They wear down our strength. They are a continual drain upon our reserves of character and faith. But there is an unfailing source of renewal open to all who have the wisdom to use it. We can take this heavy burden of our duty and care, this sense of failure in ourselves to be strong in courage and fervent in hope into the presence of God. In His light we see our unfulfilled purpose stretching away before us, claiming from us all that we have to give. In the joy of His countenance we recover the power to find His will for us, shining through all the darkness and terror from which we shrink. It is not the task of religion at the present time to pronounce with an infallible voice upon every programme of war and peace which is submitted to our judgment. It has the higher duty of helping us to escape from the snares of our own depression and self-will, to scatter the darkness which clouds the mind and numbs the will, and to inspire us with the confidence that what it was right for us to begin it is our plain duty to bring to a good end. To-day in our services of commemoration, it is this gift of simplicity of purpose which more than any other we need to ask. Let there be a note of confidence in our praise. "Be strong and of a good courage, for the Lord thy God is with thee."

But even as we write these words we are conscious of something a little unworthy. For what are we, that we should be absorbed by the sense of our own need? Our chief thought must be one of abounding gratitude. We have seen great things, and for us great things have been done. First of all we commemorate with gladness of heart the noble army of men, our own brothers and friends, who have laid down their lives to defend their homes and to establish freedom in the earth. We do not pity the immortal dead. They did their duty and they have received their reward. To us they have left a shining example of courage and faithfulness, and the sacred trust that the cause for which they died shall triumph in the hands of those who survive. Next we remember all who are gathered into the sacred fellowship of sorrow. Never before has sorrow been such a mighty leveller. Never surely before has it received such royal welcome as a noble guest. Human hearts have been too unselfish to break. How the words have echoed from home to home "Are you not proud of your boys"; and when they have been taken away from us their memory has been honoured by a more passionate service of human need. To escape from the idle luxury of grief and to do something worthy of them, that has been the absorbing care. Lastly we pay our homage to all who have poured out their strength like water often in very dull tasks at home, and especially to the women of our land who have served with the discipline and faithfulness of soldiers in the field. Germany willed it so, that the whole nation must be mobilised to resist her aggression, and without a word of grudging complaint our women have flocked to the post of duty as nurses and munition workers, as government clerks and bus conductors and railway porters and agricultural labourers. Their high looks and their indomitable cheerfulness show how well they understand what they are doing. A cause which is able to arouse this spirit of dedicated service has the secret of victory in its hands.

In comparison with all this practical activity the man who wields a pen may seem to have a very inconspicuous part to play. He cannot be satisfied with repeating the old adage that the pen is mightier than the sword, for very often it is not true; but happily for himself he knows that he can help to mobilise the forces of the mind and direct them into channels of public usefulness. It is impossible for any one who accepts the responsibility of writing for the public at the present time to escape from the duties of a combatant. Just because he has readers, and his words enter into their minds, he is helping in some degree to determine the atmosphere of confidence and hope, or of doubt and tangled misgiving, with which they face the common enemy and perform their daily tasks. When the time came for The Inquirer to determine what its own policy in the combat should be, one thing was quite clear. It was impossible for the editor, looking into his own mind and judging as carefully as he could the religious needs and the moral dangers of the situation, either to sit on the fence or to play the part of a trimmer. And so he threw his whole strength into the mightiest combat between right and wrong in the history of the world, with what degree of moral insight and chivalrous feeling and personal loyalty to the supreme interests of liberty and religion it must be left to others to judge.

In two directions in particular, our policy has been quite firm and definite. We see no reason to regret it, nor do we think that the need for this special kind of emphasis has passed away. We have paid a good deal of attention to the question of international friendship, but to the surprise of some of our readers, instead of putting Germany in the centre of the picture, we have claimed this place for Belgium and France, the two neighbours with whom we have exceptional opportunities of laying, broad and deep, the foundations of a good understanding. The task of piecing together our broken friendship with Germany must be left till the passions of war have had time to cool, but with our Allies the case is entirely different. It is out of our present alliance that any future league or federation of free nations must spring; but an alliance of this kind will not blossom of itself into cordial friendship. It requires vigilance and tact and intellectual sympathy and fellowship in good works. It is a source of deep gratitude and delight to us that through the Belgian Hospital Fund, so admirably organised by Mrs. Bernard Allen, we have been able to help our readers to enter into personal relations of helpfulness and goodwill with the outraged people of Belgium. In present circumstances the Christian man is bound to pay more attention to good works of this kind than to theories of friendship or schemes of future co-operation.

The other matter which we have in mind is concerned with the moral dangers to which we ourselves are exposed. Here again some of our readers have been surprised that instead of rebuking the spirit of hate we have warned them against weariness in well-doing and half-hearted service of our cause. Our policy in this matter has been determined by some knowledge of our constituency. There are people of ungoverned temper and fiery passions for whom the warning against blood-lust and revenge is necessary; but it is difficult to frame a picture of a company of Unitarians and liberal Christians swept off their feet by a storm of hatred or gloating over the sufferings of their foes. Our own experience does not teach us that it is to that kind of danger that we are specially exposed. If we mistake not our own prevalent weakness lies in the direction of a balanced mind which dislikes sharp and stern decisions, a fondness for cultivating our own garden—sometimes at the expense of larger public duties—and a tendency to trust too much to the virtue of abstract phrases and sentimental visions of brotherhood and peace. It is against the corrosion of doubt, the preference of argument to action, and the deceitfulness of high-sounding words, which cause us to fret under the yoke of our warlike duties or tempt us to serve our cause with only half our mind, that people of our religious temperament have to be specially on their guard.

And so let it be with high courage and good hope that we turn down another page of our national history. Shall this fourth year upon which we have just entered be filled with the annals of war, or shall it also see the beginnings of peace? Who of us in this mighty cataclysm can foretell the times and the seasons either of God's action or of man's repentance? We are engaged in a struggle of deliverance from which there can be no turning back till the end is accomplished. We shall put into it all the strength of mind and heart and will, keeping nothing back, if we want the end to come quickly.

THE GLORY OF THE LORD.

When the soul is weary with the cares and frets of life, the turmoil and feverish pleasures of great cities, calm descends upon the spirit if eyes be uplifted to the splendours of the heavens. There, as great masses of clouds sweep over them, soft and white as the breasts of doves or tinged with rose like the petals of wild anemones, the watcher feels the fever of living receding, and gladness and wonder taking its place. His eyes begin to discern the wondrous pictures the Supreme Artist has painted for earth's little children. The gorgeous colours spread out so lavishly. The purple and grey of angry storm-clouds, marvellously gashed by vivid lightning, as they sweep low and threatening over the swaying, wind-swept trees. The flame of sunrise, rose-red and tender yellow when the sun springs up in the morning awakening the sleeping world. Wonderful early hours, when meadows are dew-pearled, and the lark leaves her watery nest to sing pæans of praise at the very gates of heaven. Clear and sweet is the air, and fresh with a delicious coolness, unsoiled by the scents and sounds of the later hours of the day.

From hour to hour the Great Painter is at work unfolding one picture after another, never weary, never the same. The noonday skies blue with a quivering depth and clearness, the pigment of which no earthly painter has yet discovered the secret nor can ever hope to emulate, is flecked with little white clouds like blown feathers which float across the blue expanse soft as thistledown, rise and float by and vanish into the far horizon, lest the deep blue prove too much for the aching eye.

The late afternoon once more changes the great pictures and the colours again vary. The translucence of early morning gives place to a deeper colouring until the sunset hour once more sets the heavens ablaze with unimagined splendour, a mantle of orange and purple, crimson and gold, spread out for the departing sun. Even now the Artist has not finished His work, for, as the glory of day fades away, He prepares His children for the quiet night by lessening his colours, turning the crimson and gold into tender tones of silver and grey, that over the spirit may steal quietness and peace. And as quiet descends, arises, chaste and austere, the silver moon, drawing her purple mantle around her, and to her severe beauty the Artist adds golden star flowers to spangle the meadows of heaven. Yet at whiles, lest there be too much of such rare loveliness, He hides her away in billows of velvet clouds and but faintly flecks the heavens with the dim light of stars. Look upwards when you will, at what hour you will, day by day, year in, year out, always and always the pictures differ. Though man seeks to destroy the beauty wrought by his own hands, though he drenches the world in the blood of the innocent and guilty alike, though the country through which he strides is wrecked by him, and ruin stares in the face those who follow after him, yet the heavens withstand him, and there is none too poor to enjoy, to be calmed and uplifted if he choose but to raise his eyes from the sodden earth to where, through all and in spite of all, "the heavens proclaim the glory of the Lord." Here in the West as there in the East. In the cold North where the Aurora Borealis makes glad the wintry skies with its wild and wonderous beauty, to the hot South where the sun rises up "like thunder" as he leaps suddenly into heaven with no gentle dawn to delay the break of day. The heavens alone are steadfast in their glory. Each picture as it arises proclaims in colours which glow, in colours which fade from one tender tint into the other, in colours which are sombre and wild, the glory and power and might and majesty of the Great Artist. Here is something which cannot be taken away from us. Poor and lonely though some of us be, weary with the burden of years, bowed down by grief and pain, yet we have but to lift our eyes and open our hearts to behold the glory prepared for us, prepared with no niggard hand, with no half-gift, no grudging, but spread out greatly, royally, graciously for us, that if only for a little while our souls may be uplifted, and we find, like a great, cool draught to fevered lips, refreshment and calm, and forgetfulness of the things which trouble us now.

"I will lift up mine eyes to the hills," sang one of old; but the hills may be shattered and defaced by human ingenuity; the heavens alone are ever secure from defilement. As they were in the beginning, as they will be until Time itself ceases to be, the heavens, as of old, will continue to proclaim the glory and power and majesty of the Lord.

OURSELVES AND THE PEOPLE OF GERMANY.

To the Editor of The Inquirer.

Sir,—Mr. Ellis in his letter in this week's Inquirer says: "Is not the State a collection of individuals, and is not what is true of the one equally true for the mass?" I should answer at any rate in the case of Germany, most emphatically, No. Certainly it should be so, but we know that under present conditions the masses in Germany have no control over the affairs of State. These are regulated by a few rulers and princes, and they alone have power to make peace or war; these same "rulers and princes" for whom we pray and pray in vain! We are fighting for the German people, not against them. The terrible irony of the whole thing is that we must spill the blood of the innocent people to destroy the evil power of their guilty rulers. It is the confusion of the individual with the State that drives so many people to an altogether unwarrantable hatred of the Germans as individuals. We should rather pity them.

I have lived in Germany for several years with German people and in German society, and I know they are no worse in their character or ways of life than the individuals of the allied nations fighting against them. We have our faults and virtues, so have they. Their faults and virtues are not the same as ours, but they do not balance on the wrong side any more than ours do. No doubt their long bondage to an autocratic rule has confused their sense of patriotism to their fatherland with patriotism to their rulers, and has had an evil effect on them in war-time. To my mind, in a perfect world flag-waving patriotism can have no place. There can be no peace on earth till the whole world is "common land" with a world parliament, the members of which shall be delegates elected from all countries and which shall make laws and rule over the affairs of the world as one state. Meanwhile we must fight on till we have emancipated Germany and Russia from evil rule and evil influences, but let us see to ti that our attitude of fighting for the freedom and happiness of the world as a whole be genuine. Let us struggle to apply Christian principles to the so-called reconstruction after the war of which we hear so much. Let us try to lead civilisation in the direc tion of a world state and not add to the hostile barriers between the nations by too many tariffs, trade restrictions, and the like, which are nothing more nor less than reactionary measures.—Yours, &c.,

BOOKS AND REVIEWS.

PROF. PRINGLE-PATTISON'S GIFFORD LECTURES.

The Idea of God in the Light of Recent Philosophy: Gifford Lectures 1912 and 1913. By A. Seth Pringle-Pattison, LL.D., D.C.L. Oxford: at the Clarendon Press. 12*s.* 6*d.* net.

The predominant feeling left by the reading of this important book is one of mingled hope and regret. Hope is inspired because so much ground is cleared of obstruction; so excellent a survey is made of the estate to be developed; so many illusions are dissipated; so many dogmatic half-truths are redeemed from falsehood by sympathetic reinterpretation. But the feeling of regret abides because the obstructions cleared away are so largely the product of earlier philosophy, and we feel, ought never to have been there; the survey of the estate shows that its value has been largely missed because it has been to a great extent used as a convenient place into which to shoot rubbish, instead of a place for systematic cultivation. We rejoice as we feel philosophy, in the hands of Prof. Pringle-Pattison, leading us forward and inward to the assimilation of reality and the vision of truth; we cannot but feel discouraged that the process requires so much effort and argument for the laying of ghosts that have been raised by philosophy itself. The fault—if fault there be—is not the author's: it is inherent in the structure of human philosophy as man's "blundering quest" for the systematic interpretation of the universe. Those who understand the true function of philosophy as being something more than the grown man's substitute for the fairy tales of childhood, will be grateful to Prof. Pringle-Pattison for his resolute and largely successful effort to shake himself free from the false abstractions and mere metaphysical subtleties which have often done so much to hamper the work of philosophy as an instrument of value for the actual enrichment of life and experience.

The lectures open with an analysis of Hume's 'Dialogues concerning Natural Religion.' The futility of its conclusion—that there is undoubtedly a God, but that this affirmation "affords no inference that affects human life, or can be the source of any action or forbearance"—points us on beyond itself to the central and fruitful category of intrinsic value as the indispensable guide in all theological or cosmic reasoning. "It is the question of value alone," we read in Lecture II. dealing with Kant's contribution to the subject, "with which we are concerned; and I think we may say without hesitation that, apart from the emotions which they may awaken in a rational spectator, the kaleidoscopic transformations of external nature possess in themselves no trace of that intrinsic value which must belong to what Kant calls an end in itself....apart from conscious results which the process may condition it is hard to see what interest lies for God or man in the infinite shiftings of the cosmic dust."

With the value-judgment firmly established as our guiding principle we pass over a wide field of facts, interpretations, and experiences in our quest for the idea of God. At times the question begins to arise, as we are plunged into biological and metaphysical problems and controversies, whether we are forgetting the object of our journey in contemplation of the scenery and events on our way: but with unerring skill and delightful sympathy the author extracts from every phase of experience that is traversed just what is relevant to the subject; and we gradually find (to vary the metaphor) that a substantial foundation is being well and truly laid for the erection of an enduring structure. Nothing, we realise afresh, in all the universe but what, in some aspect, has its contribution to offer in the articulation of an adequate idea of God. It is extremely refreshing to be brought—not indeed back, rather forward—to a view of Nature and knowledge which respects the essential reliability of the normally disciplined understanding. Prof. Pringle-Pattison convincingly disposes of the epistemological bogey that man's sense apparatus and cognitive faculties debar him from knowing things as they are: "this problem," he says, "with all the varieties of subjective idealism, agnosticism, phenomenalism, and sceptical relativism to which it has given rise, depends upon the presupposition of a finished world, as an independently existing fact, and an equally independent knower equipped, from heaven knows where, with a peculiar apparatus of faculties," with the result that "do what we may our faculties get between us and the things, and we never know anything as it really is." To which the reply is: "This persistent mystification depends largely, I urge, upon extruding man from the world he seeks to know. If we keep steadily in view the fact that man is from the beginning to the end, even qua knower, a member, and as it were an organ of the universe, knowledge will appear to us in a more natural light, and we shall not be tempted to open this miraculous chasm between the knower and the realities which he knows." Throughout this note is insistently struck—" appearances are our only clue to reality. It is in developing what we find there, not in passing away from it, and condemning it as illusion, that we may hope to form some conception of an absolute or perfect life."

The importance for theology of disposing of this epistemological bogey is obvious. " Among the foolish are enrolled not a few philosophical writers who clamour for a knowledge of God, not as He reveals Himself in nature and in human experience, but as something to be known, it would seem, directly, apart from His manifestation altogether." But once it is realised that knowledge is not a veil which screens reality from us, but an essential process in the development of the universe towards self-fulfilment and a greater degree of reality, such a demand stands revealed as the merest folly. We can know God, and we can only know God, in His manifestation. To speculate about a God existing in isolated self-sufficiency before the creation of the universe is simply to hypostatise a barren abstraction. The only grounds we have for affirming anything concerning God are in the manifestations of external nature and human experience—and these grounds do not provide us with anything to affirm or deny about a supposed Deity out of relation with the universe and experience.

The writer truly says in the concluding lecture : " If we are to reach any credible theory of the relations of God and man, the traditional idea of God must be profoundly transformed," and we feel as we turn over the last page that if only those who are responsible for conveying the idea of God to the popular mind could read and understand this volume, its author would have helped not a little in effecting the necessary profound transformation. Very significant and suggestive is the brief reference to the Christian doctrine of the Incarnation. " Few things," we read, " are more disheartening to the philosophical student of religion than the way in which the implications of the doctrine of the Incarnation are evaded in popular theology by dividing the functions of Deity between the Father and the Son, conceived practically as two distinct personalities or centres of consciousness, the Father perpetuating the old monarchical ideal, and the incarnation of the Son being limited to a single historical individual. Grosser still, however, is the materialism which has succeeded in transforming the profound doctrine of the Spirit, as the ultimate expression of the unity and communion of God and man, into the notion of another distinct Being, a third centre of consciousness mysteriously united with the other two." The truth which we come to envisage in its bold, grand outline, if not yet in much wealth of detail, as we sympathetically follow Prof. Pringle-Pattison in his far-reaching inquiry is expressed in one word : " Immanuel." We pass alike from the old barren and abstract theocentric standpoint, and from the fashionable and futile anthropocentric standpoint, to the rich, real, concrete view which has been somewhat cumbrously called the anthropotheistic ; which simply means that " they shall call His name Immanuel, which is, being interpreted, God with us."

MEMORIAL NOTICES.

MR. ALFRED CLARKE, J.P.

We regret to have to record the death of Mr. Alfred Clarke, J.P., at the advanced age of 85 years, which occurred at his residence in Clapton. Mr. Clarke had been a member of the New Gravel Pit Church, Chatham Place, Hackney, for a number of years, and was Deputy-Treasurer at the time of his death. Until his illness he was a most regular attendant at the services of the church, and had always taken the greatest interest in the many social and educational institutions connected therewith. He was for a long time prominently connected with the city firm of Messrs. Morley, Ltd. Since his retirement he had identified himself with public work in many and various ways : he was a Justice of the Peace for the Tower Division, Chairman and Treasurer of the Central Hackney Liberal Association, and was always to the fore at political meetings and contests in the district. He was a member of the Council of the London Liberal Federation and of the National Liberal Club, Treasurer of the Clapton Blind School, and Chairman of his local division of L.C.C. School Managers. He served on the committees of several local charities, and was a life governor of the Queen's Hospital for Children. He was a regular attendant on the Bench, where he displayed unswerving views of justice, always tempered with mercy and gentle courtesy. In fact, his activities, considering his great age, were so amazing that he seemed to have discovered the secret of perpetual youth.

The funeral took place at Chingford Mount Cemetery, where the service was conducted by the Rector of Hackney (tne Rev. H. Mosley, M.A.) and the Rev. Bertram Lister, M.A., the minister of the New Gravel Pit Church. In addition to Mr. Clarke's relatives and personal friends, there were present Sir Albert Spicer, Bart,, M.P., P.C., and Lady Spicer, members of the Hackney Borough Council and of the New Gravel Pit Church Committee, and representatives of many institutions with which Mr. Clarke had been connected.

A service in commemoration of the life and work of Mr. Clarke was conducted by the minister, the Rev. Bertram Lister, at he New Gravel Pit Church last Sunday. Among those present were the Mayor of Hackney (Mr. L. Stanley Johnson, J.P.), Sir Albert and Lady Spicer, members of Mr. Clarke's household, and a large number of his personal friends. Mr. Lister took for the text of his sermon the motto adopted by Mr. Clarke : " What doth the Lord require of thee, but to do justly, to love mercy, and to walk humbly with thy God." Mr. Clarke, he said, would always serve as a type of the true English gentleman, and was a living example of what can be done by one man.

MRS. ARTHUR ATKINS.

The death of Mrs. Arthur Atkins of Middlefield, Hinckley, took place suddenly on Wednesday, July 18, while on a visit to the home of her son, Lieut.-Col. E. C. Atkins, at Stretton Baskerville. On the following Saturday her body was interred at the Hinckley Cemetery. Prior to the interment, a funeral service was held at the Great Meeting, conducted by the minister, the Rev. H. H. C. Jones.

Mrs. Atkins was in her 77th year, and, though in failing health for some time, was a regular worshipper at the Great Meeting. Her late husband, Mr. Arthur Atkins, one of the four brothers who did so much for the Unitarian cause in Hinckley, died in 1882. In the same year the Great Meeting was reopened in memory of him, as a crowning of his unwearied efforts to that end. The period following on this was one of much effort and sacrifice on the part of a loyal few, and among these the late Mrs. Atkins figured prominently. She was fervid in her activity in every department of the church life as long as strength permitted, and when this failed, her interest, influence, and support were not abated, and one of the consolations of her later years was that the church in Hinckley was now full of life and vigour. She was of a gentle and unassuming disposition, abounding in sympathy and charity. Loving and loved by all, she remained the same beautiful character unto the end. Mrs. Atkins leaves four sons, three daughters, many relatives, and a large circle of friends to mourn her death.

On Sunday, July 22, Memorial Services were conducted at the Great Meeting by the Rev. H. H. C. Jones. Special hymns were sung to music composed by the late Hugh Atkins.

THE SUSTENTATION FUND.

The following final Report has just been issued by the Special Appeal Committee to every donor to the Fund :—

It will be remembered that when the Special Appeal on behalf of the Sustentation Fund was made in April, 1912, donors were given the opportunity of fulfilling their promises at their own convenience within a period of five years. This period has expired, and the time has now arrived to supplement the report and list of donations promised, issued by the Committee in July, 1914.

Up to June 30, 1914, £50,473 16*s.* 1*d.* had been promised, of which £7,383 15*s.* 8*d.* remained outstanding. Almost immediately after the Report was issued, war broke out, and the Committee were naturally anxious as to the result this might have upon the Appeal. Happily, it has been quite inappreciable. A few further donations amounting to £39 7*s.* have been made, and with the exception of £173 10*s.* the full amount promised has been actually received. Some friends who are responsible for more than half the sum outstanding are at present unable to fulfil their promises, but have agreed to pay their donations direct to the Sustentation Fund as soon as possible. Others may be expected to follow their example, and if they do, then all promises will be fulfilled with the exception of £29 5*s.* written off for various reasons, and the Fund will have realised in all (including interest £1,819 1*s.* 5*d.*) £52,141 3*s.* 4*d.* To this should be added new or increased annual subscriptions of £109 1*s.* 6*d.*

It may be mentioned as an incidental but not unsubstantial result of the war, that the Sustentation Fund has been able to invest a considerable sum on much better terms than were originally anticipated.

The Treasurer's complete statement, duly audited, accompanies this Report.

The friends who have united in this great effort may congratulate themselves on their good fortune in having launched the scheme at such an opportune moment, as it was impossible then to foresee the terrible calamity which has since befallen the world. We may further rejoice that, notwithstanding the disastrous war, the promised donations have practically all been paid, and some credit may be taken for the fact that the working expenses of the Fund have only amounted to £151 9*s.* 2*d.* being 5*s.* 9½*d.* per cent of the amount raised.

The last word of the Committee before dissolving itself must be one of renewed acknowledgment of the prompt and splendid generosity with which it has been supported, and of best wishes for the increasing usefulness of the Sustentation Fund, which it has been at once a pleasure and a privilege to assist. On the Board of Managers (to which the National Conference and the British and Foreign Unitarian Association now appoint representatives) there will rest, especially during the next few years, a much greater responsibility than hitherto for the well-being of our ministry and churches.

Signed on behalf of the Special Committee,

Hugh R. Rathbone, Chairman.
H. Enfield Dowson, Vice-Chairman.
F. W. Monks, Treasurer.
James Harwood, Hon Secretary.

A FUNERAL SERVICE AT THE FRONT.

In a recent letter home, the Rev. Mortimer Rowe (now serving with the R.A.M.C. in France) relates the following experience: "....Last night about 8 o'clock the request came to us to provide four men to bury a man of the regiment to which we are now attached, owing to the "Pioneers" being busy elsewhere. I went, and at the corporal's suggestion, no officer or chaplain being with us, agreed to conduct service. The grave was ready just behind the lines. We were delayed just as we reached the place by the advent of three or four shells, the first one so short a distance to our rear—perhaps 40 yards—that we discreetly lowered the stretcher and sought cover close by to see what next? However, it ended with the third, and we buried the lad decently just as sunset was passing into dusk. I had no proper service with me, of course, but from my little booklet of readings I had hastily compiled one during our walk through the trenches—the 23rd Psalm and a few verses from St. John, "Greater love hath no man than this...." and from St. Paul "The things that are seen are temporal.... If our earthly house of this tabernacle be dissolved...." : then the committal sentences from memory, the Lord's Prayer, and the Benediction. Just 4 or 5 minutes, but better than a bare burial, which is all that can be given in so many cases. I know this will interest you—the first occasion when the professional minister of religion came through the temporary khaki."

THE CONDITION OF REPENTANCE.

Referring to the final sentence of the letter of the Rev. Robert B. Drummond printed in last week's Inquirer, a correspondent sends us the following quotation from 'Daniel Evelyn, Heretic,' by Cadvan Rhys :—

In their discussions she had begun to realise the futility of quoting Scripture with a view to confuting his arguments and convince him of the danger of drifting into hopeless scepticism; for in opposition to every passage she cited to prove the imperative importance of "believing" in the validity of the current theological opinions, he would adroitly cite another from the same source which seemed to support the contrary view, thus verifying the profane assertion, which she had sometimes heard, that every shade of heresy as well as every form of orthodoxy is capable of being upheld by appeal to the authority of the Bible. Dorcas had also heard her father say that the Devil himself knew how to quote scripture when it suited his purpose so to do.

On one occasion, she thus gently expostulated with her lover :—

"You know, Gwilym dear, what the Bible says, 'Vengeance is mine, saith the Lord!'"

"True," was Gwilym's reply; "but there are numerous instances in the Bible itself of men who were supposed to be good actually wreaking vengeance on those who had wronged them, while the Lord himself helped them! For instance, there is the case of Elisha the prophet, who effectually imprecated the Lord's curse on some little children who had mocked him, when bears emerged from an adjoining wood and devoured no fewer than forty-two of them! Besides, we read also in the Bible that even Jesus himself wreaked his vengeance on a fig-tree because it had no fruit upon it, although it was not the time for fruit!"

This style of argument was very distasteful to Dorcas Rees; in order therefore to obviate the necessity for Gwilym to descend to sheer profanity, as she thought, she had wisely given up appealing to the authority of the Bible, and had now decided to try that of the modern poets, to whose utterances she felt sure her sweetheart would attach some importance.

"Listen to this, Gwilym," she said; "it is from Dryden—

Forgiveness to the injured does belong,
But they ne'er pardon who have done the wrong!"

"That, Dorcas, is very pretty," he rejoined; "and so far as I am concerned I can always forgive where there is repentance—even God, you know, does not forgive on any other terms! Forgiveness is not something that you can give to another like giving money—it cannot be bestowed where the conditions are not suitable to receive it—you cannot throw it away and say, 'Here, take this!' That would be like casting precious seed upon a hard rock. No, Dorcas, forgiveness can be conferred only on one whose heart is in a fit condition to receive it."

To the honours won by Old Willastonians in connection with the war there is now to be added the Albert Medal (second class), which has been awarded to Capt. (then Lieut.) William Donald Cheshire of the Lancashire Fusiliers, for the following very gallant act: "While practice with live grenades was being carried out one of the class, in attempting to throw a grenade from which the safety pin had been withdrawn, struck his hand against the parados, so that the grenade was knocked out of his hand, and fell into the trench, in which about twenty men were collected. Lieut. Cheshire rushed forward, but was hampered and delayed by the men who were trying to get clear. Nevertheless, he seized the grenade and threw it over the parapet. It exploded immediately after leaving his hand. By his prompt and determined action the officer undoubtedly averted a fatal accident."

We are very glad to hear that Mr. Leonard Hawksley, the younger son of Mr. Charles Hawksley, to whose splendid work as honorary director of the Society for the Protection of Animals in Rome and the founder of the Italian Blue Cross we have referred in previous numbers of The Inquirer, has been appointed a Commander of the Order of the Crown of Italy. This is one of the highest decorations bestowed on foreigners, and confers the title of Commendatore on its recipient.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Advisory Committee.—The Rev. Alfred O. Broadley, recently minister of the Bible Christian Church, Salford, who desires to enter the ministry of the Unitarian Church, has satisfied the Lancashire and Cheshire Advisory Committee as to his character and general fitness, and is commended to the churches. All matters other than character and general fitness are left for the sole consideration of each congregation.

Bury.—The congregation of Bank Street Chapel has sustained a great loss by the death of Mr. William Holt of Lower Walshaw. He was a devoted member and worker in connection with chapel and school, a teacher for many years, as well as a trustee. He held the office of Estate Steward to the congregation for nearly thirty-three years. An ancestor of his was a subscriber to the building of the first chapel, in 1719. Mr. Holt was of a retiring disposition, but he was always kindly and genial, cheerful and happy, the result of his goodness of heart. There are few of his generation left now.

Gateshead.—On Sunday, July 1, the Anniversary Services were held. The Rev. W. H. Lambelle preached both morning and evening. Good congregations came to both services, but the evening attendance was the largest for some considerable time. On Wednesday, July 25, a Social Gathering of past and present members was held. The Rev. Alfred Hall of Newcastle, the Rev. W. H. Lambelle, and many old friends of the Church were present, and the whole meeting was a great success.

Manchester, Pendleton.—Mr. G. Randall Jones B.Sc., B.D., who recently completed his course at the Home Missionary College, has received and accepted a unanimous invitation to the ministry of the Pendleton Unitarian Free Church in succession to the Rev. Arnold H. Lewis, B.D., who has removed to Waverley Road Church, Birmingham.

Walthamstow.—Mr. Sorensen, who has been conducting services at the Unitarian Church in Truro Road for nearly four years, and who was granted exemption as a conscientious objector when the Military Service Act, 1916, came into force, recently had to appear before the local tribunal again owing to the decision to review all absolute and conditional exemptions. It was contended that, as a minister of religion, the case did not come within the jurisdiction of the tribunal, and must be tried in a Civil Court. At the trial evidence was given that Mr. Sorensen had taken charge of the Walthamstow congregation since October, 1913, and that he had fulfilled all the functions of a minister in connection with the church. The magistrate (Mr. Ratcliffe Cousins), after a lengthy discussion, decided that Mr. Sorensen was a person to whom the Act did not apply.

Wellington, New Zealand.—During May, as a result of some local discussion which had arisen owing to the fact that Unitarians had been excluded from taking part in an Anzac Day Memorial Service held in the Town Hall, the Rev. G. Ernest Hale, minister of the Unitarian Free Church, preached a series of evening sermons explaining the position of Unitarians. It appears that the function referred to was arranged by the Mayor, and that the first public announcement was to the effect that a "united religious service" was to be held. As, however, only the representatives of two religious bodies were announced to take part, some correspondence took place between the Mayor, the Rev. Dr. Gibb (President of the Church Council), and Mr. Hale. The position taken up by Dr. Gibb, was that he, personally, felt it was impossible, to occupy the same platform, on this occasion, with those who represented Unitarianism, and the service was ultimately held as originally arranged. Subsequently the correspondence was published in The New Zealand Times, and at a meeting of the City Council several councillors spoke with regret of the mistake which had been committed, and objected to the principle of exclusion on the ground of a difference of creed, and to the setting up of any barrier in arranging a civic religious service.

Yorkshire Ministers' Union.—The quarterly meeting of this Union was held in the Vestry of Mill Hill Chapel, Leeds, on Tuesday, July 24. The Rev. F. K. Freeston, who had conducted the services at Mill Hill Chapel on the previous Sunday and had remained in Leeds for the meeting, read a paper on 'The Saint in Modern Life.' A good discussion followed. Mr. and Mrs. G. E. Verity of High Bank, Roundhay, again kindly entertained the members of the Union to tea. On this occasion, owing to the military occupation of the Mill Hill Schools, the lay members of the Committee of the Yorkshire Unitarian Union were also partakers in their hospitality.

MARRIAGE.

HOLLAND—WILLIS.—On July 26, at St. Philip's Church, Kensington, Charles Edward Holland, of 12 Redington Road, Hampstead, younger son of the late Joseph Robberds Holland, to Gladys Muriel, daughter of Arthur Cleveden Willis, of 31 Marloes Road, Kensington.

DEATH.

ATKINS.—On July 18, at the residence of her son, Lieut.-Col. E. C. Atkins, Stretton House, near Hinckley, Agnes, widow of the late Arthur Atkins, of Middlefield, Hinckley.

MRS. CHATFEILD CLARKE sincerely thanks all kind friends for their letters of sympathy to her in her great sorrow and irreparable loss. The letters being too numerous to answer personally, Mrs. Chatfeild Clarke trusts all friends will accept these few lines of deepest gratitude.

OUT OF THE HEART OF THE STORM.

Twelve Sermons preached at Rosslyn Hill Chapel, Hampstead, and Manchester College, Oxford.

BY

Rev. HENRY GOW, B.A.

The sermons are written by one who believes with President Wilson that "right is more precious than peace," and that no personal sorrow or loss should discourage us and turn us from our firm resolve to overthrow the Prussian autocracy. They are written too in the growing confidence that faith in God and in the supremacy of Love has become more and not less possible and real through the conflict and agony of recent times.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

The address for our Belgian Hospital Fund, to which cheques and parcels of clothing should be sent, is Mrs. Bernard Allen, 14 Gainsborough Gardens, Hampstead, N.W.3.

THE speech of the Prime Minister last Saturday registered the resolve of the nation, through its chief representative, that it will not turn back from its task or toy with the danger of an inconclusive peace. Some people may consider Mr. Lloyd George's style of speech too eager and florid for this detestable business of war, but behind it is the sober conviction with which few sensible people will quarrel that if German ambitions had not been checked Europe would have been at the mercy of one cruel Power. The achievement of the past three years is no small thing when we consider that it has made the Pan-German dream definitely impossible. So much we have accomplished already for freedom. The measure of our success is to be seen in the vacillation of German opinion and the weakening of military ambitions, which we may hope will result before long in a temper of reasonableness and moderation. Then we may hear of promises of restoration, without which, as Mr. Lloyd George says, we cannot enter a peace conference with them.

WE are glad to see that Mr. Lloyd George spoke a firm and timely word about the House of Commons as the proper court of the nation. With an impulsive desire to copy Russia and a strange forgetfulness of our own bulwarks of freedom certain people have advocated the formation of Workmen and Soldiers' Committees. In the plainest possible terms Mr. Lloyd George dismissed the proposal as full of danger and mischief.

> There are people of this country [he said] who would introduce those disintegrative methods into the British army, and set up committees to direct the conduct of the war. The nation has chosen its own Workmen and Soldiers' Committee. That is the House of Commons. If at any time that ceases to represent the nation, well then the nation must choose another, but do not let us muddle things by permitting the setting up of two rival and contending Governments in the State. We cannot allow sectional organisations to direct the war nor to dictate the peace. The nation as a whole makes the war, and the sacrifices are pretty evenly distributed among all classes. The nation as a whole makes the peace. As it is a common sacrifice, it must likewise be a common settlement.

AMONG the other anniversary utterances not the least significant was the interview given by General Sir William Robertson to the representative of The New York Times. He laid special stress upon the decisive influence of the fibre, the stuff, the grit, the nerve of the civilian population. He believes that it is the quality of national fibre which will decide this war, and decide the future of the world, and in this respect he warns us not to underrate the Germans because their cause is bad and they are guilty of provoking the war, or because their material resources are less than ours.

> The whole German nation is as disciplined as an army. It is an army. The Germans have discipline in their blood. Discipline fine-drawn to the thinness of docility is a bad thing in peace, making for slavishness, but it provides a people with certain advantages in war. Germany is strong because she is undemocratic; and she is undemocratic because she has been drilled in an iron discipline. All those millions of people have been forged into a sword for the hand of a king. Terrible as this discipline is and formidable, there is a discipline more formidable still. I mean the self-imposed, self-accepted discipline of a free people. What could be more magnificent than the spectacle which America now presents to mankind? She has liberty in her blood; she loathes despotism; she could no more bend her neck to the yoke of an autocracy than she could turn her broad rivers into puddles and her great lakes into ponds; but look at her now, submitting herself to the discipline of war, freely, of her own will, for the sake of a moral issue. It is not for me to prophesy. It is not for me even to pronounce an opinion on America's preparations. But I should say throughout the world that Freedom breathes more freely and Democracy is more confident for the mere spectacle of that vast nation imposing upon itself the restraints and rigours of discipline. It means now as much to the spirit of this struggle as later its effects will mean to the final grip.

MR. PAGE, the United States Ambassador, made a wise and delightful speech at Plymouth on Saturday. It was also a speech which in the beauty of its eloquence maintains the high literary traditions of his office. Nothing could be neater or more pointed than his comment upon the persistent denial of German public men and soldiers that the war was of their making. "That is important," he said, "not only as a measure of their moral accuracy, but as an indication of their method of retreat. They will appeal to the pity of the world they set out to subdue." But we wish to call special attention in this place to what he said about the need of cultivating good relations between the two countries based upon knowledge and sympathy. "The lasting friendship of two democratic countries [he said] must rest on the sympathetic knowledge that the people of each country have of the other, even upon the personal friendship of large numbers of people one with another. Personal friendships make for a friendly public opinion. It is therefore the highest political duty of British citizens and American citizens to build up political friendship by personal knowledge and personal friendship."

MR. PAGE went on to make the valuable suggestion that the schools have also an important part to play in fostering international friendships :—"Put in your schools an elementary book about the United States—not a dull text-book, but a book written by a sympathetic man of accurate knowledge, which shall tell every child in Britain about the country, about the people, how they work, how they live, what results they achieve, what they aim at; about the United States Government, about our greatest men, about our social structure—a book that shall make the large facts plain to any child, and require that every child shall read it. A perfunctory book will fail. Have a hundred books written if necessary till the right one is written....If we rear our children to understand the friendly similarities of our two peoples instead of lodging old differences in their minds we may lie down and die at ease, and entrust to them the future not only of our two lands, but of the whole world as well."

In the admirable address on the 'Position of Women after the War' which Mrs. Creighton gave at the Hampstead Garden Suburb on Monday she was curiously cautious and reticent about the place of women in the Church. In all other departments of public life she was prepared to treat suitability as the only proper test, and there was a good deal of gentle sarcasm in her criticism of the prejudices of the civil service; but apparently she is content that all the higher offices in the Church should be barred. We sympathise with her plea that in matters of religion we do not want to hurt feelings or break too roughly with the past; but we are not satisfied with the compromise that women should be allowed the same opportunities to teach as laymen. If we believe that a woman is to be forbidden to enter the priesthood solely on the ground of her sex, this disability will colour all our thinking, for it can only rest upon a conviction that here in the highest region of all the plea for equality breaks down.

Mrs. Allen never visits the various centres of the beneficent activity of our Belgian Hospital Fund in France without discovering fresh needs. On her way home from Calais last week she stopped for a few hours to visit the large refugee colony at the Chartreuse de Neuville. It has been described so often in our columns that it must be quite familiar to many of our readers. Through their generosity good beds have been provided and various other things have been done for the old people and the crowd of children and babies. It is a piece of work of which we are quite justly proud. Suddenly the arrangements have been taxed to the utmost by the arrival of 200 refugees, most of them forlorn old men and women, who have been sent to the rear as a military necessity by our own army. The miserable plank beds have had to come into use again and physical discomfort is thus added to the terrible mental distress of these old people. We know of nothing more piteous than the dumb misery of groups of aged refugees who have been torn from their homes for reasons which they are too feeble in mind to understand. We want to provide these new-comers with suitable beds. To do so will cost about £400, and in view of our small balance at the bank we cannot do it unless generous friends will come forward as they have always done before. It is a case for immediate help which we can recommend with complete confidence.

THE POWER OF THE PRESS.

Of all our modern problems of power few are so important, and at the same time so perplexing to the public mind, as the power of the Press. In what does it consist? What end does it serve? How can it be controlled, or if not controlled at least turned to the best use in the public interest? These are the questions, which were attacked with illuminating candour by the three eminent journalists who spoke at a conference on 'The Press: its Power and Influence' at the Hampstead Garden Suburb on Tuesday. Men who adopt journalism as their profession are fully alive to the dignity of their calling. They are anxious to judge their work by high standards of efficiency. They are alert to the criticism which suggests improvement or hints at dangers of corruption. All these fine qualities were conspicuous in the speeches of Lord Burnham and Mr. Spender. They justly claimed their share in the proud traditions of the British Press, which esteems the faithful discharge of a public service above every form of commercial success.

It is a distinct benefit that there should be a candid interchange of ideas from time to time between representatives of the press and the public. It tears down the veil of mystery, which imparts an element of undue importance to newspaper opinion, and it helps to associate writers and readers in a league of mutual assistance for the promotion of good workmanship and the avoidance of hidden dangers. The journalist is the last man to proclaim his independence of the help of an intelligent public opinion. The reader on his side will do much greater justice to his newspaper if he realises the conditions under which it is produced—the careful work and the hard thinking which have gone to the making of the articles and paragraphs which he consumes with lightning rapidity in the train. Many of the grievances, of which he complains with tenacity and anger, would be gone, if he realised that no claim is made for it as an infallible oracle of truth. It has a much more useful place to fill in a world which is always changing and often mistaken, as a channel of public information and discussion and an organ of honest opinion.

Two matters of grave importance were mentioned at the conference on Tuesday, which the public will do well to watch with a jealous regard to their own interest at the present time. Lord Burnham contrasted the traditional freedom of our own Press with the subsidised Press of the Continent. Government control of the expression of opinion has gone to extreme lengths in Germany. There the newspaper tells what it is allowed to tell and thinks what it is instructed to think. Bismarck, who had some crude psychological insight into the secrets of power, captured the Press for the State machine and it has been in bondage ever since. For this reason the English reader is liable to be fatally misled by the expressions of opinion which appear in the German Press at the present time. He is disposed to accept them as a free disclosure of the popular mind, just as the German on his side is quick to see in an article in The Times or The Westminster Gazette an announcement of Government policy. To us it is ludicrous to suppose that the assembled editors of Fleet Street would ever wait humbly upon the secretary of the Prime Minister for instructions. Most of them would go out of business altogether rather than submit to any such official infringement of their liberties. But Lord Burnham was undoubtedly right when he said that there is need of constant vigilance at a time like the present, when there has been a large extension of State activity and the life of the citizen is being subjected in an increasing degree to the control of Government departments. There must be no unhealthy relations between newspapers on the one hand and executive officers on the other. He also detected a possible source of danger by means of indirect subsidies through advertisements controlled by the Government. The liberty of the Press, as it is practised in this country, must be preserved unimpaired, as "our palladium against the unjust use of power." He was speaking, of course, of the Press as it exists in normal times without the necessary restrictions imposed upon it by a state of war, but it was satisfactory to learn on his authority as chairman of the weekly Press Conference that there is no censorship of opinion at the present time. The regulations which are in force apply only to naval and military matters which may be of use to the enemy. There is room here for considerable difference of opinion about the wisdom with which news is released or withheld; but it is entirely a matter of judgment, and no question of the ultimate principles of freedom is involved.

On the other matter to which we wish to refer Mr. Spender spoke gravely, though without any suggestion of a remedy. The enormously increased efficiency of the Press, especially in its news department, has resulted in a limitation of enterprise owing to the immense capital which is necessary for success. Only a man of colossal fortune would venture to start a new morning paper in London at the present time; the smaller newspapers live in constant danger of being crushed out; and thus the whole business of journalism tends to become a monopoly. "We want as many varieties and types of opinion as possible," Mr. Spender said, "if the Press is to be the guardian of liberty, in order that one may correct another." When the matter is put in this way we discover that we are only dealing with a special aspect of the tendency of modern civilisation to produce a deadening uniformity of type. Many people find a welcome relief for their feelings in laying all the blame for this state of things upon a successful newspaper syndicate. But for the wise man anger and strong words are no remedy. What is needed is a healthy corrective to power which threatens to become oppressive, and that can only be discovered by intellectual effort and a sense of public need strong enough to inspire moral passion and dedicated public service. The Garden Suburb, where Mr. Spender's most timely words were spoken, is itself an illustration of the power of a few minds to find a way of escape from the obsession of monotony. If this can be done in the sphere of physical surroundings, it can also be done in the sphere of social thought and political judgment. We are still obstinate believers in the untamed power of the human mind to create what it desires.

Perhaps it may be said that all this has but a slight bearing upon the special tasks and opportunities of the religious Press, which exists for the most part to represent the thoughts and interests of a select group of readers. This, however, is only part of its function. Every writer on religious subjects, who attempts to guide and influence the thoughts of men and to bring public policy to the bar of Christian judgment, is aware that he is addressing week by week an audience of his fellow citizens, which is not confined to his own special enclosure of doctrine or ritual. He is taking his part in a co-operative effort, in which many types of thought are needed, for the discovery of truth, the increase of goodness and the promotion of social righteousness. In such a task he will do his best to rid himself of the temper of the mere partizan. He will claim liberty for the expression of his sincere thought and avoid the dictation of any clique or official group who would put his mind in chains. He will also try to create an atmosphere in which men can hold strong convictions with good temper and differ without offence. Perhaps one of the besetting weaknesses of the religious Press, which has earned for it a bad name in some quarters, is an acrid humour in controversy. A tradition of personal abuse and angry retort has lingered among Christians in their controversial moods longer than elsewhere. But all people of good sense are heartily ashamed of it, and it is for the religious journalists of the present day to give it its quietus. They can at least see to it that in what they write themselves, and in the control which they exercise over the published words of other people, the cause of faith and hope and charity shall be served with good manners.

No writer who has had to deal with public affairs during the past three years can fail to respond to the words in which Mr. Spender referred to his own sense of responsibility, in view of the tremendous power which resides in words to form judgment and to shape action. Though this responsibility has been heavier and more constant for the daily Press, no one can deny that it exists for religious journalism as well and that its pressure is never withdrawn. There has been no pleasant zone of neutrality into which we could retire. We have had to accept the burden of great decisions and to propose to our readers, not problems for discussion, but duties which must be accepted to-day or rejected for ever. No man looking into his own heart will claim that either in word or spirit he has risen to the greatness of his theme. He will consider himself happy if he can plead that he has honoured his convictions and tried his hardest to exercise a healthy influence upon the formation of public opinion.

COURSE ON SOCIAL QUESTIONS.

To the Editor of THE INQUIRER.

SIR,—Ministers and leaders of classes will be at this time mapping out their autumn and winter work. Copies of our course on Social Questions have already been widely circulated, but if there are any who have not yet received a copy I should be glad to send one gratis on the receipt of a postcard. The course is in twelve sections (with lists of books, pamphlets, &c.) and includes the following subjects: 'The Meaning and Value of the State,' 'National Service,' 'International Relations,' 'Capital and Labour,' 'The Internationalising of Trade and Commerce,' 'Land and Housing,' 'Women's Part in the National Life,' 'Child Life,' 'Education,' &c. The course is also proving suggestive for religious addresses.—Yours, &c.,

WEEKLY NOTES.

DURING my recent visit to France I spent some days at the large civil hospital, established for the old, infirm and sick refugees and for little children, at La Chartreuse. There were 450 inmates when I was there last, and we had been the means of ensuring that every one of these had a comfortable bed. Last week 125 poor old people arrived from the front, where it was hoped they might have been able to stay in a refuge provided for them till the end of the war. But the war continues and becomes more intense, and it was absolutely necessary to send them away. They are very old, and the majority do not in the least grasp the fact that it is for their own good, and they are miserable at leaving their own country. The wretched plank beds which we had, we hoped, done away with, have had to come out of their retirement. Nearly 100 more old folks are expected this week. I do most heartily wish we could send them 200 beds, but the present state of our finances will not permit of it as it would cost about £400. Some of us are hoping to take a holiday this summer. Will not those who can enjoy a peaceful holiday, just because Belgium stood so nobly three years ago between us and the oncoming German horde, help me to ensure this necessary minimum of comfort for 200 homeless refugees, most of whom have sons and grandsons still fighting for us? SUMMER SCHOOL AT HAMPSTEAD GARDEN SUBURB.

PROBLEMS OF RECONSTRUCTION.

The promoters of the first Summer School held at the Hampstead Garden Suburb have every reason to be satisfied, and the eager and pleasant gathering which has assembled to study problems of Reconstruction is likely to be the first of a long series for the promotion of intelligence and stimulating fellowship in social work. Meetings of this kind are indeed the fruit of the lofty idealism combined with clear thinking which has been characteristic of the work and influence of Canon and Mrs. Barnett. The tone of affection and gratitude with which Canon Barnett's name was mentioned at several of the lectures and discussions during the week showed how deeply his influence was felt as a personal inspiration by those who were present. For the purposes of a summer school it would be difficult to find any place more suitable than the Garden Suburb, with its fine air and spacious views and a fortunate absence of temptations to neglect study for sight-seeing. Most of the lectures have been held in the beautiful hall of the Institute. Outside the central square was gay with flowers, and close by is the noble church of St. Jude's-on-the-Hill, designed by Mr. Lutyens, one of the most daring and attractive experiments in modern church design in the country. It was here that the Bishop of Oxford preached to a crowded congregation on Sunday evening. Outside on the east wall is a Calvary, which has been dedicated recently to the men of the parish who have fallen in the war.

The programme of the School is a very varied one. "The especial aim of the committee," it is stated, "is to get down to the bed-rock questions of the New Era that is dawning by frank discussion of the great problems of Reconstruction—Social, Economic, Educational and International—upon a distinctly ethical and religious basis." Among the lecturers during the past week have been Canon Masterman, Mr. Sydney Webb, Miss Maude Royden, Prof. Peake, Mrs. Creighton, Mr. Guy Kendall and the Master of Balliol.

The opening address was given on Friday evening, August 3, by the Marquis of Crewe. In the absence of Mr. Herbert Samuel, M.P., the chair was taken by Mrs. Barnett. In a letter of apology Mr. Samuel emphasised the extreme importance of a careful study of after-war problems, and stated that in his opinion we were quite right to take the trowel in one hand while we wielded the sword with the other.

Lord Crewe in the course of his address pointed out how vastly the field of reform had extended since the social science congresses of fifty years ago. The programme of the school illustrated the breadth of their interests. One of their problems was to see that the rights of the individual were fairly balanced with the claims of the community. It was, he thought, a good augury for the future that we who had been the most amusement-loving nation in the world and the most devoted to holidays before the war were now so earnestly devoted to work. Wide and excellent as the programme was he regretted that it had not been arranged for one of the eminent Frenchmen at present in London to address one of the meetings. This question of cultivating friendship with a country like France, which was closely allied with us, was of great importance, especially in view of the fact that the British generation now coming into flower was hardly likely to establish any real intimacy with their contemporaries in Germany, unless a great change took place in German character and ambitions.

Mrs. Barnett, in proposing a vote of thanks to Lord Crewe, recalled his intimate connection with the Garden Suburb from the day when it was only a dream in her own mind. They wanted their Summer School, she said, to be a factory of thoughts for home consumption and of munitions for the destruction of social injustices.

Women After the War.

There was a large audience to hear Mrs. Creighton on Monday evening. Her subject was 'Women After the War.' We are indebted to The Daily Telegraph for the following excellent summary of an address which covered a wide field and was marked in an equal degree by practical wisdom and spiritual insight.

It was clear, Mrs. Creighton said, that the position of women after the war would be changed from what it was in pre-war days through four causes—the increased liberty women had won during the war, the new, and in many cases, quite unexpected capacity they had shown in many spheres of work, their enfranchisement, and the fact that a far larger number of them would remain unmarried in the future than in the past. Their immensely modified position in industry would produce a new kind of competition with men which had to be very seriously considered. She was not as sure as Miss McArthur that all talk of sex warfare was futile, because when, in addressing large industrial gatherings of men she had said she could not believe that men in the future would be ungenerous in their treatment of women, and would not be ready to seek unfair conditions, such remarks had always been very coldly received. She regarded that as ominous. The success of the taxicab men in preventing women driving cabs was a species of sex warfare. If women were to maintain a fair position in industry it was necessary they should be organised, and it was to be hoped that the men's unions would admit women far more largely than they had hitherto done, and admit them also to a share in the management. When obtaining concessions from trade unions, the Government had always promised a return after the war to pre-war conditions, yet authorities now told us that the conditions of industry had been so modified by the war that it would be practically impossible to return to pre-war conditions according to the letter. In this state of things it was to be hoped that no question of sex would be introduced to modify the difficulty. Women must be very careful not to undersell men in regard to their work. Possibly there might be an increased temptation for women of the middle class to undertake work at pocket-money wages. That must be resisted; women should not take work in any direction so as to undersell men. At a recent women's conference it was said that suitability of work, not cheapness, should be the test to be applied to women's work. Who was to decide what was suitability? If it was to be decided by the suggested inter-departmental committee of doctors, inspectors, and so on, we should get into a new form of slavery. The only way of finding out what work was suitable for women was by experiment. So the doors of all kinds of work should be open to them; but as all girls were possible wives and mothers, care must be taken that they did nothing which would unfit them for such positions.

As to social position, girls who would have been cherished at home, and not allowed to work out before the war, were now being allowed to do what would then have been described as "perfectly unheard of," almost independent of home control. Many people thought this was to be only for the duration of the war. But it was pretty certain that the majority of girls would not go back to the old strict life and that entailed a changed attitude as regards the relationship between the sexes. We were bound to recognise that these girls had not always shown themselves fit for freedom, and that some men had not treated them with that respect which the free woman worker had a right to demand. All must learn what true comradeship between the sexes meant, and that would solve many difficulties. But men were yet far from accepting women workers as comrades. Men and women should take the new situation simply and naturally. Women workers must not ape the ways of men, or be afraid to be themselves. It was a pity so many women and girl workers had taken to excessive smoking. They should not try to be sham men; neither should they try to be what they thought men wished them to be. Regarding public work, something might be learned from the mistakes of the past. If the higher positions in the Civil Service had been open to women, we should now have had women trained and ready to fill them, instead of having to get such places by chance, and sometimes through inside influence. Their position in Government offices was far from satisfactory; there was a large amount of official jealousy keeping them out of the higher positions. They were not sufficiently represented on departmental and other committees, where their special experience was much needed. A departmental committee had recently been appointed to consider the salaries of teachers in elementary schools, the majority of whom were women, yet there were only four women on the committee, against fourteen men.

With respect to enfranchisement, women were thankful for what they had got. Fuller recognition would largely depend upon the way they used their new powers. It would be a fatal result to use their vote simply to outvote the men. She hoped one result would be to bring a larger number of questions outside purely party considerations. They did not want questions like temperance, housing, education, to be decided by party considerations. Women would be very keen regarding the character of Ministers, but would not be parties to overthrowing Governments if they carried on their work well and could be trusted. They could do much in the future for peace. They should not join anti-German leagues pledged not to buy anything made in Germany, but must take a bigger view, look to a great commonwealth of nations, foster everything that could lead to international friendship, and do all they could to fight the spirit of hate. The nation lost a great deal by not using more fully the ministry of women in the Church. They must be regarded as part of the laity, and be allowed to do what laymen could do. They must get training and truer ideals of life—training to be real citizens, and not a sort of prop and sofa cushion for men.

And that meant little less than a revolution. In this task they would need the help of those who came back from the front. In what kind of spirit would they come back? Tired, changed in all kinds of ways, valuing their homes more than ever, and expecting to return to the old conditions. Would they be disappointed? Women must not be disappointed because those returning did not meet all their schemes of reconstruction with zeal. To cope with the new situation they would need infinite understanding, infinite patience, boundless love.

The Power of the Press.

A Conference of exceptional interest was held on Tuesday afternoon on 'The Press: its Power and Influence.' Lord Burnham, the proprietor of The Daily Telegraph, was in the chair and the speakers included Mr. J. A. Spender, Editor of The Westminster Gazette, and Mr. P. W. Wilson of The Daily News.

In his opening address Lord Burnham described the press as the great religion of the democracy. It would advance and increase with the advance of democracy itself, for the idol of the press was founded upon the ideal of the common man, freedom of opinion, of thought, and of speech. Social science, he said, had taken little trouble to understand what the press was, and what were the sources of its power and influence. It was not indeed easy to explain the secret of newspaper power, for no one knew where its influence began and where it ended. But the first reason of its power was the fact that nine men out of ten got the whole of their knowledge and education, beyond the mere elements of learning, from the press. The mind got the colour of the paper which a man reads. It was to a great extent a psychological problem. He did not pretend to understand why the fact of repeating a thing day after day had in itself immense influence, but repetition in a sufficiently glaring and obtrusive way had the effect of conversion and propaganda. Another reason for the power of the press was the measure of the failure of representative government. But for the press minorities would be suppressed altogether. The only chance they had of asserting their rights and expressing their views was in the columns of the press. The press was thus a protection against tyranny whether of the king or of the mob.

Lord Burnham went on to point out that the freedom of the press as we know it was entirely an Anglo-Saxon ideal. What we had to guard was the individualism of the press. It must never be under the control of the executive government. It ought not to form part of the machinery of the State—the State was powerful enough without that. Abroad the relations were very intimate. Many Continental papers were in receipt of State support and subsidies, it may be from governments different from their own. This did not necessarily mean that they were wanting in patriotism, but it did produce an unhealthy relation between newspapers on the one hand and executive officers on the other. Bismarck made it a cardinal point of his policy that the press should always be in the hollow of his hand. Editors took their orders day by day from the Imperial Government. There had been no lie too grotesque for the German papers to swallow when they were ordered to do it. This had led to a very low level of newspaper morality. In Germany it was taken for granted that the press was necessarily corrupt, and that it had no regard for honour and veracity in public life. The Emperor would never believe that what appeared in our press was not inspired by the Government. The freedom of the press as we had it was an ideal which we should not allow to be betrayed in view of the extension of State activity. All attempts to control the press except by the law of libel and treason should be avoided. Lord Burnham expressed his own dislike of any indirect subsidising of the press through advertisements controlled by the Government. It was our palladium against the unjust use of power. Finally he pointed out how friendly relations with other countries depend largely upon the press. For most people sympathetic knowledge could not come by personal contact. It must come through the newspaper. No one could deny that after the war we should want to cement our friendships closer and to avoid an exclusive nationalism, and this must be the work of the press.

Mr. J. A. Spender expressed his general agreement with the remarks which had fallen from Lord Burnham. In his judgment the press was an absolutely essential instrument of government. Without it Parliament would be cut off from contact with the ordinary man. It thus had an essential public function, but it was in private hands and was conducted quite rightly on a commercial basis. He agreed that many of the comparisons which were made between the past and the present of the press were unfair, but there were some evils and disquieting features which were new and had to be faced. The new generation could not be content with the old penny newspaper of thirty years ago, if it had a paper livelier in tone and wider in its interests. The new press had come along and endeavoured to cater for a new and larger public. But there had been dangers. There were great opportunities of profit in exploiting this public and great temptations. Circulation might become the god of a newspaper of this kind, and then circulation might be bought by emphasising the lower kind of opinion. It might stereotype and intensify common views of life. It might become a cruel press and a persecuting press. Enormous capital was required to keep the modern press going, and in many directions it was enormously more efficient; but for that reason it tended to become a monopoly. We wanted as many varieties and types of opinion as possible, if the press was to be the guardian of liberty, in order that one may correct another. But while more people read newspapers at the present time fewer people wrote for them. The men who were doing now the political writing of the country were extraordinarily few. In a profession so limited there were not enough openings to attract able young men, and in this way the press of the country was losing its opportunities.

Mr. Spender confessed that on one point his opinion was somewhat changing, namely about the benefit of anonymous journalism. He urged that the individual writer, in approaching his duties to the press, ought to feel responsible for what he writes and for the opinions he advocates. This did not mean that all leading articles must be signed. If the same name appeared day after day the writer would be hissed off the stage as a pestilent bore. But an index of writers might be published every six months as is the case with Punch, and the journalist might be made personally and legally responsible. The great thing was that a man must not put off his personality when he wrote for the press. Writers should also cultivate some independence and originality of thought. Finally Mr. Spender pointed out that people need to be warned against the hypnotic power of the pen. They must not think that everything they see in print is true. The power of the press in this and other directions was hardly sufficiently realised either by those who write or those who read. At present, since the outbreak of hostilities, the press was the one avenue of communication with enemy countries. This made the responsibility enormous. Every Foreign Office was making the closest scrutiny of everything that is written in an enemy country. Every writer must ask himself whether he has stated the case, or warned or failed to prevent certain things happening, as he ought to have done in this terrible struggle. In all these circumstances it was important that the press should be in the hands of honest and honourable proprietors and of well educated minds.

Mr. P. W. Wilson and other speakers took part in the discussion. In a few closing remarks Lord Burnham, as chairman of the Press Conference which meets weekly to discuss matters arising out of the censorship, stated that there was no censorship of political opinion. In the early days of the war the regulations of the censor were open to that charge, but that had long ceased to be the case. The present censorship dealt only with naval and military matters, which might be of advantage to the enemy.

Religion in the Bible.

The influence of religion in the work of reconstruction is emphasised by the place of honour which is given to it in the programme. Every morning there is a short devotional service in St. Jude's or the Free Church, and this is followed by a lecture of specially religious interest. This series of lectures has been placed in the hands of Prof. Peake, the Master of Balliol, the Rev. the Hon. E. Lyttelton and Principal Forsyth. Those who listened to Prof. Peake's lectures on 'Religion in the Bible' this week are not likely to forget them. They dealt with masterly simplicity and candour upon the secondary things of criticism, and they soared to rare heights of spiritual vision as they laid bare for the help of others the contents of a rich personal experience. With persuasive power he made his hearers feel that here was common ground for all Christian minds, and the impregnable rock upon which the authority of the Bible in the modern Church must be based.

We are asked to state that the Summer School will be continued till Friday, August 17, and members are invited to join for the second half of the course.

TRADE POLICY AND NATIVE RACES.

We have received the following important correspondence between the Anti-Slavery Society and the Empire Resources Development Committee for publication. The whole matter is one of grave public interest at the present time:—

June 11, 1917.

Sir,—At the last meeting of the Committee of this Society the published material of the Empire Resources Development Committee together with other information was again considered, and in view of an opinion expressed that your Committee as a whole did not adhere to certain principles affecting the British Dependencies, their land, labour and produce, we were asked to communicate with you.

Our Committee, whilst strenuously opposed to anything which, in its opinion, threatens the rights of native races, is only too glad to support any proposals which have in view their moral or material advancement. Hence our desire to know whether certain opinions and proposals are entertained by your Committee in so far as the tropical and sub-tropical Dependencies are concerned.

The first feature of cardinal importance is the question of Governments and trading. Our Committee holds that in territories where there is no self-government, administration and trading should not be in the same hands, because this practice has invariably led to abuse of native rights, and we should like to be assured that your Committee does not advocate a system of Government trading for profit either in its own capacity or in conjunction with trading communities.

Our Committee believes that the native inhabitants of territories even where there is no self-government will readily agree to bear an equitable part of the financial cost of the war, but we beg to ask whether the view is still entertained that "hundreds of millions" yearly for this purpose can be obtained by the direct exploitation of the internal resources of the Dependencies.

We should appreciate information as to whether it is the intention of your Committee to advocate treating as "Crown Estates" for the benefit of the war debt of the United Kingdom areas of land with indigenous vegetable resources of the Dependencies, including the Protectorates, particularly the palm tree areas, and whether any of the estimated yield of £50,000,000 revenue per annum is to be derived from the existing native palm industry.

Your Committee will be familiar with the grave danger which always arises from any interference with native ownership of land, therefore we should be glad to have an assurance that it is no part of the Committee's intention to advocate the modification of the British principle of subordinating other interests to the maintenance of the native customary law of land ownership.

In view of past experiences our Committee is most anxious to receive an assurance that your Committee dissociates itself entirely from the opinion that the abuses of the Congo were alleged from political motives and not inherent in the Congo system. We are asked to say that our Committee attaches quite exceptional importance to this feature, because if certain published statements are allowed to pass unrepudiated not only are reputations beyond suspicion challenged, but the adherence of your Committee as a whole to this view would, in our opinion, be a matter of the deepest significance. We are probably disclosing no new fact to your Committee when we say that hardly anything has caused greater misgiving as to the objects of your Committee amongst men of the highest reputation and public esteem than the published expression of the above view in connection with a statement explaining the proposals of the Empire Resources Development Committee.

Upon one other point our Committee desires information: whether your programme included European financial "control" in any respect whatever of the successful cocoa producing enterprise of Britain's Dependencies?

With reference to tropical and sub-tropical Dependencies, our Committee holds to the view that security of tenure of land with sacred regard for native customary law of ownership is the surest basis of indigenous prosperity; that on this again should rest native industry, educated and encouraged towards ever-increasing intensity by a disinterested administration, untrammelled by any other function than the task of governing the country primarily in the interests of the people. That the soundest economic position for immigrant white merchants into the Dependencies is that of a channel through whom should pass the fruits of the labour of the producers to the world's consumers, and to the native producers European manufactured articles in exchange for their produce. That if any contribution can be made by the people of a Dependency towards the debts of the United Kingdom such contributions should be based proportionately upon the prosperity of the Dependency, that they should be regular in form and made with the full approval of the inhabitants of the Dependency, an approval to be obtained by such machinery as may be available for securing an expression of local opinion.

We have ventured to state this general outline of policy for the consideration of the members of your Committee and should like, and we feel sure the public will like, to have some assurance that it is in harmony with their attitude towards the Dependencies.

We are, Yours faithfully,

July 13, 1917.

The Secretary,
The Anti-Slavery and Aborigines Protection Society.

Sir,—In reference to your letter of June 11, which was considered by the Empire Resources Development Committee at its last meeting, I am requested to state that, while my Committee appreciates the motives with which your communication was written, it does not consider that it is possible to reduce to a few simple formulæ the conditions which should govern the commercial and financial policy of the Empire in relation to any of its component parts. The circumstances of one territory differ so much from those of another that, in the view of my Committee, each must be taken into account and dealt with separately.

In so far as the general aims of your Committee are concerned, which are understood to be the protection of native interests and the advancement of the moral and material welfare of native populations, there is no difference of view. My Committee has these matters at heart equally with your Committee.

Your Committee asks for an assurance in respect of native rights that "it is no part of the Committee's intention to advocate the modification of the British principle subordinating other interests to the maintenance of the native customary law of land ownership." My Committee is not aware from what authority you quote this formula, and thinks it is sufficient to say in reply that in its opinion native rights should always be respected and supported. What those rights in each case are it is the function of the Colonial Government to define and when defined to protect.

With regard to the development of land in tropical regions my Committee agrees that where natives show a disposition to develop the land under the encouragement of the Colonial Government, every possible assistance should be afforded them to do so, and that production by natives should be encouraged by all available means. On the other hand where the Colonial Government is able and willing to put land at the disposition of Europeans, it sees no reason why natives should be denied the opportunity of earning fair wages as labourers under conditions which can and should be carefully regulated and supervised by the local government.

My Committee regrets that the word "exploitation" should have been introduced into the discussion of these matters because it has acquired a secondary and sinister meaning. If by the exploitation of a territory is meant the extension of production and trade, my Committee is convinced that well-considered and well-directed effort in these directions is at least as much in the interests of the natives as in those of European organisers of production and trade whoever they may be, and that the suggestion that the profits which may in such circumstances accrue to Europeans are derived from wrongful "exploitation" of the natives is entirely misleading. Any view of trade which loses sight of its dual character is necessarily incorrect. There is no good reason, as far as my Committee can see, why the European and the native should not mutually co-operate in these matters in their common interests.

With regard to State development and trading my Committee considers that, in the interests both of good government and of commercial efficiency, it is highly desirable that all work of this character should be dealt with by men who have no governmental responsibilities, and that governmental and commercial executive functions in the Crown Colonies should not be entrusted to the same individuals. Subject to this condition my Committee sees no reason in principle why the State should not be directly interested in selected commercial concerns, which would stand in no different position in relation to the government of the territory in which they operated from that occupied by a commercial undertaking in which the State had no direct interest. My Committee thinks it quite reasonable that in the natural development of the Empire as a whole the State should in the future retain for itself some of the profits which now go into the pockets of private individuals. This opinion is not confined to the tropical or sub-tropical Dependencies, but my Committee has never expressed any opinion as to the sums which might thus accrue to any national exchequer.

With regard to your questions in relation to the Congo controversy, I am instructed to say that my Committee has never had occasion to pass judgment on the abuses which took place in the Congo, but that the Congo system is the last precedent they would desire to follow.

In conclusion, my Committee desires to express its regret that the inquiries made in your letter were not made before the appearance of various statements which my Committee cannot but regard as a grave misrepresentation of their motives and objects.

It is understood from your letter of the 6th instant that it is the intention of your Committee to publish your letter of June 11 immediately and my Committee requests that you will publish their reply simultaneously.

Faithfully yours,
(signed) H. Wilson Fox,
Hon. Secretary.

July 16, 1917.

Dear Sir,—I am obliged by your letter of the 9th inst., stating that my Committee's letter of the 11th ultimo was to be considered at the meeting of your Committee last Friday and a reply sent to us at the beginning of this week. I would express the hope that your reply will clear up the discrepancy in regard to the policy of the Empire Resources Development Committee which we find between the communication from Lord Selborne, published in The Times of the 5th, and your letter to The Spectator of the 7th inst. In the former Lord Selborne declares that the Committee has not the slightest intention of substituting for the existing system of native production, which he highly commends, the plantation system under which the natives would work as labourers under white overseers; but in the latter we find it plainly stated that the Committee has chiefly in view great agricultural estates, such as those which the British South Africa Company is developing through its commercial staff in order to obtain a direct return of invested capital and improve the capital value of its estates.

These two statements appear to us to be directly contradictory.

Yours faithfully,
(signed) Travers Buxton,
Secretary.

H. Wilson Fox, Esq., M.P.,
Hon. Secretary,
Empire Resources Development Committee.

Finally the Chairman and Secretary of the Anti-Slavery Society wrote as follows:—"Our Committee regrets to learn that your Committee approves of the State (in the sense of the Administration) assuming a direct interest in commercial concerns and trading for profit in tropical and sub-tropical regions. On this issue we find ourselves at complete variance with it, for while we express no opinion on the system where white industry is concerned, and where there is self-government, experience has shown that, wherever this system has existed in autocratically governed territories inhabited by subject races, it involves the elimination of native rights to land and free commerce which form the basis of British Colonial policy as applied, e.g., in Nigeria and elsewhere, and injustice, slavery and cruelty to the native inhabitants, to whom the Government owe a primary duty as trustees of their interests, have followed. We find nothing in your letter which removes our fears that if your programme were carried out the same evils would result."

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Crewkerne.—We learn with deep regret that Lieut. Edward William Richmond Blake of the Somerset Light Infantry has been killed in action. He was the only son of Mr. and Mrs. E. J. Blake of the Old House, Crewkerne. The deepest and most respectful sympathy will go out to them from a large circle of friends, including Mr. Blake's colleagues on the Board of Managers of the Sustentation Fund.

Dundee.—It has been found possible to hold services in connection with the Unitarian Christian Church in a suburb named Butterburn on Sunday evenings. About forty families reside in the district. A very convenient hall belonging to a large public school has been granted by the School Board. It was in the immediate vicinity of the meeting place that early in 1870 the minister, the Rev. Henry Williamson, was assaulted by a mob after he had delivered a lecture under great opposition in an old schoolroom. He was struck with a stone and was carried into a cottage near by. A hundred persons identified with the Williamson Society now reside within fifteen minutes walk of the Butterburn School Hall.

Hull.—We have received the August number of the excellent local publication known as Home Fires. It is issued monthly for the special benefit of the young men connected with Park Street Church who are serving in His Majesty's Forces. The present issue contains several attractive features, including a Monthly Message, Church Notes, items of local news and extracts from soldiers' letters. Every member of the Church and Sunday School who is on active service receives a copy regularly, and it is easy to understand the feelings of delight with which such a pleasant token of friendship is welcomed.

Rochdale.—At their July meeting the teachers received in no formal way, but with the deepest and sincerest regret, the resignation of the School Superintendency by Mr. Edmund Cropper. Mr. Cropper has been engaged on munition work at Rotherham for some time, and in June he decided to take his family over there to live. In him the school loses one of the best of its workers. He loved the school and its institutions, and delighted in serving them, which he always did efficiently. He had the faculty for seeing what required to be done, and he could always be relied on to do more than a fair share of any task, and that most willingly and most cheerfully. Mr. George Butterworth who has kindly filled the office during the absence of Mr. Cropper, has now been unanimously chosen to succeed him as Superintendent, and also as Vice-Chairman of the Committee.

Particulars of the programme of the School for Ministers which will be held at Manchester College, Oxford, next term will be found among our advertisements to-day. No effort has been spared to make it profitable and attractive. It will be seen that the list of lecturers includes, in addition to the members of the College staff, the Dean of St. Paul's, the Master of Balliol and Mr. F. C. S. Schiller. Early application should be made to the Rev. H. Gow, 12 Glenloch Road, Hampstead, N.W.3., by those who wish to avail themselves of this generous offer of the College.

BIRTH.

Evans.—On the 8th inst., at Athol, Sandy Lane, Wallington, Surrey, to Mr. and Mrs. W. H. Evans, a son.

DEATH.

Blake.—Killed in Action on the 31st July, 2nd Lieut. Edward William Richmond Blake, 8th Somersets, only son of Mr. and Mrs. E. J. Blake of The Old House, Crewkerne, Somerset, aged 20.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

The address for our Belgian Hospital Fund, to which cheques and parcels of clothing should be sent, is Mrs. Bernard Allen, 14 Gainsborough Gardens, Hampstead, N.W.3.

IT is impossible to exclude the fateful word Stockholm from any review of the events of the week. But we have no intention of dwelling upon the details of the unfortunate dispute which has arisen or of attempting to assign blame. The task for every writer, who is sensible of the gravity of the situation, is one of appeasement. It is no time to add bitterness to misunderstandings, which may cause a difference of opinion upon a minor question of policy to grow into a disabling quarrel. The difficulty which has arisen between Mr. Henderson and his colleagues was inherent in the attempt to serve two masters. Membership of the Cabinet, with the close personal co-operation in policy which it involves, must be paramount over every other claim. When Mr. Henderson felt it his duty to give advice to the Labour Conference which was contrary to that of his colleagues in the Cabinet, with whom he shared the responsibility of guarding the supreme interests of the Empire, no one has any right to suspect his complete sincerity, but most people of sound judgment will agree that his resignation had become inevitable.

THIS dispute, and the publicity with which it has been carried on, has given to the proposed Socialist Conference at Stockholm an importance to which on its merits it is hardly entitled. It is indeed difficult to grasp what advantages anybody expects to derive from it beyond the gratification of certain vague sentiments of friendship. There is not even any general agreement about the basis upon which the discussions are to take place. The Russian group wish to bind all the members to their common decisions, and others to make it in some sense a Conference to arrange terms of peace, while Mr. Henderson and his friends are determined that it shall be only consultative. The French socialists will not attend unless some attempt is made to fix responsibility for the war, and the German government will refuse passports if any attempt is to be made to discuss these questions. Most of the Allied Governments are hostile to the project, and American labour has refused bluntly to have anything to do with it. Meanwhile the situation in Russia has changed, and the one motive which prevailed with many generous minds, in some cases against their own judgment, is certainly not so strong as it was. In these circumstances we are inclined to take the view that this is one of the cases, and they are fairly common in both public and private life, in which a firm refusal is a higher form of friendship than easy agreement.

THE close association between Labour and international socialism throughout this business must have struck many people as curious. A great many trade unionists are not socialists and care very little either for the general policy or the doctrinaire spirit of the international socialist group. This anomaly is explained in a letter by Mr. F. Maddison, which appeared in The Times on Wednesday. "Will you allow me a word [he writes] as a trade unionist who, both as a member of the House of Commons and out of it, has protested from the first against the admission into the Labour Party of Socialist groups whose members are often neither trade unionists nor workmen? This is the source of most of the mischief of the present moment. The American Federation of Labour has kept clear of the entanglements which follow from the trade union movement, made up of all political parties, being part of the British section of the International Socialist Bureau. What is going on now in this time of national crisis shows the danger of allowing middle-class Socialist politicians to enter a party composed almost entirely of organised workers." We wonder whether Mr. Maddison has any hope that the Labour Party, taught by experience, will purge itself of this perilous stuff. The solidarity of British Labour on the side of the war and its disciplined orderliness are in strange contrast to the propaganda of the prophets of a class war, for whom Socialists alone are "the people." The whole situation strikes us as one of extreme interest, and it certainly deserves much closer study on the lines suggested by Mr. Maddison's letter than it has received hitherto.

THE first of a series of articles on 'Liberal Policy and the War' by Prof. Gilbert Murray appeared in The Daily News last Saturday. "Liberalism," he contends, "has not been destroyed by the war. It has been fortified."—"Our Allies are all the great democratic nations of the world; our enemies the great despotisms. In the few countries that still remain neutral the Liberal and Socialist parties are with us, the military and reactionary parties against us."—"The drawing together of men of sense and goodwill is not a pretence; it is a real fact, and a fact that we should be grateful for." The article contains many another fine phrase, which will bring back doubting hearts, who fear as they enter the cloud, to the central realities of the situation. "Public Right as the law of the civilised world; Freedom for all nations, and for all the men and women inside the nations; the deliverance of humanity from the power of the Sword. These are the causes for which we fight, and these are the principles which must guide us both in making peace and in building up our own future."

WE have received this week a copy of a little book by Mrs. Henry Hobhouse entitled 'I appeal unto Cæsar' (George Allen & Unwin, 1*s.* net). We wish to commend its plea to the careful attention of our readers. It deals with the case of the Conscientious Objector, and especially with those who have gone to prison instead of accepting any form of national service. The punishment inflicted by the military authorities seems often to have been brutal and stupid, and the passing of a new sentence as soon as the old one has expired will strike most thoughtful people as contrary to the principles of justice. We hold that a case has been made out for careful inquiry, not in order to hush the matter up but in order to find a remedy as quickly as possible.

We are not inclined to indulge in the general condemnation of the Tribunals which is popular in some quarters, for there is evidence that in many cases they were most anxious to save the objector from incurring the displeasure of the authorities, and probably they felt themselves completely baffled by the obstinate refusal with which every suggestion was met. Be that as it may, the time has come when the men who, rightly or wrongly, have not received complete exemption and refuse every form of national service must be dealt with in a new way. The best remedy is a matter for discussion, and there will probably be a difference of opinion whether it should take the form of complete liberty or of simple internment without any harsh conditions. In any case we hope that there will be general agreement that there must be no taint of violence or brutality in dealing with these men, and the system of severe sentences constantly repeated for what is practically the same offence must be abolished. Mrs. Hobhouse's book contains an introduction by Prof. Gilbert Murray and Notes from Lord Selborne, Lord Parmoor, Lord Hugh Cecil and Lord Henry Bentinck, which give it much additional weight.

It is refreshing to find the Bishop of Birmingham holding up to public scorn the vapid nonsense which is still to be heard from some pulpits and helps to bring religion into contempt. Apparently the Precentor of Chelmsford Cathedral has attributed the recent wet weather to the disapproval of the Almighty of working on allotments on Sunday. "Think for a moment," the Bishop exclaims in a letter to The Times, "of the kind of Architect, Ruler, and Father of the Universe which is thus pictured to us by the preacher! For the good of humanity at a crisis men and women sacrifice their leisure to provide food, and the One whose all-seeing Eye and whose all-searching Mind are ever active punishes their honest effort because His dignity is hurt through the day being chosen which is specially His own. What a pigmy the Precentor makes of the Deity! If no one else will repudiate this degradation of the All Father, I am bold to declare that the utterance is one which is unjustifiable, and which if it were true would make the vast majority of loving and unselfish creatures despair of the Creator."

We must add a few words of thanks to those written by Mrs. Allen for the quick and generous response to the appeal which we made last week to enable our Belgian Hospital Fund to provide 200 beds for the aged refugees at La Chartreuse de Neuville. This week our readers have given the price of 50 beds. But the need of the remaining 150 is very urgent. Mrs. Allen suggests the possibility that 15 donors may give £20 each, but of course this does not mean that larger or smaller gifts will not be most welcome. We are very anxious to fulfil this claim of Christian charity as quickly as possible.

THE NEW OUTLOOK FOR EDUCATION.

The Education Bill, which was introduced by Mr. Fisher last week, was described by Mr. Arthur Acland as the greatest advance in education that has been made since 1870. Its proposals are so far-reaching, and in many respects so revolutionary, that in normal times it would have been greeted with a fire of criticism, and in many respects with uncompromising opposition. The abolition of the half-timer, which has long been a matter of sharp controversy in the industrial life of Lancashire, the new restrictions upon child-labour, the raising of the school age, and compulsory continuation schools to the age of 18 for children who leave school before they are 16, these essential features of the new scheme involve such far-reaching changes in social habit and the economic structure of industrial life, that mere acquiesence in them, because we are too tired to think or too greatly preoccupied with other things to submit them to careful examination, is the worst tribute we can pay to their excellence. Fortunately Mr. Fisher was able to present his scheme with the ardour of personal conviction and to assume an intelligent belief in his countrymen that his reforms are on the right lines. In some quarters this belief has been stimulated by the social upheaval of the war. In others it is the product of a genuine respect for intelligence and a trained insight into the spiritual foundations of democracy.

There is no doubt that the industrial pressure upon the child-life of the country has increased enormously during the war. In a moving passage of his speech Mr. Fisher referred to the toll we have taken of our children in order to make ourselves strong in the face of the enemy. "In the three years of war," he said, "some 600,000 children have been withdrawn prematurely from school and immersed in industry. They are working on munitions, in the field, and in the mines. In a thousand different ways these children are contributing to our success in the war. Though they are earning in some cases high wages, these children are incurring a real sacrifice, the effects of which, in many cases, will be felt to the end of their lives." This is a state of things which cannot be allowed to continue. This waste of the true wealth of the nation must be stopped at a the earliest possible moment. On the other hand we cannot afford to increase the difficulties and the risks of the industrial settlement after the war by the competition of a mass of juvenile labour. For these reasons alone we hope that the Bill will be treated as one of urgency. The ordinary citizen, who has never paid much attention to educational ideals, can hardly fail to understand its usefulness in view of the practical problems which must be faced in the near future.

But Mr. Fisher bases his plea for reform upon something much wider than the duties and dangers of the present hour. Like a wise man he presents it as a war measure in order to win attention; but being also a man of faith he trusts chiefly to the inherent virtue of his own vision and ideal. For him the whole future of democracy is bound up with a growing sense of community in the immaterial wealth of the human mind and spirit. The boundaries of citizenship, he reminds us, are not determined by money, and the same logic which leads us to desire an extension of the franchise points also to an extension of education.

> There is a growing sense [he says] not only in England, but through Europe, and I may say especially in France, that the industrial workers of the country are entitled to be considered primarily as citizens and as fit subjects for any form of education by which they are capable of profiting. I notice also that a new way of thinking about education has sprung up among many of the more neglected members of our industrial army. They do not want education in order that they may become better technical workmen and earn higher wages; they do not want it in order that they may rise out of their own class. They want it because they know that in the treasures of the mind they can find an aid to good citizenship, a source of pure enjoyment, and a refuge from the necessary hardships of a life spent in the midst of the clanging machinery of our hideous cities of toil.

It is clear that new educational arrangements are only a means to an end, and this end, which is the production of intelligent, happy, and efficient citizens, can only be attained upon two conditions. It depends upon the curriculum and it depends upon the teachers. There are signs already of some conflict of opinion between the claims of science on the one hand and those of the humanities on the other. It is a rivalry which can only be settled by doing equal justice to both, and by keeping the manifold purpose of education steadily in view. The boys and girls in our schools have to be trained to play their part in the economic structure of society. Any system of education which tends to make them listless or inefficient members of the industrial hive will be condemned by all sensible men. But they must also learn to claim their rights and to honour their duties as citizens. We do our children a deep and lasting injury, if we withhold from them the history of their own country, never explaining to them the value of its institutions and the meaning of its laws, or teaching them merely the mechanical trick of reading without any fruitful contact with the literature which is their priceless legacy from the past. An imperial race cannot perform its duties upon a basis of ignorance. Some of our worst blunders in our dealings with other countries have been due to our lack of wisdom and insight, which are the twin daughters of intelligence. As Dr. Page pointed out the other day, the foundations of international friendship must be laid in the schools.

And what of the teachers who will be responsible for this new type of education? In its exacting demands upon rich stores of knowledge and a highly-trained imagination, will not its burden be too great for them? Let it be remembered that a change in our school system will involve far reaching reforms in the teaching profession as well. If we are anxious to create a democracy of knowledge and to throw open every career to intelligence, if it is our educational aim "to stimulate the civic spirit, promote general culture and technical knowledge, and diffuse a steadier judgment and a better-informed opinion through the whole body of the community," we must not shrink from applying our standards of equality to those who teach as well as to those who learn. The mass of the people have a right to claim that the most highly trained intelligence of the country shall be enlisted for the education of their children. There will be something fatally wrong with our school world until the brilliant scholar from Trinity or Balliol feels that it is just as fine a thing to train the minds and mould the characters of the sons of artisans as to join the staff of Eton or Rugby. To many of us such ideas may seem entirely quixotic, until we remember that there is one profession where this kind of equality has long been practised. A state of things which is recognised as natural in the Church cannot be vetoed as impossible in the schools.

In these remarks we have not referred to the religious controversies, which have so often confused our aims and frustrated educational reform in the past. We agree entirely with Mr. Fisher in recognising the importance of the spiritual aspects of education, and in his hope that "in the generally improved atmosphere which has been created by the war, parties may be brought closer together, and that a settlement of the outstanding issues may be reached." But we also agree with him that at this particular moment it is very desirable that the question of education should be considered in the light of educational needs alone. The demand for better education must be the first plank in any scheme for the improvement of society. Without an educated democracy, which is continually pressing forward to the conquest of new realms of knowledge, intelligence and moral power, all our labour upon schemes of reconstruction will be in vain.

IS PATRIOTISM ENOUGH?

Edith Cavell, the martyred nurse, in the few quiet days allotted her to prepare for death, is reported to have made the following pathetic and poignant statement—"Patriotism is not enough"—memorable words; her last, they say, by which she will be ever remembered. I know nothing at all about the life and personal history and religion of Nurse Cavell save her death and the devotion which led up to it. But her statement seems to suggest that love of country, love of England, had been a very strong, if not the main, motive in her life. When, however, death stared her in the face, inevitable, perhaps a few days, perhaps only a few hours distant, she must have felt acutely that even love of country, even dying for it, was not enough to satisfy the deep needs of her soul on its passage from time to eternity. She was giving her all for her country, her life, and yet she felt that even that was not enough. I am going to inquire what there is lacking in the creed that patriotism is enough.

For it is a creed which many hold to-day who have abandoned Christianity, and they believe it to be an adequate one. Indeed a well-known ex-priest of the Church of Rome, Prof. Loisy, has recently written a book in which he makes the following definite and unmistakable statement: "The most living, and, for some, the only living religion is not the Christian faith but the love of country. The true religion for now and always is devotion to France immortal."

I believe that Nurse Cavell was right and that Prof. Loisy is wrong. By that I do not mean that love of country may not prove to be a religion of a sort, and, up to a certain point, even a fairly satisfying religion: I only mean that it can never prove to be a religion capable of meeting and satisfying fully the deepest needs of the human soul. If you make your country your God, you may have exalted your country but you have lowered your God.

The best book, to my mind, the war has produced is 'A Student in Arms,' by the late Lieut. Donald Hankey. In it there is much to say as to the religion of the soldier. The writer, a very acute and sympathetic observer of the men at the front, was startled to discover that although they believed absolutely in the Christian virtues of unselfishness, generosity, charity, humility, they seemed, as a rule, not in the least to associate these with Christianity. He does not tell us in so many words, but it is evident in this case also that the main motive of the religion of the average soldier at the front, such as it is (and it also issues in the giving up even of life itself), is love of country rather than the Christian faith. The obvious question rises to the lips—But what religion could possibly effect more than this? "Greater love hath no man than this that a man lay down his life for his friend." Yet here again though the men at the front may in the bulk be more or less satisfied with this kind of religion, and feel the need of no other, it remains a fact that it did not satisfy Donald Hankey and was far from meeting the deepest needs of his soul.

I suppose it is that Donald Hankey has a different kind of soul from the other men, or rather that his soul has been more deeply stirred than that of others and therefore has deeper needs. Both he and they give themselves to death for their country—Donald Hankey had no hesitation in making the supreme surrender, but the others do no less. Those who are inspired by the Christian faith give up their lives, and those who are inspired only by love of country, altogether apart from the Christian faith, also give up their lives. Then what is the difference? Is it not in the quality of the soul of him who dies, his degree of spiritual discernment, his measure of spiritual experience?

Now what is true about those who give up their lives for their country, whether they are inspired by the Christian faith or merely by love of country is this—they have both discovered something bigger and higher and better than themselves, something which seems so immeasurably above them and more worth preserving than they, that their own lives even seem little in comparison with the preciousness of that which they seek to save. It is this getting out of oneself, out of one's mere self-centredness into some larger and nobler whole, having something to devote oneself to wholly apart from one's mere selfish interests—it is this which really matters. It is this which is the ultimately saving quality. It is this alone which nurtures the soul. Any real disinterestedness always saves; anything which manages to get us out of our meaner selves. All disinterestedness is on the road to religion. All those who give up their lives for a good cause, all those who make even the smallest sacrifices for it, all those who go out of their way at some cost to achieve something of good for others which is not related to their own selfish ends—all these have in them the stuff of which the highest religious nurture is made. But love is only the root of religion where the love is the love of God, where we love our fellow-man in God and God in our fellow-man; where we love our country in God and God in our country.

The aim of Christianity is to cultivate a certain spirit rather than to inculcate certain separate virtues: it has such confidence in that spirit that it knows that these separate virtues must inevitably issue from it. It aims at the greater in order to achieve the less, not at the less in order to proceed gradually and step by step to the greater. When Christ summed up all the Law and the Prophets he gave us two commandments—to love God and to love our neighbour. But the love of God comes first. We generally put it thus—Love man, and love of God will issue out of your love of man. But Christ put it the other way about—Love God, and love of neighbour will inevitably issue out of your love of God. Love of God and love of our neighbour are really inseparable if the love have any abiding reality. Love of God is an entire detachment from self, an adherence of our whole being to that infinite Being who is the true and only end of man. Such love is the source of all disinterestedness because it is itself a complete and absolute disinterestedness: the self is lost in love of God, but finds itself again in the love of our neighbour which is its necessary corollary. Love of our neighbour and love of country spring from love of God and not vice versa. Disinterestedness is the result not of our natural love of men but of our supernatural love of God. Only when we love God above all things is there full and complete security that we shall abidingly love our fellows or our country.

Now this is religion. It is the Christian religion. It is a religion far deeper than any religion—so-called—which merely springs from love of our fellows or from love of country. The one springs from a perishable source, the other from an imperishable. And only the latter has any just right and claim to that august name of religion. Country is not immortal, though Prof. Loisy calls it so. A day will come when France, when England will be no more. But religion is an abiding reality which can only issue from the Eternal.

READING FOR THE FRONT.

To the Editor of The Inquirer

Sir,—About seven months ago it occurred to me that it might be more useful and interesting to those who are fighting our battles in this horrible war to send them extracts from various papers and magazines instead of an occasional newspaper or periodical, and I then commenced sending a weekly book of cuttings to my son who is serving in France. My conjecture has been confirmed and my hopes rewarded by having received messages such as these: "The E.C.H. Gazette has been much appreciated by me and others—it is just splendid for us out here." "The officers read the E.C.H. Cuttings with great interest—the Serjeant always asks for the new number." "Nos. 13, 14 and 15 of the E.C.H.G. are excellent," and many others

To-day I have completed my thirtieth number, which I send you enclosed in the hope that it may suggest to some of the readers of The Inquirer to do likewise and save much valuable matter from the waste-paper basket and put it to a good use. I have made considerable use of The Inquirer, and have been greatly pleased to find that the religious and serious subjects have been appreciated as much as the lighter ones.—Yours, &c.,

E. C. Harding.

Eller Nook, Ambleside.
August 4, 1917.

[We have examined Mr. Harding's Gazette, composed of newspaper cuttings grave and gay from various sources, with the greatest pleasure and interest. It is a splendid piece of service for our aged friend to do, and we quite understand the eagerness of his readers as the weekly numbers appear. We hope that some of our readers will be inspired by his example to do likewise. All that is needed is a few sheets of paper made up into a dummy about the size of the ordinary weeklies into which the cuttings can be pasted, and a happy gift of selection. Mr. Harding's Gazette consists of 30 pages, and can be sent to France for 2½*d.*—Editor of Inquirer.]

THE LANGUAGE OF PRAYER.

To the Editor of The Inquirer.

Sir,—The Committee of the National Conference recommended all our churches to unite in holding services of "Commemoration and Reconsecration" on August 5, at the opening of the fourth year of the terrible war in which we are engaged, and intimated that a special form of service was being prepared and would soon be ready for issue. On their arrival it was found that the form was for "A Service of Remembrance and Renewal of Purpose." There are some of us inquiring what is to be understood from the language of the latter part of the last prayer but one, where it offers thanks "to that great nation of the West....who have come to the help of the Lord, to the help of the Lord against the mighty." Who is the Lord and who is the mighty referred to? Those of us who have been taught from our childhood to pray only to God for help are wondering whether the writer has given up his faith in the power of the Almighty to save, and now looks to man and his munitions to save not only himself, but the Lord also. In these times one expects to find some exaggeration of language, but as Unitarians it should still be our pride, as well as our duty, to use plain language before the world and without ambiguity, especially in the prayers of the sanctuary.—Yours, &c.,

HOME CAMP SOCIALS.

To the Editor of The Inquirer.

Sir,—With the kind co-operation of the congregations at Chatham and Mansfield I am arranging two special social gatherings; and I should be obliged if ministers and superintendents would let me know of men from their churches and schools who happen to be stationed in those places so that we may invite them to the meetings. The first event is fixed for August 29, and I want the names of soldiers at Chattenden Farm Barracks, Rochester and Chatham. On the 30th inst. the Mansfield meeting will take place and names of men in Clipstone Camp are wanted. They should be sent to me at Essex Hall as soon as possible, so that our friends at Chatham and Mansfield may know how many guests to expect.

May I also say how grateful I should be if those ladies and gentlemen who sent me special help last year for this social work would renew their contributions. The fund they provided enabled me to carry hospitality on their behalf to some hundreds of men in different parts of the country. The need is just as great this year, and I am doing what I can to gather our good fellows together for an evening's social intercourse wherever possible; but my fund is quite exhausted, and I am now "carrying on" in the hope that the great kindness of last year will be renewed, Contributions for this special work should be sent to me at Essex Hall, and marked "Social Fund."—Yours, &c.

MEMORIAL NOTICES.

SECOND LIEUT. E. W. R. BLAKE.

The news that Lieutenant E. W. R. Blake had been killed in the great battle around Ypres came as a heavy blow on the morning of August Bank holiday. It was known that he had been in that big fight, but it was stated that among the officers of his company there had been no casualties. Alas there proved to have been one! Edward William Richmond Blake, the only son of Major E. J. Blake and Mrs. Blake was born on May 27, 1897, in the Old House, Crewkerne, where his grandfather and great grandfather had been born before him. A delicate child, he needed the most careful nursing and attention. Gradually however, as the years passed he threw off this early delicacy, but until quite recent times, though overflowing with life and spirits, he had to keep a constant check upon himself. He was not able to go to a public school or to take a full part in the active games of youth which was most irksome to him. So he lived practically his whole life in Crewkerne and received his education at home. No better testimony to the value and wisdom of that training could possibly be given than the fact that when twelve months ago he was at last pronounced fit and to his great joy was able to enlist as a private in the 8th Somersets and afterwards to enter the Cadet School at Lichfield, he gained the cordial and affectionate respect of officers and men alike. He was convinced of the righteousness of England's cause and burned with a desire to take his place side by side with the brave men who were bearing the chief burden. Colonel Amory who commanded the Battalion of 4th Somersets to which he was attached wrote that he was quite one of the keenest boys to get out to France whom he had had. He was gazetted on March 10, and on May 6 he had his wish and went out to France.

From France his letters were of the most cheerful. He said it was the happiest time of his life and that he would not have missed it for anything. He seemed to feel a deep thankfulness that he was at last able to take a man's full part and to glory in it. On July 31, he was deputed to lead in an attack on a small wood occupied by the Germans and in that attack he fell at the head of his men fatally wounded by a rifle bullet. His was the leading company and his the place of honour. Captain Baker of his company wrote of him: "He died quite happily within a couple of hours of being shot by a rifle bullet. We attacked about 8 a.m. and he fell as he was leading his platoon. One of his men remained with him to the end, and he said that he was very calm. He took off his glasses and his wrist-watch and asked him just to hold his hand. Thus he quietly died, another of the many gallant heroes who pass away in silence." Testimony to the fact that he won the warm regard of his fellow officers and of his men comes from all sides. His Colonel says of him that he was an excellent officer in every way, utterly fearless in the discharge of his duties, and that the whole battalion was the poorer by his loss.

In Crewkerne where he was best known he was held in the highest respect. He had warm friends on all sides. He was keenly interested in the life of the Unitarian Church and school, and an invaluable influence there. While his fellow-members deeply mourn his loss they are very proud of him. A Memorial Service was held in the Church on Sunday morning when a crowded congregation representative of all sides of Crewkerne life assembled to honour his memory. S. H. S.

LANCE-CORPORAL A. E. RYMER.

It is with great regret that we have to announce that Lance-Corporal A. E. Rymer, eldest son of Mr. and Mrs. E. G. Rymer, of Hull, was killed in action on the 4th inst. "Lance-Corporal A. E. Rymer [we quote from a notice in The Hull Times] was for three years a pupil at the Hull Technical College and was continuing his studies for the degree of B.Sc., the intermediate examination for which he had already passed. On the outbreak of the war he gave up his position as chemist with Messrs. Hanger Watson & Harris, Ltd., Paint Manufacturers, and joined the East Riding Division of the Royal Engineers. After serving on the Humber Defences, he was transferred in February, 1916, at his own request to the Royal Engineers (chemists' section) for service abroad. He had just returned to France after his first leave. His Commanding Officer writes: 'He was one of the best men in my section and was one of the first to gain promotion in the company. He was always a willing worker and extremely cool when in a dangerous position and had a happy disposition which made him friends with everybody.' Friends at home especially those connected with Park Street Unitarian Church, where he held the post of organist, will greatly miss the inspiration of his high-minded, genial nature." The following is an extract from a letter from the senior chaplain (Methodist) 2nd Canadian Division, B.E.F.: "Your son was killed by a shell while on advanced duty with his section. The funeral was at the military cemetery here and his section attended en masse. You will no doubt be glad to know of your son's continued interest in religious things. He told me at a service of mine that he was a Unitarian and expressed a desire to meet me again....I tell you this not to make you think his views were changing, there is no evidence of that, but simply to assure you that he was deeply interested in the things of God. I feel sure he was found acceptable in His sight."

MRS. FARQUHARSON KENNEDY.

We regret to have to record the death of Mrs. Farquharson Kennedy, of Aberdeen, which occurred at a nursing home in the city. She was the sister of the Rev. Alexander Farquharson, of Maidstone, and was a vigorous and effective worker in many movements and societies for the uplift of humanity. In the Sunday school at Aberdeen she was first scholar and then teacher, and soon found her sympathies leading her to the Labour movement. Mrs. Kennedy was in the 45th year of her age and her loss will be keenly felt, in Labour circles, in the Co-operative movement and in all educational concerns of Aberdeen. She was a most eloquent speaker, and on several occasions occupied the Unitarian pulpit. In 1900 she went to Paris as a Scottish representative to the International Socialist Congress, and took a prominent part at that Congress in the work of the Education section. In 1902 she married Mr. Thomas Kennedy who is at present a sergeant in the R.A.M.C. Mr. Kennedy stood as Socialist candidate for the Parliamentary division of North Aberdeen, and Mrs. Kennedy proved herself one of her husband's ablest and most energetic supporters. She was member of the Aberdeen School Board, a director of the Northern Co-operative Company and Secretary of the Associated Women's Friendly Society. Although she had not been in robust health for some time past her death was a shock to all associated with her, for her activities were kept up to the time of her entering the nursing home.

The funeral took place on July 19 at St. Peter's Cemetery, Aberdeen, and was conducted by the Rev. Lucking Tavener, Col. Rev. James Smith and the Rev. Charles Mackie.

WEEKLY NOTES.

The response to our appeal for help to send out 200 beds for the poor old folk sent away from the front has been, as usual, generous and prompt. We are now in a position to send 50 beds, but we still want to send the remaining 150! If we could find fifteen people to give us £20 each it would be done. Time is important in this case, as one feels that these old people may not live long. The uprooting has shaken them terribly. I first learnt of the need through a letter which the director wrote to my husband while I was in Calais. In that letter he wrote as follows:—

"I should like to explain to you what anxiety this sudden increase in my numbers causes me. As far as food is concerned I do not think I need feel anxiety, for the precautionary measures that I have taken will, I think, prove adequate. Unfortunately, however, I cannot provide these poor old people, as I ought to, with a comfortable night's rest. I am obliged to let them sleep on the old plank beds. I am very sorry that Mrs. Allen cannot visit us just now, as I feel sure that she would find some plan for improving the lot of our poor old people."

In consequence of this appeal I postponed my return home for a week and went to La Chartreuse to see for myself the condition of the refugees and to devise some means of helping them. I spent three days at the institution and saw all the new developments, and was entirely convinced of the absolute necessity for helping these poor old refugees. I told the director I would find the beds somehow, trusting to my friends at home to back me up. I believe they will do so.

SOUTH WALES UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

The Annual Meeting of the above Association were held at Ciliau Aeron, Cardiganshire, August 1 and 2, followed by a Ministers' Meeting at Aberayron on the 3rd. There were present Mr. Josiah R. Jones, C.C. (President), Mr. D. Martin Jones, J.P. (Llandyssul, Treasurer), the Revs. John Davies, R. C. Jones, David Evans, T. Arthur Thomas (Secretary), Lewis Williams, E. O. Jenkins, T. Oswald Williams, D. G. Rees, E. R. Dennis, J. Carrara Davies, T. Lloyd Jones (Liverpool), E. Gwilym Evans (Dukinfield), James E. Jenkins (Birkenhead), D. Cellan Evans (Pastor), Miss E. Rosalind Lee (representing the British and Foreign Unitarian Association), together with lay delegates from all the Cardiganshire churches. Preaching services were held at Rhydygwin and Ciliau on Wednesday evening, when the Revs. David Evans and D. G. Rees, preached at the former place, and the Revs. Lewis Williams and E. O. Jenkins, preached at the latter. On Thursday afternoon two inspiring sermons were delivered by the Revs. E. Gwilym Evans and E. R. Dennis, while Miss Rosalind Lee gave an interesting and helpful address, dealing with reconstruction and the place women should take after the war in building up the social and the religious life of our churches. A mural tablet which had been erected by the congregation at Ciliau to the memory of the late Rev. E. Ceredig Jones, M.A., was unveiled, and addresses were delivered by the Revs. T. Lloyd Jones (Liverpool) and John Davies, two very old and intimate friends of the late Mr. Jones. On Thursday evening, the meetings were brought to a close with two helpful sermons from the Revs. T. Oswald Williams and D. G. Rees. There were large congregations at each of the services, and among those present at some of the services, were the vicar of the parish, three Congregational ministers (one of whom introduced one of the services) and a Wesleyan minister.

At the business meeting on Thursday morning, the Rev. T. Arthur Thomas, was elected president; Mr. David Davies, Gellionen, vice-president; Mr. D. Martin Jones, J.P., treasurer, and the Rev. E. O. Jenkins, secretary. Important matters dealing with the churches were discussed. Three resolutions were passed (1) Advocating total prohibition of the manufacture of alcoholic beverages during the war; (2) Congratulating the farmers for not distributing beer during the hay harvest, and (3) Supporting the Government in the prosecution of the war, for the maintenance of those ideals of liberty and justice which are the common and sacred cause of the Allies.

Through the kindness of the Rev. T. Lloyd Jones, the ministers were able to meet at Aberayron on Friday, and after dinner generously provided by the host at the Feathers Royal Hotel, a very thoughtful address was given by the Rev. E. Gwilym Evans, of Dukinfield, on the 'Religious Outlook in our Unitarian Churches.' This was followed by an interesting discussion in which all the ministers took part. Mr. Lloyd Jones was cordially thanked for his generous entertainment of the ministerial brethren of whom there were thirteen present.

THE CONFERENCE OF MODERN CHURCHMEN AT CAMBRIDGE.

[By a Member of the Churchmen's Union.]

The fourth annual conference of Modern Churchmen promoted by the Churchmen's Union was held at Girton College from Wednesday evening, August 8, to Monday morning, August 13 inclusive, when the subject under discussion was 'The Church.' Residence within the College was afforded to upwards of one hundred members and friends who spent a very happy five days both renewing old friendships and making new ones. The conditions from a social point of view were ideal; life within the college for a small community is self contained, and the distance from Cambridge is sufficiently great to keep members from scattering, especially since their time was fully filled up with lectures and debates during the day, so that every opportunity was given for cultivating friendships, and for members talking out amongst themselves the topics of absorbing interest (the things which really matter in the Church and State to-day) started by eminent leaders of progressive religious thought. Further, the members had the privilege of uniting in daily worship in the College Chapel, at Holy Communion in the morning and Evensong in the evening.

"We are saved by hope," Bishop Mercer's text at the opening service on Wednesday evening struck the key-note of the Union, which stands for progress as an essential feature of a living Church, and he showed how the idea of progress rests on the belief in the rationality of the Universe. On the same evening, Canon Glazebrook, the Chairman of the Council, at the opening address pictured a dream of unity. Can we dream of so uniting Christians as really to influence national policy? So long as England desires to be called a Christian country there is no reason why she should not continue to give national recognition to the Christian faith by appointing a body of men to represent the whole. But surely that body ought to include the whole of English Christianity, not merely a part. Some form of federation between all the chief Christian communities would seem to be an essential condition of maintaining a stable National Church.

Did Christ found the Church?

This was the subject of the address given by the Dean of St. Paul's. Jesus Christ appeared to his contemporaries, not as a Founder of a new religion but as a Prophet. The Synoptic Gospels are emphatic upon this. His teaching was moral and personal, but all that raised him above the old prophets did not sever him from the class to which he belonged. He claimed spiritual independence while accepting the institutions of his time and country. We cannot tell how far he really expected the Messianic Kingdom which he claimed, at any rate he did not prevent his disciples from thinking that it was near at hand. But how can one whose cry was hora novissima have thought of founding a new Church? The break with Judaism was inevitable, but he made no provision for a Christian polity. The Catholic Church was the result of historic conditions, and grew like other institutions.

A Simple Religion Needed.

Sir William J. Ashley, Professor of Economics at Birmingham University, speaking on 'The Ministry of the Church—its Functions,' limited himself to the functions of the Church of England to-day, and gave vigorous expressions to views on Church polity which are probably representative of the thought of a large majority of educated laymen in the Church at the present time. With regard to Priesthood, men could not any longer really believe that absolution by a priest had any effect on the mind of the Eternal, or that the value of the Communion depended on the validity of the priest's ordination, or that baptism puts a child who died immediately after in any better position than a child not baptised, or that Confirmation was helfpul in any other way than solemn reception into any Christian body might be. When he said that people could not believe this or that, he meant that the great body of the English people could not believe in such a way as to affect their daily outlook.

The religion of the great body of the English people, whether "educated" or not, seemed to him wonderfully simple. It consisted in the belief that there is a good God, that He intends us to be good, that it is right that we should be good, that the essence of goodness is kindness, and that of kindness Jesus is the great example. He did not say that this was all that most of them would readily assent to when more elaborate statements were put before them, but when it came to times of deep feeling and spontaneous expression it was a very simple creed by which they lived or recognised that they should live. The working faith of the English people was what theologians were apt to dismiss rather contemptuously as a "vague religiosity." Yet it was a positive faith, the very opposite of infidelity, and one capable of becoming intense and dominating without ceasing to be simple. Many of the poor rarely attended Church, not because they were irreligious, but because they had long since received and absorbed the truths by which they lived, while the idea that attending at public worship was a duty did not occur to them, and did not seem credible when suggested. Non-attendance at Church services might thus be a sign not that the Church had failed, but that it has succeeded. If the clergy could overcome the sense of personal slight because their ministrations are neglected, and could rid themselves of the pagan notion that mere bodily presence in Church is pleasing to the Supreme Being, they would take their scanty Sunday morning congregations and their non-existent week-day ones with more equanimity.

Sir William passed on to consider suggested reforms in our forms of service and worship, and with regard to preaching and the consideration which should be duly paid to the weaker brethren, he was emphatic in the opinion that the preacher should give his people positive and not negative truths. But for his part, the older he got the more he returned to the conception of the Christian minister, not as the preacher of doctrine, or the performer of rites, but as the promoter of kindly feeling in the parish, the painstaking and thoughtful friend of all in trouble of mind and body.

Whether or not all were in agreement with Sir William Ashley, none could fail to appreciate the freshness and vigour of his thought, and his frank outspoken expression of it which was not merely spontaneous but the result of wide experience and a deep-seated knowledge of political economy. Time and space fail us to draw illustrations from other equally interesting and inspiring addresses, but we strongly recommend our readers to order The Modern Churchman for August in which (and possibly the following number) a full report of these addresses will be published.

THE SOCIETY OF FRIENDS AND THE WAR.

The Manchester Corporation passed a resolution recently requesting the University to withdraw its licence and subvention to Dalton Hall on the ground of the views of its Principal, Mr. J. W. Graham, on the war. We can only regard the resolution, which strikes us as extremely unwise, as due to excited feeling divorced from sound judgment. In a letter to The Manchester Guardian, in which he refers to the matter, Principal Graham gives the following admirable description of the moral perplexities and the divided counsels which exist in the Society of Friends at the present moment:—

"I have never yet replied [he writes] to the charge of being 'anti-British,' or its variant 'pro-German,' because I never supposed that any one really believed it. It is too incredible, even allowing much for the oddities of human nature. But now that the municipality of a great city has acted on the mere epithet, without any other evidence or argument, it seems well to meet it.

"I have always moved among people keenly interested in war and peace, and I have never met any one who desired the Germans, or our previous less barbarous enemies, to win. Why, indeed, should anyone show such unnatural perversity? The Society of Friends, in its most ancient and its most recent utterances, has declared all war to be contrary to the spirit of Christ, and I hold that view. But the practical applications of it made by Friends have been various. Some have thrown it over altogether for this war, as being an exceptional one. At the other extreme are Friends who are Tolstoyan, who object to all use of force whatever, and offer complete non-resistance. Between these lies the main body of Friends, who allow that force has a certain limited place in human affairs, but not in the gross form of war. Some hold a theoretically absolute objection to the best of wars, others prefer to say that the ideal war does not happen, and that they are against each war as it occurs. Of my two sons, one is a conscientious objector and one is in the navy. Both are equally brave, and both loathe war, but in the clash of rival loyalties they have come down on different sides. Indeed, it is very hard when the State is at war, probably impossible however earnestly desired, to be consistent in allegiance both to the earthly and the heavenly citizenship."

RECHABITES FIGHTING FORCE.

At the High Movable Conference of the Independent Order of Rechabites Friendly Scciety held in Manchester last week, the High Chief Ruler, Mr. William David (Llanelly) said the membership of the Order in 1916 was as follows: adults 373,294, juveniles 329,555, State section 388,754, showing a total increase of 73,257 since 1914. It was matter for satisfaction that while other large friendly societies had to bemoan dwindling memberships, their own growth had been steady and constant, a fact which implied that they succeeded in holding their members when they got them. So far as could be ascertained 126,691 of their members had taken part in the active services of the country. Six had won the Victoria Cross and 173 had obtained other decorations. To about 5,000 had fallen the supreme distinction of dying for their country. In the matter of temperance work generally the Hign Chief Ruler said at its present magnitude there was nothing beyond the accomplishment of the Rechabite Order, with proper organisation of resources. The liquor sellers' money and influence had often beaten them. He trusted they would soon turn the tables upon them, and fight all the legions of darkness to their utter discomfiture. They might begin at once by parrying the insidious proposal for the purchase of the liquor trade by the nation. He had ventured to say on numerous platforms that a million Rechabites would have no part or lot in it. In that he felt sure he had the approval of the Conference.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Leicester.—The Rev. R. F. Rattray, M,A., Ph.D., of Hindley, has received and accepted a unanimous invitation to become minister of the Great Meeting congregation. He will begin his ministry on November 4.

Mansfield.—In commemoration of the third anniversary of the war a United Religious Service and Public Meeting were held in the Market Square on August 5. At the Religious Service the Rev. F. J. Adams (Church of England) gave the address, the Rev. C. F. Gill (Primitive Methodist) read the lesson, and the minister of the Old Meeting House, the Rev. C. M. Wright, offered the prayers.

Mottram.—A Welcome Party was held at Mottram on Saturday last to celebrate the resettlement of the Rev. H. Bodell Smith. Mr. J. E. Booth (chairman), the Revs. H. E. Dowson, A. Thornhill, J. Ellis, J. Wilson, and Mr. Irvin Swindells (secretary) spoke, giving a welcome to Mr., Mrs., and Miss Smith, and the Rev. H. Bodell Smith responded. The Rev. H. E. Dowson said it was a fine testimonial for a minister to be invited to settle with the same congregation a second time. In this case it is the second congregation of which Mr. Smith has been twice the settled minister. Tea was provided, and local friends contributed suitable music.

The Interdenominational Conference of Social Service Unions has appointed a small committee, consisting of the Bishop of Oxford, Father Plater, the Rev. A. J. Carlyle, the Rev. H. H. Johnson, Miss Lucy Gardner and Mr. Malcolm Spencer, in order to promote the formation of local Social Service Unions on the lines of the successful experiment at Evesham, which Mr. Johnson described recently in our columns.

We have received a small pamphlet entitled 'What do you believe about the Bible?' by the Rev. J. C. Ballantyne, minister of the High Pavement Chapel, Nottingham.

OUT OF THE HEART OF THE STORM.

Twelve Sermons preached at Rosslyn Hill Chapel, Hampstead, and Manchester College, Oxford.

BY

Rev. HENRY GOW, B.A.

The sermons are written by one who believes with President Wilson that "right is more precious than peace," and that no personal sorrow or loss should discourage us and turn us from our firm resolve to overthrow the Prussian autocracy. They are written too in the growing confidence that faith in God and in the supremacy of Love has become more and not less possible and real through the conflict and agony of recent times.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

The address for our Belgian Hospital Fund, to which cheques and parcels of clothing should be sent, is Mrs. Bernard Allen, 14 Gainsborough Gardens, Hampstead, N.W.3.

THE Pope's proposals for peace have been received with courtesy but without enthusiasm. A perusal of the full text hardly justifies the faint hopes which were aroused by the inspired summary. To put the matter quite frankly the suggested terms afford no basis for negotiation which the Allies could possibly accept. It is hardly profitable to inquire whether they have been deliberately conformed to the desires of Austria, for hereditary influence at the Vatican would ensure some special regard for Austrian interests. The refusal of the Pope to express any condemnation of wanton aggression, and of the terrible crimes which have followed in its train, has deprived him of all moral authority with the Allies. Even in the case of Belgium he makes no demand that Germany shall make ample reparation for the wrong which she has done. He asserts that there must be complete evacuation of Belgium, with a guarantee of her full political, military, and economic independence towards all Powers whatsoever; but when it comes to a question of the wanton damage done to her he has no word to say beyond commending a general principle of "complete and reciprocal condonation."

IT is interesting to observe how strongly America is setting her face against any compromising terms of peace. Writing last Sunday the correspondent of the Daily Telegraph gives an admirable summary of the converging lines of opinion.

> America's leading peace societies [he says] have passed resolutions declaring that the future of the world could be made effective only by the abolition of Prussian military autocracy at whatever cost. The League to Enforce Peace, of which Mr. Taft is president, urges the vigorous prosecution of the war until Prussian militarism is destroyed, either by the Allied forces or the uprising of the German democracy. Mr. Wilson is being urged by many authoritative Americans to avail himself of another chance of emphasising to the world that America fights against autocracy to save democracy, and not for selfish aims. He is also being urged to declare to Berlin that the greatest injury Germany has done the United States is not in sinking the Lusitania or invading American rights on the high seas, but in trying persistently and systematically since the war began to foment strife and sedition and riot in every State of the Union. To quote The New York Tribune to-day: "The real casus belli is the German performance within this nation. The true injury is the attempt to destroy us, to wreck the American Republic as the Russian Republic has been well-nigh wrecked."

THE dream, which is cherished by some generous minds, that Germany is in a more reasonable mood than is generally supposed, has received a rude shock this week from Mr. Gerard's revelations. As recently as last January Herr Bethmann-Hollweg, who was supposed to be in favour of moderate counsels, upheld the policy of permanent control over Belgium. On several occasions he said that the Germans were willing to withdraw from the country, but "with guarantees." When he was pressed to describe these guarantees in specific terms, he replied: "We must possibly have the forts of Liège and Namur. We must have other forts and garrisons throughout Belgium. We must have possession of the railroad lines. We must have possession of the ports and other means of communication. The Belgians will not be allowed to maintain an army, but we must be allowed to retain a large army in Belgium. We must have commercial control of Belgium."

HERE we have, naked and unashamed, the claim of the robber to exploit his victims and to enjoy his booty. We await with eager longing the day when these aims will be repudiated, but we fear that they are still cherished by a large section of the German people in order to satisfy the demand for some big result from the war, just as another section have set their hearts upon colonial expansion with the quite definite aim of inflicting permanent injury upon the British Empire. In a recent number of The New Europe there is a long quotation from a most illuminating article by Emil Zimmermann, which appeared on July 14. The object of the writer is to emphasise the need of securing a great Mittelafrika as the foundation of Germany's world-power. "Mittelafrika [he says] would lie in the very centre of England's main arteries leading to South Africa, Australia and India; and, in German hands, it would contribute towards crippling the British Empire. Through German 'Central Africa' we should best be able to influence decisions in Australia and India, as we could threaten their sea communications with England. And thus a strong German Central Africa could help towards German possessions in the South Seas."

THESE utterances by the late Chancellor and Herr Emil Zimmermann are very significant, and we fear they must be accepted as representative not of small cliques, but of a very formidable body of opinion in Germany. We cite them here because they make it plain, that the ardent lovers of peace and goodwill have no other course open to them but to fight on with all the strength and courage at their command. With this truculent spirit there can be no compromise; neither can it be changed into something mild and conciliatory by discussion. We are face to face with the idolatry of power, which threatens quite shamelessly to destroy the liberties of the whole world. We wish that it could be overthrown by the easy expedient of sending representatives of Labour to Stockholm, but we fear that it will only yield to the grim argument of the battlefield.

IT is pleasant to turn from these thoughts of strife to the vision of a new

India, which is claiming as large a share of public attention as can be spared from the imperious needs of the war. The publication of Mr. Gokhale's 'Last Testament' in The Times last week, Lord Islington's address at Oxford, and Mr. Montagu's important announcement in the House of Commons on Monday have suddenly brought far-reaching reforms in the government of India within the sphere of practical politics. "The policy of his Majesty's Government," Mr. Montagu said, "with which the Government of India are in complete accord, is that of the increasing association of Indians in every branch of the Administration, and the gradual development of self-governing institutions with a view to the progressive realisation of responsible Government in India as an integral part of the British Empire."

In a letter to The Times Sir Francis Younghusband draws a fascinating picture of the industrial future of India, and the close co-operation between Englishmen and Indians in its development. "The advent of the aeroplane will make it easier to get there, and science will make it pleasanter to live there. Wheat, cotton, and sugar growers, tea, coffee, and rubber planters, machinery sellers, engineers, scientific experts, teachers, lawyers, and publicists of all kinds will be attracted to India in increasing numbers. They will acquire a stake, an interest, and a pride in the country. And at the same time Indians under this stimulus will throw up more and more of such politicians as Mr. Gokhale, men of letters as Sir Rabindranath Tagore, and leaders of industry as Mr. Tata. From this double process there will arise a demand from British as well as Indians for a Government responsible to India itself. And by the end of another three centuries of British settlement in India the country will have long ceased to be governed under the benevolent despotism of Englishmen responsible to a Parliament in England. It will be governed instead by an Executive and Legislature composed of both Indians and British-Indians; and the Government will be responsible to India alone." But this does not mean that the tie with England will be broken. "Neither an India dominated by British rulers nor an India ruled only by Indians alone, but an India governed by all the races of India, British-Indians as well as Indians, and forming an integral part of the British Empire, is clearly the goal at which we should aim."

Once again our readers have enabled us to do the special piece of work in which our Belgian Hospital Fund is deeply interested at the present moment. It will be seen in Mrs. Allen's notes that we have received enough money to provide 150 beds, and we only want 50 more in order to make these aged Belgian refugees comfortable and happy. They need so little, and that little we can supply. Over and over again we have found renewal of our own faith in this work and the unfailing generosity with which our readers have answered our appeals. Amid the desolating clamour of war there is still left to us this happy partnership in the pure joy of doing good.

DID CHRIST FOUND THE CHURCH?

The question which the Dean of St. Paul's put to the recent Conference of the Churchmen's Union at Cambridge seems to have startled some people by its boldness. Probably it has never occurred to them to ask whether the Church as they know it was definitely intended by the Founder of Christianity to be the permanent result of his life and mission. They may admit that corruptions in doctrine and ritual have crept in here and there, but these can always be corrected by comparison with the primitive pattern, which in their view corresponds fairly closely with the form of belief and worship which they themselves accept. Thus the sacramentalist turns eagerly to every word in the New Testament which seems to support his own preferences, and the puritan lifts up into lonely prominence the passages, and it must be confessed that they are neither few nor unimportant, which diminish the obligation of forms or warn men of their danger. We are all inclined to place our own meaning upon the written word, and when clear evidence fails us to use the rhetoric of Christian sentiment in order to prove that we have the sanction of Christ himself for our own practice and belief.

But the state of confused and sometimes embittered controversy, which results from this habit of claiming the sanction of the same mind for things which are plainly contradictory, may suggest to some thoughtful people the possibility that we are all mistaken. The problem which confronts us at the present time is not the old one of proving that our own pattern is the only one which can claim to be authentic. What we need is a more sensitive appreciation of the aim and spirit of Christ as they are disclosed to us in the primitive records, and a better knowledge of the atmosphere of the Græco-Roman world, intellectual, social and religious, which reacted with immeasurable force, both for good and evil, upon the thought and ritual of the early Church. It is acknowledged by all competent minds that historical study has modified our attitude to the writings of the New Testament. We treat them now as human documents rather than as divine oracles; and if the reverence we feel for them and the guidance we derive from them are still quite priceless in their value, no one can deny that it is with a momentous difference. The same spirit of inquiry has been at work in the less familiar field of early Christian history. We can watch the development of the Church as an institution under limiting human conditions. We can trace the gradual emergence of its classical forms of doctrine under the stress of controversy or the impulse of intellectual need. We can follow the long and fascinating struggle between the priesthoods and sacraments of the ancient world and the religious demands of the new Christian spirit, resulting in a compromise in which both can claim the victory. No one who has entered with an open mind into these new realms of knowledge will claim that the authority of the Christian ministry or the value of sacraments can be proved by the old arguments, which traced them back to the decree of Christ himself. They still bear the marks upon them of their human origin under special historical conditions, and they must always be strictly subordinate to the divine Spirit of life, which either created them or adopted them for its own use under the controlling influence of a civilisation very different from our own.

We presume that it was considerations of this kind which the Dean of St. Paul's had in view when he asked "Did Christ found the Church?" and implied that the question could no longer be answered in the old simple way. He insisted that Jesus Christ made no provision for a Christian polity. The Catholic Church was the result of historical conditions, and historic fatalism must not be invoked, as was frequently done by liberal Catholics, in order to make everything it did to establish its own prowess and authority necessary and justifiable. Catholicism was really a legacy of the ancient civilisation. It owed more to Greece and Rome than to Galilee. It was an adaptation of the old religion of the Mediterranean races and derived much of its strength from its non-Christian elements. To some people this may sound very alarming, and there are minds for whom it will create a great disturbance of faith; but it is a truth which needs to be spoken with this considered plainness of speech, and it cannot be discredited by the familiar appeals to dogma and sentiment, or dismissed as the hard prejudice of a rationalist. It rests upon a foundation of accurate knowledge, of which every serious student of the subject has to take account.

But here the religious mind will be eager to make a distinction. It does not follow that Jesus Christ is not the real founder of the movement which bears his name, though he may never have dictated its doctrines or prescribed its ritual. With this plea, in common with Dean Inge, we are in entire agreement. Religious genius is usually impatient of programmes. Its supreme confidence in God enables it to dispense with any attempt to bind the future. It does not so much devise a movement as make it inevitable, and it imparts to it the distinctive qualities of its own life. This is an accurate description of the manner in which Christianity was born. Jesus Christ was not so much the founder of the Christian Church as its creative spirit. His life called it into being, and he left to it as his perpetual gift what was most distinctive in his own religion, his sense of the close relationship between the soul and God, his prophetic vision of righteousness, his sense of the infinite claims of love, and his unfailing compassion for human infirmity. It is in this hidden sphere of character and spirit, to which everything else should be secondary in a society which is truly Christian, that we must look for the secret of the continuity of the Church. It is here too that we discover the unfailing source of its renewal.

Two results of far-reaching importance follow from this conclusion. If the Christian movement lives not on an unchanging deposit but by a creative spirit it must always retain the power to absorb, to adapt, to fashion new channels for religion, which it used on the whole with conspicuous wisdom and courage in the Græco-Roman world. It is not bound by the forms which it made or accepted for its use in particular historical circumstances, after the whole temper and outlook of civilisation has changed. It can never live in the past or allow its worship to be controlled by archæology, when its chief business is to convince men of the immediacy of the presence of God. Nor on the other hand, is it possible to look with much hopefulness upon movements of reunion which are based upon uniformity of doctrine or ritual. It may perhaps, be pleaded that ritual being less rigid than dogma lends itself more readily to imaginative interpretation; but this is in itself a confession that the ritual is valued chiefly for the emotional charm which it imparts to worship and not because it mediates a necessary grace. In other words ritual, though it may still be reverently observed, is secondary. The difficulty, which is inherent in all ritualistic movements, is their tendency to become external and divisive and to put the observance of a particular method of worship on the same level as the practice of goodness. Against this danger Christianity in its primitive and most essential teaching was a vigorous protest. Every scheme of comprehension or reunion, which is worthy of consideration at the present time, must allow for the changefulness of the forms of religion, and for this very reason it will trust far more than men have done in the past to the creative spirit of love and goodness, which fashions men into the likeness of the sons of God. Amid the decay of divisions and misunderstandings, which have long survived any deep conviction of their intrinsic value, there is a reasonable hope that many men will find a new centre of loyalty and cohesion in the supremacy of the mind of Christ over the attempts which have been made to define its meaning or to limit its operation. To the building of this new Church of the Spirit, rich in the graces of divine love and human sympathy, those who have seen the vision and heard the call will be eager to devote their noblest energies. Between them and those who maintain that their priesthood and sacraments were ordained by Jesus Christ and must always remain a necessary part of the Christian religion there is still a great gulf fixed. But it is the blessed privilege of the Church of the Spirit to believe that this gulf, while it is wide and menacing for the mind of man, has no existence in the mind of God.

THE HARVEST OF THE SEA.

Peace or war made little difference to Waster, so having, as usual, nothing particular to do he decided on spending the week-end at the sea. Brilliant sunshine woke him soon after six next morning, he had his breakfast betimes, and set out for a walk along the cliff. He enjoyed walking in the country and especially by the sea. It dispelled the tedium of his vacant life, rousing a flicker of youthful buoyancy till he whistled as he went along and forgot to remind himself that he was getting old. At some distance in front of him he saw the figure of a man going in the same direction as himself along the cliff-path. As he was walking briskly the distance between them was speedily reduced, so that he could now easily see what sort of person it was. He too was travelling at a steady though less rapid pace. A tall man, somewhat loosely built, but muscular and vigorous. His dun-coloured clothes were patched but not perceptibly ragged; his shoes so worn that they scarce hung about his feet, the dust-stained flesh being visible along the side of one, the toes and heel protruding from the other. Over his shoulder was slung an empty sack. With figure slightly bent he pressed forwards.

Gaining upon him Waster took stock of the man, noting all these points. Then he said to himself: "The pest! this fellow's a tramp. If I attempt to pass him he'll ask for money, and if I refuse, as I certainly shall, for I don't believe in pampering such worthless louts, he'll hang on me for goodness knows how long. Besides, the villain's temper is not a thing to trifle with; he's obviously a strong man, has nothing to lose, and the edge of the cliff is disagreeably near. I won't run the risk; the man's not to be trusted."

Waster therefore hung back, slackening his pace, so as to allow the other to get on ahead, meditating the while on what a plague these indolent wastrels are to society. Why should decent citizens be pestered by them? They are the vermin of the city and a menace to lonely wayfarers on the road. Why not take effective measures to have done with them once and for all? What's the use of public authorities, or of Parliament itself, when they allow a glaring evil of this kind to go on unchecked? He occupied his thoughts in criticising the futile methods in vogue for dealing with vagrants, and, condemning them all, pronounced, after the manner of his class, that if he had the authority it should be a case of work or starve, with the option of the lethal chamber to finish the business promptly. Waster ignored the fact that he was himself nothing better than a vagrant. True, his circumstances did not compel him to pass his life on the road. He had ample means, and, owing to the fact that his father had stuck to business and been lucky in speculation, he himself did not need to pursue any definite vocation. He was married but had no family. None the less, he was exceedingly close with his money. If asked for a contribution towards some humane object, his invariable answer was: "No, it was not his habit to give in a public way. His gifts were a matter that he kept between himself and his God." This was true. His God was identical with himself and his charities remained in his pocket.

He soon grew tired, however, of restraining his natural pace, while there seemed no prospect of the tramp deviating from the path for miles to come. There was no other track. "Hang it!" he said to himself, "I can't stand this—I'll put on steam and get past the fellow."

He did so. The tramp took no notice of him except to move respectfully off the path so as to allow him to pass. "Thank you," said Waster with involuntary politeness. The man touched his cap and trudged on without a word. Waster had already put two or three yards between them, and it was evident that the other had no intention to beg. Considering all the foregoing reflections the situation now seemed rather stupid, Waster felt in a moment that he must do something to exonerate himself. Without stopping, he glanced round so as to catch sight for the first time of a singularly docile and rather pleasant face. "Lovely morning!" he exclaimed, not thinking what he meant to say next.

"Yes, indeed," was the brisk reply.

In Waster's mind curiosity began to get the better of his repugnance. Thinking the man might, after all, be a seaman seeking a berth at the next port, "Going on to Barryhaven?" he asked.

"No," was the reply, "I shall get down to the shore about two miles from here. I come this way every day according to the tide. You see it's nearly low-water now. I'm a beach-searcher."

Waster realised that he had stumbled upon a wayfarer whose company he might find very agreeable for the next half-hour or so. He stopped a moment for the other to catch up to him, and the two men then walked on side by side.

"You say you come along here every day?"

"Yes, summer and winter, to some part of the shore. One day I may be ten miles off from where I was the day before."

"And do you mean to say that you find enough to get a living?"

"Oh! yes, it would be a bad day that I didn't make a shilling, and some days I make seven or eight. Besides, I'm a single man with no one dependent on me, and I've roughed it round the world. I ought to be able to put up with short commons now and again. This is my hardest time. There's not much comes ashore this calm weather, but it's different in the winter after a storm. Then there's wreckage that gets washed up from no one knows where—hundreds of miles off perhaps. Wood and bits of metal fittings, brass and iron and all manner of things, from, it may be, a big liner torpedoed out in the Atlantic."

"And you sort them out and sell them accordingly?"

"Yes, the timber I sell for firewood. Sometimes a dead body comes ashore. I found that man who fell over the cliff about eighteen months ago, and the chap who was drowned when they were making the new groyne. Sometimes I come on a coin or two. Once I found two sovereigns and two pennies all together—raked them out in the shingle. Then there were some ancient Roman copper coins, eighteen hundred years old and more, they tell me. I took them to the museum and they gave me a shilling apiece. They fell down in a lump of earth from the top, I reckon. Then I picked up a wedding-ring. At times, when there's nothing else about, I look for fossils for a scientific gentleman; "shepherds' crowns," and other kinds too. Once I pecked a great thing out of the chalk with my knife like a coiled-up serpent."

"An ammonite," Waster suggested.

"Aye, that was it; but before I could get any one to help me carry it away—for it was too heavy for me alone—a storm came on and I never saw it again. Ah! there's wild times down on the shore, I can tell you; and some days I'm down there seven or eight hours at a stretch and never see a soul."

"Don't you get tired of it?" inquired Waster.

The Searcher turned slightly towards the speaker. "There's no cause to be tired," he replied calmly; "every honest man has to earn his living somehow. My way keeps me going and injures nobody. If it's wet and cold betimes it's what you'd call healthy. I've no mind to change. I go down this gap, so good morning, sir."

"Well, good luck to you!" said Waster continuing his walk; while along the far horizon crept a little grey shadow-steamer trailing behind it a thinner grey curl of smoke; and farther, beyond sight and hearing, the great war went on, sowing at intervals its strange harvest over the bed of the deep.

THE CHURCH OF THE GALILEANS.

To the Editor of The Inquirer.

Sir,—It must be admitted that some distinguishing name is required to describe the form of worship and religious life of a society where, say, the Essex Hall Hymnal is accepted and used. Obviously X. Y. Street Church is, if not misleading, certainly not of value to the inquirer. A notice-board often contains an invitation for inquirers. It is only by entering the building and examining the Hymn Book and other available reading matter that a stranger, perhaps one holding the same theological position, may form the judgment that the society is a Reformed Church of England.

The late Oliver Wendell Holmes, in one of his delightful essays, tells of how a young girl was taken to a place of worship: in fact, two places, one called St. Polycarp, the other the Church of the Galileans. The two churches could be designated by other names which would perhaps alarm the essay reader. I will just quote the genial writer's own description:—

"I, the Professor, am a regular Church-goer. I should go for various reasons, if I did not love it. One place of worship comes nearer than the rest to my ideal standard, and to this it was that I carried the young girl [Iris]. The Church of the Galileans, as it is called, is even humbler in outside pretensions than the Church of St. Polycarp. Like that, it is open to all comers. The stranger who approaches it looks down a quiet street and sees the plainest of chapels that owes whatever grace it has to its pointed windows and the high sharp roof. Within there was very little that pretended to be attractive. A small organ at one side, and a plain pulpit, showed the building was a church; but it was a church reduced to its simplest expression. The lilies of the field in their season, and the fairest flowers of the year in due succession, were clustered every Sunday morning over the preachers' desk. There was always at least one good sermon—this floral homily; there was at least one good prayer—that brief space when all were silent, after the manner of the Friends at their devotions.

"Here, too, Iris found an atmosphere of peace and love, the same gentle, thoughtful faces, the same cheerful but reverential spirit, the same quiet, the same life of active benevolence. But in all else how different from the Church of St. Polycarp! No clerical costumes, no ceremonial forms, no carefully trained choirs. A liturgy they have, to be sure, which does not scruple to borrow from time-honoured manuals of devotion, but also does not hesitate to change its expressions to its own liking.

"Perhaps the good people seem a little easy with each other: they are apt to nod familiarly, and have even been known to whisper before the minister came in. But it is a relief to get rid of that old Sabbath face, which suggests the idea that the first day of the week is commemorative of some most mournful event. The truth is, these brethren and sisters meet very much as a family does for its devotions, not putting off their humanity in the least, considering it on the whole quite a delightful matter to come together for prayer and song and good counsel from kind and wise lips. And if they are freer in their demeanour than some very precise congregations, they have not the air of a worldly set of people. One thing that keeps them calm and happy during the season so trying to many congregations is that they join very generally in the singing. How sweet is this blending of all voices and all hearts in one common song of praise!

"I am of the opinion that the creed of the Church of the Galileans is not laid down in as many details as that of the Church of St. Polycarp! There are always many who believe that the fruits of a tree afford a better test of its condition than a statement of the composts with which it is dressed—though the last has its meaning and importance, no doubt" ('The Professor at the Breakfast Table').

There have been many readers of the essays of Wendell Holmes who could not connect the Church of the Galileans with the 370 places of worship in the United Kingdom, mainly because they are not so called. Is it beyond the wit of man to find a name which will mean just what is so well described by the author I have quoted? There is a name, but for some reason it is not used except in a very few cases. I do not know a better.—Yours, &c., Henry Williamson.

WEEKLY NOTES.

The Director of La Chartreuse, to whom I wrote after the first week's results of the appeal writes: "I am amazed at the tangible result of your appeal which you announce to me. Our poor old people will never be able to bless the Fund enough for all it has done for them, and I await impatiently the next visit of the Minister of the Interior to tell him the good news. I am certain he did not expect to hear so soon. Mère Pauline (the store-room keeper) is in the seventh heaven after hearing of all the good things you are sending. How can we thank you for it all. Fortunately we firmly believe that Providence will somehow reward you from above—otherwise we should feel hopeless of showing you our eternal gratitude."

The "good things" that Mère Pauline is to receive are chiefly bales of babies' clothes. I found the babies in the crèche sadly in need of fresh clothing. The supply was very inadequate, necessitating constant washing of what clothes they possessed, and many of the little ones were almost in rags. I have already received some large gifts of suitable new clothing (the Central Unemployed Body for London has sent a parcel of over 250 garments), but I shall be glad of more. There were about fifty babies in the crèche and many more little toddlers, and clothes up to 2 or 3 years old are greatly needed. But the main need certainly was for beds. So far we have received money enough for about 150 beds. There remain still 50 to be obtained, and I am sure we shall obtain them soon.

Rose Allen.

THE OXFORD SUMMER SCHOOL.

PROBLEMS OF RECONSTRUCTION.

I.

Though Reconstruction is becoming a blessed word to those whose contribution to the present necessities is talk and sometimes corroding talk, it is evident that talk we must have; straight talk to the national conscience, and constructive not merely vivisecting talk. Above all we want the right kind of talkers. These by a sort of miracle of organisation had been got together for the Summer School at Oxford, which, turning away from its usual consideration of aspects of the past, this year faced the future, in the endeavour to shape the ideals of the new world so that it may not find itself after all "powerless to be born." If one dared to venture a comment rather than a criticism, and without undervaluing the useful words of the lady speakers (notably Mrs. Oliver, who invested an unpromising subject with a good deal of charm) one might regret that one or two women of outstanding ability were not called to assist in a task which, if they can achieve at all, they can achieve well; the presentation of a Renaissance. On one preliminary all were agreed, without which all talk of Reconstruction were a mockery. The first duty, as Lord Haldane put it, is resolution—resolution in a common cause. "We must be prepared to spend the whole of our resources, if necessary, to learn to live on sixpence a day, rather than be defeated in a struggle that is for nothing less than life and freedom." "The only end of the war," said Dr. Jacks, "which will give a chance to ethical Reconstruction is a democratic victory. This struggle is between autocracy and democracy. If the former wins my ideas of ethical reform will be impossible to carry out." This conviction was explicit in most and implicit in all the lectures. It ought to be of interest to people who seem concerned in a suicidal attempt to undermine the national spirit — soi-disant pacificists, friends of Germany, scolding mentors who mistake their pigeon-holes for the real world—that in this large assembly, representative because drawn from all parts of the country, no irrelevancies were either achieved or attempted. There was no touch of the war weariness which we are persistently told we are languishing under, on the principle that if a generalisation is repeated often enough it may be taken as true. This audience showed the cool temper which desires neither to express hatred of Germany nor to flirt with her, to adapt Mr. Wells's phrase; and it gave no sign of mistaking passions for principles.

When Lord Selborne's fine peroration brought it to its feet for the National Anthem, it sang with a solemnity which had nothing of the "Hurrah and Hallelujah" about it. To a friend or agent of Germany watching (and such there may have been) its temper must have seemed discouraging in the extreme. The objection may be made that it consisted largely of women. One thing is certain: when the thoughtful womanhood of a free nation is on the side of war, despite all its agony and sacrifice, that war is just and that nation is unconquerable.

All this being granted, the god of things as they are, found himself quite discredited. In things social, industrial, educational, imperial, and theological the status quo ante bellum is not thinkable any more. The Reconstruction preached or prophesied was not of the materialist but of the spiritual kind; it was not an economic process hiding under high-sounding names, a question of increased production calling itself social reform. Here and there wealth in the economic rather than the human and divine sense seemed to be thought of as an end in itself, but this point of view roused no enthusiasm. It was appropriate, therefore, that the base of Reconstruction should be regarded as in the sphere of religion; and most of the speakers on these subjects admitted almost as axioms: (1) that organised religion had lost hold of the masses of the people; but (2) that religion is a permanent factor in the depths of individual being and must re-state itself in such a manner as to express honestly the religious consciousness of the new world. Official Christianity must somehow become personal and social. Dr. Jacks, lecturing on 'Ethical Reconstruction,' did not however think this was to be brought about by inventing a new system of ethics. Ethics had been much taught and badly learnt, and there was little hope of progress beyond the present point until the general temper had undergone a change. The basic virtue was a climatic virtue, best rendered by the homely phrase, good temper. It was not human nature itself that needed reconstructing, for that was at bottom spiritual; it needed educating. Dr. Jacks's lectures provoked much discussion, and the words just quoted prompted the leader of a theological "class" (in which the factors of change were less clearly grasped than elsewhere) surprisingly to remark that Dr. Jacks did not take into account original sin. This drew from a young industrial student, who said he was seeking "a higher background to life," the query, "Why doesn't the Church give lectures like Dr. Jacks's? I am frozen up by this continual going back to authority."

Dr. Scott Holland, lecturing on 'The Argument for God,' made a masterly summary of the reasons why the idea of God the Father seems to have slipped out of our mental equipment. "The war has re-erected the crucifix," he said. "Christ may be brought nearer. But where, it is asked, is 'the good God'?" The mechanical theory, which had from all these causes swept over a whole generation, begins to be repudiated by philosophy and literature but has now reached the popular mind. This respects Christ, but views him as held up in a vacuum unrelated to the idea of God. The lecturer saw the new argument for God inside man's own religious experience, which takes its place in history as universal, permanent and developing. Metaphysics only justifies belief in being itself; it is its own sole authority. He quoted Dr. Bradley's words "Ideas which express the highest religious needs and their satisfaction must certainly be true"; and religious experience in the individual and in history has by its phenomena made evident a reality that responds.

Dr. Selbie on 'Theological Reconstruction' was probably more easily grasped than Dr. Holland's packed and rapid utterance. He affirmed that the fundamental facts of God, Christ, Sin and Forgiveness represented ultimate realities and did not change, but he admitted that theological forms could not remain divorced from the world of secular thought. He pleaded for rather than demanded their reconstruction. He asked for patience with the critics, though there would no longer, as before the war, be a readiness to accept the latest German hypothesis. In fresh and current terms he treated in successive lectures of the person of Christ, his character and ideal life manifesting his God-consciousness, his view of human nature, and his relation to humanity. Every one might not be prepared to accept some of Dr. Selbie's conclusions, but he certainly proved helpful and illuminating to his hearers. The Vice-Chancellor lectured on 'Public Worship' from the religious and not the denominational point of view. He examined the reasons for the general drifting from church or chapel and concluded that the sense of truth in religion was largely lost. Why should people want to worship something of which they knew nothing? A general attitude towards religion must be recovered or reconstructed, chiefly by a real and reasonable type of religious teaching in the schools. Dr. Strong held that people differed about inferences rather than principles, but did not point out how an agreement on principles, necessary in the end, was to be procured. He has been for several years connected with the Revision of the Prayer Book in the Lower House of Convocation (Canterbury), and is Chairman of the Committee engaged in drafting the Report. A sort of class that he subsequently held for inquirers interested in the question proved not only enlightening but entertaining. The Vice-Chancellor probably needs all the support his delicate and rather ironic vein of humour can afford; for not only are the processes of Convocation incredibly slow, but the kind of question round which the hottest controversy seems to rage is amazing to the (sometimes irreverent) lay mind. The Rev. E. A. Burroughs completed this course by a lecture on 'Evangelisation'; and though he said the title suggested stuffy drawing-room meetings and collecting cards he managed to drive home a moral in the most inspiring and convincing way. It is certain that the problem of the churches would be nearer solution if there were more "parsons" of his kind. It is largely a question of personality. The writer soon after heard a comment on the situation from a young captain in khaki who entered the railway carriage and mysteriously and unrelatedly ejaculated, "I'm fed up with parsons. Oh Lord!" and left it there. The sentiment does not seem altogether uncommon.

All the speakers were agreed that the root problem in our national life is Education. They were agreed, too, on the end of education: not a means to wealth or material efficiency or even technical skill, but worthy human personality. Mr. S. P. Mais (writer of that arresting book 'Shakespeare to O. Henry') criticised the public school system on its divorce from English literature and art, its wasteful compulsory Latin and Greek, its under payment of masters, its over-exaltation of games, its wrong ideals, and its out-of-date social exclusiveness. The Headmaster of Marlborough in a fine address dwelt on the supreme value of the nation's youth, and the national duty of providing education for all up to the age of 18. Lord Haldane declared that education was the most important element in reconstruction. He wanted to break down the still existing gulf between elementary and post-elementary education, and unify them in one organic whole. He made a practical point of devolution of government; local self-government would have to be an accepted principle. Sir James Yoxall quoted the Headmaster of Marlborough on the supreme importance of the personality of the teacher, and elaborated this. Just as we in our slow national way had made up our national mind on the immense importance of education, we had to face a national shortage of teachers. Men teachers were dying by hundreds; women teachers were seeking more remunerative employment. Something must be done by far better pay, by social recognition of the greatness of their work, to get the best men and women to teach the nation's children. Dr. Stephen Paget spoke very plain words in a lecture on 'Adolescence,' which is to be published in pamphlet form.

A word of gratitude must be given for the breeziness, humorousness, and affectionate sunshininess of Lieut.-General Baden Powell's lecture on 'Boy Scouts and Girl Guides.' It left a sensation of happiness behind it; here at least was something done, not only talked or dreamed of, on the lines of character, handicraft, service for others, and physical health, in the atmosphere of adventurousness so dear to the boy. It was not a militaristic system—he denied that—though it was disciplinary, and as far as possible self-disciplinary; but the ideal was not the soldier but the scout. A sense of wholesomeness, eager boyishness expanding into manliness, hopefulness in the morning of life, diffused itself over the very large gathering, which went home rejuvenated and smiling over delicious stories of scouts, and very sorry that that lecture was over. "Forgive my talking so much—you're such a delightful audience," said General Baden-Powell. Audiences are delightful when they are delighted. It is quite easy and might become a habit.

A very sympathetic address was given by Mr. Cecil Chapman, the well-known magistrate in a Children's Court in London, on 'Juvenile Delinquency.' The children are fortunate in having a man who obviously loves them, understands them, knows all their conditions, and is jealous exceedingly for them, to deal with the offences which less instructed persons regard in a portentously solemn way. Mr. Chapman considered that many, in fact most, of these juvenile offences were sins of society for which the children were vicariously punished. "People do not realise," he said, "that juvenile delinquencies are due to physical or psychical deficiencies which should be looked after by doctors and nurses rather than by policemen. When you have caught your criminal, it is your duty to find some means by which reformation may take place before you put the child into the criminal class." The lecturer declared that if Christianity were a life-giving creed instead of a "smug and priggish thing" thieving and such anti-social acts would be controlled more efficiently by public opinion than by law; but evidently he had little hope of a nation in which money-making held the most important place. Dr. Crowley's lectures on 'Child Welfare and Special Schools' indicated the same grasp of the importance of the problem of the child. He was encouraging as showing that here at least some beginning had been made to cope with it, though a vast field remained unworked. "In this matter of child health and welfare," said Dr. Crowley, "we must succeed, or else fail in all."

In a second paper I hope to give some account of the lectures which dealt with Reconstruction from the point of view of Industry and Imperial Politics.

IN 1862: A FATHER TO HIS SON.

The following passages from a letter by Judge E. Rockwood Hoar to Samuel Hoar, who had just started for the war, appeared in a recent number of The Christian Register. Its lofty appeal will awaken a warm response in many hearts in our own country:—

Concord, Mass.,
December 15, 1862.

My Dear Boy,—I did not have the opportunity I had hoped to talk with you last evening—and therefore take this opportunity, when we are sending you your mittens and the envelopes which you forgot, to give you a few last words of affectionate counsel from home.

One of your first duties as a soldier will be to take all the care you can of your health. The firmer that is, the better you will be able to do any service, or undergo any fatigue, required of you. To preserve your health, you must try to lead as regular and temperate a life as is possible. I hope you will not try to avoid your full share of labor, danger, or exposure, where either is necessary or called for....Take every proper occasion for bathing your whole body—and scrupulously regard your personal cleanliness, no matter how much trouble it may give you....Have nothing to do with spirituous liquors of any kind. Take your food as regularly as you can get it, and neither eat immoderately, nor go a long time without food, if you can avoid it. Especially be careful not to eat to excess after long fasting.....

I hope you will never disgrace yourself by any profaneness or obscenity; and will avoid all conversation and companions where they are practised or allowed.

Try to preserve a cheerful and contented spirit, and encourage it in others. Bear hardships without grumbling, and always try to do more, rather than less, than your duty. You will have occasion to be patient much oftener than to be brave.

The duty of a soldier is unquestioning obedience—but beyond this, I hope you will cultivate a kind, respectful, and considerate temper toward your officers.

I hope you are going with a love for your country and your cause, and with a determination to be faithful to every duty you have undertaken. My boy, you bear the name of one who, to the end of his honored life, never shrunk from a duty, however painful, nor from a danger to which duty called him. Be sure that you do no discredit to it! Neither by cowardice, by falsehood, by impurity, by levity, nor by selfishness. Remember always your home and your friends—those who will welcome your return with pride and joy if you shall come back in virtue and honor; who will cherish your memory if, faithful and true, you have given up your life; but to whom your disgrace would cause a pang sharper than death. Remember your obligations to duty and to God. And may these thoughts keep you from temptation, and encourage and strengthen you in danger or sickness.

And now, my dear boy, I commend you to God—and to the power of his grace. May God bless and keep you. Think of your Heavenly Father in health and in sickness, in joy and in sorrow. Go to him for strength and guidance. You are very dear to our hearts—and your absence leaves a great place vacant in our home. If it be according to his will, may you come back to us in safety and honor—but whatever is before us, may his mercy and love be ever with you, and his grace be sufficient for you. With deep affection,

Your father,
E. R. Hoar.

Samuel Hoar,
Corporal 48th Regt. Mass. Volunteers.

It will interest many of our readers to learn that one of the religious lyrics in Dr. Drummond's 'Johannine Thoughts' has been set to music. The words are based upon the text "He withdrew again into the mountain himself alone."

O silent, lonely tarn,
Asleep within the mountain's breast,

Thou seemest, from the world so far withdrawn,
To dream of rest.
So, deep within my heart,
There is a silent, lonely cell,
Where I may rest, and worship God, and feel
That all is well.

The music is by Miss Katharine Barry and is included in an 'Album of Eight Artistic Songs' just issued by Messrs. Metzler & Co., Ltd. (price 4*s*. net).

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Chowbent.—The local Journal records that specially appreciative and sympathetic reference to Second Lieut. Volney Mather was made by his minister, the Rev. J. J. Wright, on Sunday morning at Chowbent Chapel. Twelve young men from Chowbent Chapel and schools have now given their lives, out of some 120 who have joined the Colours.

London: Bermondsey.—We regret to hear that Mr. S. P. Penwarden who has been in charge of the services at Fort Road for a considerable period, has had to relinquish the work for a time owing to ill-health. The congregation owes a great deal to Mr. Penwarden's help and the generosity with which he has given his Sunday leisure to their service. During this time his business duties have been exceptionally heavy and he has also taken a large share in the work of the Motor Transport Corps which has been organised in the interest of men in the Forces who arrive in London late at night.

London: Essex Hall.—The American Room at Essex Hall has just received two interesting and most appropriate gifts from Mrs. Walter Baily of Hampstead. The first is a French engraving of the Declaration of American Independence, with a key to the portraits and facsimiles of the signatures. The other is a portrait in mezzotint of Benjamin Franklin. On the frame is the inscription "Presented to his friend Theophilus Lindsey by B. F." There is a tradition that Benjamin Franklin attended the first service conducted by Theophilus Lindsey in Essex Street Chapel. The present portrait was probably left by Lindsey to the Rev. Thos. Belsham, and then passed into the hands of Mrs. Baily's grandfather, Mr. Thomas Gibson, who was Mr. Belsham's executor.

The Rev. W. Copeland Bowie left London on Friday for the North of England and Scotland. He will be away for about four weeks. It will be a great convenience if correspondents will refrain from sending letters to him at Essex Hall during his absence except in cases of real urgency.

We have received from the Lindsey Press 'A Free and Open Christian Church,' being an address given by Dr. C. W. Eliot to a meeting of Unitarians held in Boston last February; also 'O ye of Little Faith,' by Dr. W. C. Gannett, author of 'Blessed be Drudgery.' With characteristic optimism Dr. Gannett lays before his readers the lessons of courage and hope which emerge from the war. "Which have the right of the facts?" he asks. "They who lose heart and moan and read the future in terms of 'set-back' and 'dying,' or those who see the New Heavens already emerging from Hell? We look back to our Civil War as the era of our nation's new birth. We are living in a greater era to-day: a World is in rebirth." Both pamphlets may be had at Essex Hall, price 1*d*. each.

The Rationalist Press Association, of which Sir Herbert S. Leon, Bart., is Chairman, and which includes among its Honorary Associates Professor J. B. Bury, Sir E. Ray Lankester, Mr. Eden Phillpotts, Mr. Arnold Bennett, and Mr. William Archer, has just passed the following resolution: "That this Association, while welcoming Mr. H. A. L. Fisher's educational proposals, expresses, in the interest of the national welfare, its grave concern at the omission of any attempt to deal with the 'religious difficulty,' and urges that the only just solution is to confine instruction in all State-supported schools to subjects now officially described as secular in the English educational code."

DEATHS.

Brooks.—On August 14, 1917, at Westwood, Ellesmere Park, Eccles. Jeremy, the dearly loved husband of Alice Leigh Brooks, in his 71st year.

Peck.—On the 11th inst., at Rhos-on-Sea, Elizabeth Watson (Lily), youngest daughter of the late George Peck of Manchester and Brooklands.

OUT OF THE HEART OF THE STORM.

Twelve Sermons preached at Rosslyn Hill Chapel, Hampstead, and Manchester College, Oxford.

BY

Rev. HENRY GOW, B.A.

The sermons are written by one who believes with President Wilson that "right is more precious than peace," and that no personal sorrow or loss should discourage us and turn us from our firm resolve to overthrow the Prussian autocracy. They are written too in the growing confidence that faith in God and in the supremacy of Love has become more and not less possible and real through the conflict and agony of recent times.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

The address for our Belgian Hospital Fund, to which cheques and parcels of clothing should be sent, is Mrs. Bernard Allen, 14 Gainsborough Gardens, Hampstead, N.W.3.

IN an article on 'The Voice of the Vatican' last week The New Europe published some very forcible criticism of the Pope's proposals for peace. The writer, who is moved chiefly by moral considerations and leaves the definitely political issues in the background, speaks of Benedict XV. as "outraging the conscience of the vast majority of Christians." "Only those," he says, "who have breathed during the war the benumbing atmosphere of 'spiritual neutrality' that prevails at the Vatican and in other neutral courts can understand how the Sovereign Pontiff, the supreme guardian of the faith and morals of his world-wide flock, could so far forget the moral issues of the war as to identify himself with the view that 'the terrible struggle....appears increasingly a useless massacre,' or could deliberately weigh in the same scales the wrong-doer and the victim, the oppressor and the oppressed, the faithless and the faithful, demonstrating his 'perfect impartiality towards all the belligerents' by holding the balance meticulously even between right and wrong."

THESE are strong words, and they will certainly cause offence in some quarters, but they cannot be dismissed by apologies for the Pope's incapacity to do more, or polite references to his sentimental love of peace. It is the deliberate conviction of this writer that at this great turning point in human history the Roman Catholic Church has had the noblest opportunity of recovering its moral leadership, which has occurred since Christianity was riven by Reformation and Counter-Reformation, and it has cast it away.

On the one side [he writes] were ranged the champions of human right and liberty, and on the other the lawless henchmen of individual dynastic despotism. The Roman Church, whose tragedy it was to have sold its soul to potentates in return for their help in extirpating heresy during the Counter-Reformation, had at last a chance to regain its birthright and to prove itself a true mother of peoples and a foe of tyrants. An Apostolic Pope, a Churchman of faith and vision, might have seized the chance of flinging open the door into an ampler life with fuller scope for the fulfilment of an evangelical mission. Faced by the question whether the Roman Church should lead the peoples or seek to prop the tottering despots of the earth, such a Pontiff would have made the larger choice. Benedict XV., guided by men whose spirit is still that of the Counter-Reformation, has made the lesser choice.

IT is significant that the first definite refusal of the Papal terms has come from America. The refusal is based upon the very simple and blunt reason, which is not always remembered in our discussions, that there is at the present time no one in Germany with whom we can negotiate. President Wilson takes his stand upon the impossibility of our trusting the word of the present rulers of Germany unless it is supported by the will of the German people themselves. The New York Times sums up the situation in a picturesque and telling phrase: "When the German Government went morally bankrupt it left a vacancy on the other side of the Peace Conference table....The German people can fill that vacant place if they will, but until they give us a negotiator whose word is as good as ours we cannot exchange pledges over that table."

* * *

IT must not be forgotten amid our rather tangled arguments about terms of peace that quite recently Mr. Asquith made a contribution of great practical importance when he put the question point blank to Germany, "Will you evacuate Belgium and restore her to complete independence and pay her compensation for all the injury you have done?" Though no reply has been received, and without it there can be no advance towards mutual agreement, the question has reached Germany, as it was intended to do, and is evidently causing grave searchings of heart among reasonable people like Prof. Hans Delbrück. In his view Mr. Asquith's question gave the Chancellor an opportunity of dissociating himself from the party whose aim is a prolongation of the war, and his failure to do so is a cause of grave misgiving. The evidence available at present is far too conflicting for us to decide whether Prof. Delbrück's opinion is representative of any important section in Germany, but we welcome it as a sign that the moral challenge about Belgium has gone home and by some people is quite clearly understood.

IT is with surprise that we notice that even The Westminster Gazette has fallen a victim to the rhetorical trick of confusing Socialists and the Labour Party with the democracy. A democrat is one who believes in government by the people as a whole through the medium of representative institutions. Any form of class consciousness which says "We are the people and the others do not count" is really anti-democratic. We fear sometimes that the habit of political separatism may develop into a grave danger to the best interests of Labour itself. We do not want terms of peace put forward as the expression of the mind of the wage-earners, any more than we desire that professional men or manufacturers should act in the same way. It is a sense of common citizenship and loyalty to common interests which must guide our actions and can alone save us from the bitterness of civil strife. The claims of the community are greater than the claims of any of the classes or parties of which it is composed, and it is the community as a whole which alone has the right to speak in the name of the democracy.

A RASH remark about Puritanism by Dr. E. Lyttelton in a recent address at the Hampstead Garden Suburb, on the ground that "in its absurd attempt to repress human nature, [it] had attempted to destroy those indestructable things—music, cricket, and humour," has called forth an interesting reply from the Editor of The Music Student, Mr. Percy A. Scholes. "The days immediately following the Puritan Reformation," he writes in a letter to The Times, "were those in which England led the world in music, being famous for her composers of madrigals, Church music, and (especially) keyboard music. And at the period when the severest Puritanism was triumphant the names of Cromwell, Milton, and Bunyan (all keen music-lovers) are sufficient to show that there is no necessary connection between Puritanism and a dislike of music. A vast amount of music was published during the Commonwealth and Protectorate, as an examination of the British Museum catalogue would show, and there was daily opera in London during the later years of Cromwell's power. The Puritans objected to music in church, but for music as such they had no distaste." To this interesting statement the Bishop of Durham adds the following comment upon humour. "Another of the current charges, made often with a light heart, as if the word Puritan were a lawful target on all sides, is that the Puritan disliked humour. It is surely to the point to notice that in 'Pilgrim's Progress,' if anywhere, Puritanism lives and speaks, and to wonderful purpose; and that book, in both its parts, is rich in the element of humour, including numberless strokes of the subtlest power."

So much has been written in some quarters, often doubtless under the goad of prejudice, about the use of military discipline to destroy intelligence and crush individuality, that we welcome the following extract from 'Infantry Training, 1914,' which is quoted by an old N.C.O. in The Manchester Guardian.

> The objects in view in developing a soldierly spirit are to help the soldier to bear fatigue, privation, and danger cheerfully; to imbue him with a sense of honour; to give him confidence in his superiors and comrades; to increase his powers of initiative, of self-confidence, and of self-restraint; to train him to obey orders, or to act in the absence of orders for the advantage of his regiment under all conditions; to produce such a high degree of courage and disregard of self that in the stress of battle he will use his brains and his weapons coolly and to the best advantage.

WE learn with deep regret of the death in action of Lieut. Bernard H. Leigh, only son of Mr. G. H. Leigh. Mr. Leigh was President of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, 1913-14, and has a wide circle of friends among our readers, who will be anxious to express their deepest sympathy with him in his irreparable loss.

A QUESTION OF ATMOSPHERE.

No sensible man will deny that it is very important that our discussions, social, political and religious, should be carried on in an atmosphere of fairness and good temper. Our differences in opinion and policy do not lose the sharpness of their edge, but they are robbed of much of their corroding bitterness when we are careful to treat one another with courtesy and understanding. It is the cloudy atmosphere of suspicion and innuendo which gives a touch of sordidness to many of our disputes even upon high themes, and makes them so heart-breaking when they raise barriers between friends. The clear-cut oppositions of thought and high-minded differences of judgment are quite endurable in themselves and keep human intercourse moving on a high level of interest, when all the lower passions of ill will and intolerant dislike are held in check. The source of the odium theologicum is not a sincere devotion to the truth of God, but an obstinate conviction that no one can be quite so devoted or high-minded in its service as ourselves.

Slowly some perception of this truth seems to be gaining ground even in our discussions about religion. We have made the pleasant discovery that we need not treat our opponents with violence or ridicule in order to proclaim our loyalty to the truth or our soundness in the faith. There are, no doubt, many dogmatists of the old-fashioned breed who regard every approach to friendliness and a better understanding with an opponent as a sign of weakness, and in those quarters old-fashioned methods of controversy, with their desire to discredit where they cannot convince, still survive. But for a growing number of us the victories where we merely silence an opponent without touching either his intelligence or his heart have lost their attraction. We can no longer use the weapons of concealment or base suggestion or bitter ridicule with an easy conscience. We want to see our opponent's case in its strength as well as its weakness. We feel that it is our business to create an atmosphere in which some measure of reasonable persuasion will be possible.

We expect that there will be a large measure of agreement with this position in cases where the claims of abstract truth are concerned. Questions of religious doctrine, the nicer points of casuistry, and the threadbare themes, which phœnix-like renew their youth in every debating society, fall into this category. But the matter is not so simple when we are dealing with questions of urgent practical importance, in which momentous courses of action are often hindered or confused by differences of thought and judgment. Here the sense of the overwhelming importance of the things which we feel it our duty to do makes it impossible for us to adopt the methods of leisurely discussion. We are dealing with an actual situation which must be handled in a particular way at the present moment. We believe with intense conviction that our policy is the only one compatible with the highest interests of the human race and that our opponents are heading for disaster. We are aroused by a sense of impending danger. We are kindled by high hopes and noble resolutions. Our moral and intellectual life moves on a level which exhausts us by the intensity of its excitements. Strong passions claim us for their own, and living under their sway we find it a task almost too hard for us to distinguish between the ardour of noble strength and the vehemence of weak self-assertion, or to prune the swelling words, which are the fruit sometimes of sublime dedication to our cause, and sometimes of prejudice, unkindness and disordered nerves.

And yet it is just at these most critical moments in private life and public policy that we need to attend to the importance of atmosphere. Our object is still to persuade and to promote union for action, and we defeat our own ends when we arouse prejudice or resentment, which are due not to the inevitable antagonisms of practical judgment, but to the narrow or unfair temper with which we support our cause. Probably, many pacifist writers since the beginning of the war are unconscious of the injury which they have done to their own position in this way. It is not only militarist prejudice and an unwillingness to listen to the other side which makes many readers describe their books as unpleasant. We are aware of the immense difficulty of their position. The temptation to make up for weakness in numbers and influence by strength of statement, or to pose as the elect in virtue and wisdom in the midst of an ungodly generation, must be almost irresistible. Those of us who have been exposed to the bracing discipline and the peculiar moral dangers of living in a minority will be anxious to treat these things with understanding and gentleness. But we cannot repress entirely our regret that even such a gifted combatant for peace as Mr. Lowes Dickinson has lost a little of the spirit of fairness and urbanity with which all noble ideals should be served. His last book 'The Choice before Us'* is full of acute reasoning and careful analysis. It is a book to be read with care. Those who disagree with some of its conclusions, or feel that they are weakened by an element of special pleading, will still acknowledge themselves to be greatly in his debt for the clearness and force with which he states the conditions of a stable peace. But at the end we are left with the impression that many pages of the book will irritate where they ought to persuade, and consequently its influence will be lost just in the quarters where the author, as a wise teacher, should be anxious to win attention and if possible to produce agreement.

In two matters in particular Mr. Dickinson has shown himself gravely deficient in sympathetic understanding of the better mind of his countrymen. No doubt a few pages might have lost their pungency if he had acknowledged the fine Christian virtue of many men who have felt compelled to put all their strength into this struggle for freedom, and in doing so have retained both their nobility of character and the spiritual quality of their religion. His reference to the clergy in an early part of his book, with its suggestion that they are insincere time-servers who have shown themselves willing to prostitute Christianity to military ends, is as stupid as it is untrue; and naturally its only effect will be to close many ears to his appeal. Similarly most of his references to his own country and its virtues may be described as lacking in enthusiasm if not in affection. Mr. Dickinson's patriotism is of a kind which makes him very sensitive to defects. Probably he is far from thinking that there is little to choose between Germany and ourselves in our devotion to liberty and our political ideals, but in more than one place his language is so critical and cold as to lend itself easily to misunderstanding of that kind. If he had allowed himself to escape in a few glowing passages from the cramping discontent of the minority mind, and shown himself capable of heartfelt union with his fellow-citizens in the affections and loyalties which sway the hearts of men, he would have won a patient hearing and some measure of assent from many readers, who now will only turn away in dislike because they lack the skill to separate what is wise or helpful in his teaching from these crudities of manner and this needless antagonism of feeling. Mr. Dickinson and other writers of his school would do well to pay more attention to the value of atmosphere.

We do not wish, however, to leave this subject on a note of complaint, which may suggest that we are conscious chiefly of the mote in our brother's eye. All men who contend for lofty ideals and devote themselves to the performance of hard duties, must be careful to adorn their service with noble manners and to avoid the snares of ill temper and personal abuse. This is a warning which none need to lay to heart so carefully as those who are deeply convinced that this cause, in which we fight, has upon it the sanction of duty and religion. These are days when excitement has given place to monotony, and the weariness of a long struggle may betray even the bravest into listless discontent. It is in such moods that we grow irritable with one another, and become impatient of all difference of opinion, and are in no little danger of losing the invincible strength and the generous temper of a complete and unstained loyalty of soul. Seldom has there been a time when the need was so great as now to keep our hearts with all diligence, and to set a watch upon our lips that even the words which we speak may have upon them the seal of consecration. There must be no pettiness of mind, no mean and desolating passion, no degrading atmosphere of prejudice or contempt in our service of a cause, which will remain, after the last critic has spoken his last word, the biggest crusade on behalf of public righteousness which has ever claimed the complete loyalty of God-fearing men.

SEVEN DAYS' LEAVE.

[From a Correspondent.]

THE Lyceum has a type of drama of its own. To the fastidious that type may seem crude to a degree; but the Lyceum has also an audience of its own, and that is where the secret lies. The manager knows his audience through and through: the audience might also know its drama equally thoroughly if it stopped for a moment to think. It is melodrama, pure and simple—melodrama with no expense spared. In the days of 'Deadwood Dick,' the satisfying drama of this kind was 'The blood-stained Putty Knife, or the Murder in the Red Barn.' To-day we are spared murders and suicides: instead we have German submarines and spies and heroes in khaki. But it is the same thing in a modern dress—the villainess still has raven locks, the heroine is an aristocrat, and virtue always triumphs in the end.

Do not run away with the idea that there is no plot. There is enough plot to stock a three-volume novel. It was three crowded hours of most glorious life, just that kind of life that appeals to us because we are never likely to meet it at close quarters, and so need never fear rubbing the gilt off the gingerbread. You only need to know the characters to imagine the plot. Bring them together in a village on the East Coast and nature, Lyceum nature, does the rest. Lady Mary Heather, whose surname suggests that she is a "sport," and can ride, jump, shoot, swim, and so on with the best; Capt. Fielding, R.H.A., who has escaped from a prison-camp in Germany; the rejected lover; Col. Sharrow of the Intelligence Department who shouts out the most secret information quite forgetful of the presence of the spies he is tracking; two "Belgian refugees" who are naturally the spies in question, and in love with each other; the old Vicar who is there to make everything smooth for the hero in the last five minutes. There are, of course, subsidiary characters—Pte. Lord Arthur Pendennis; 2nd Lieut. Cornelius Keys, son of the vicarage cook; the Vicar's daughter, and so on. A regular Noah's ark of people who could not meet together in life without something startling happening.

What did happen really does not matter: it was the other side of the footlights. Gripping as it was—and a Lyceum play is warranted to make you forget outside cares—the audience was equally interesting. The manager knows what the public wants and sees that they get it. Thrills, farce, pathos, emotion, devilry, goodness, triumph, resignation—they are all there in full measure, pressed down. And the audience fairly jumped at it each time. There were hisses for the black-haired villainess, spontaneous cheers for the heroisms of the hero, laughs at the humour, and—most surprising—a profound silence for the words of the Vicar, who really was one of the most lovable stage parsons we have ever met. He, at least, was not a typical stage character. Nor were his "lines" the usual stage twaddle—it was genuine stuff that went straight to the heart of the audience. There was no superciliousness about the way it rose to the old Vicar.

As we have said, much of it was very crude and primitive, but 'Seven Days' Leave' has been playing to full houses nine times a week for months and it looks like going on for as many months more. There had been an air-raid warning a few hours before the performance we attended, but there was scarcely a vacant seat in the whole theatre. Certainly there was no sign of nerves. But what impressed us most of all, perhaps, was the way the people applauded and hissed. We have always considered the catch word "Trust the People" as a phrase to be used with the tongue in the cheek. But we need no more convincing now that the people are all right at heart. They are sound enough, whether they go to church on Sunday or not.

And another thought also came to mind as we sat there comparing that full house with our own empty pews. The manager knows what the people want. Do we? Are we not just a little bit too respectable at times for some of our parishes and talk above the people's heads? We wonder. At least a course of 'Modern Drama' might be included with advantage as practical investigation in connection with lectures on Psychology at our Theological Colleges.

MEMORIAL NOTICES.

MR. R. T. HEAPE.

We regret to record the death of Mr. Robert Taylor Heape, formerly of Healey Hall, Rochdale, which occurred on Wednesday, August 15, at a private nursing home at Harrogate after an operation. Mr. Heape, who was in his 70th year, belonged to a family which has a unique record in the local government of Rochdale, having been continuously represented on the chief town authority from the establishment of the Commissioners' Board in 1825 to the present time. Before they settled at Hartley the family were active in the public affairs of Saddleworth, which was within the ancient parish of Rochdale. Robert Heape, who came to Hartley in 1726, was a Churchwarden at Rochdale in 1731 and 1732, and overseer for Castleton in 1751. His great-grandson, Benjamin Heape, was one of the leading Commissioners, and as High Constable in 1837 had the honour of proclaiming Queen Victoria's accession to the throne. He and his brothers were active in local affairs, but of all the members of the house the best known and most widely popular was Alderman Robert Taylor Heape, J.P., D.L., the father of Mr. R. T. Heape. He was an influential Commissioner, became Mayor in 1857, the year after the incorporation of the town, and again in 1876, was a trusted leader of Liberalism, and a man in whom the townspeople had unbounded confidence.

Mr. R. T. Heape was educated at a private school and at University College School, London. He became identified later on with the flannel trade, with which his family were continuously associated for well over two centuries. His business gifts, together with his unquestioned probity, won for him a wide and honourable reputation in the trade. In 1906 he retired from business, and was free to indulge the taste for travel which had led him far afield in earlier years. He had visited most of the countries of Europe, some of them many times, and he had also been to Egypt, Africa, the United States of America and Canada, the West Indies, Australia, and Japan; and in 1896 he went to the North Cape with the British Astronomical Society, of which he was a member, to view an eclipse of the sun. In later years he spent a considerable portion of each year in the English Lake District, mostly at Bowness, and in October, 1916, he gave to the Windermere District Council a shelter for the use of the public in recognition of his happy associations with the district. A keen lover of outdoor sports he was a good athlete, and won many prizes in his young days. Gymnastics and leaping were his strong points, and he was also a successful swimmer among amateurs. In 1915 he was vice-president of the Rochdale Swimming Club, and for long before that he had done much to encourage proficiency in swimming and in life-saving. Shooting and hunting were also sports which he keenly enjoyed. He was a great walker, and, up to the time of his illness a few weeks ago, did his brisk tramp of 25 miles a day.

Unlike his father, Mr. Heape never took any active part in public life. But he has nevertheless left a remarkable and lasting impression on his native town. He combined with a keen business instinct a strong artistic sense. Fond of literature, he was a great reader, and all forms of art appealed to him intensely. His intellectual tastes were attested by his membership of various literary, scientific, and antiquarian societies. It was to him and to the late Mr. James Ogden that the town of Rochdale is mainly indebted for its splendid Art Gallery, second to none for a town of Rochdale's size. From the year 1901, when he made his first gift of pictures, he gave numerous oil-paintings and statuary to the gallery, which finally necessitated an extension of the building, and the Council recorded its appreciation in two illuminated resolutions of thanks, dated September, 1908, and February, 1911. It was not only the Art Gallery that benefited by his warm-heartedness. The Rochdale Unitarian Church, of which he was a member all his life, and for many years a trustee, owes much to him, for he spent considerable sums on its embellishment, and he was a substantial donor to other churches of the denomination. In politics Mr. Heape was a Liberal of the old school. The Temperance cause also found him a warm and consistent supporter. The funeral was announced to take place at the Manchester Crematorium on Saturday.

MR. THOMAS RIDGWAY.

We regret to announce the sudden death on Saturday, the 18th inst., at the age of 54, of Mr. Thomas Ridgway of St. Austin's Friars, Shrewsbury, manager to Messrs. James Cock & Sons, tanners. Mr. Ridgway was, for upwards of thirty years, a most faithful and devoted member of the High Street Church, and a regular and diligent worker in the Sunday school. For many years past he filled the offices of Trustee, Treasurer, and Warden. His work as Treasurer to the congregation will long be remembered with gratitude and pleasure; it was an office for which he was eminently fitted, and he filled it to the great satisfaction of all; indeed, all his work in the church and Sunday school will remain as a precious memory of him. He was rarely absent from his post on Sundays; he was always punctual, and his cheery greeting will be sorely missed, alike by those attending the services regularly, and by visitors, to whom he was always ready to accord a hearty and gracious welcome. Of magnificent physique, he was also of childlike freshness and simplicity; and though he had the heart of a child he was also a shrewd, capable business man, possessed of a well-balanced mind and a large share of common sense, qualities which, coupled with his steadfastness of purpose and high ideals of duty, made him one of the most valued of colleagues. Always ready to assist in every good cause and to take his full share of work and responsibility, he not only set a high example of fidelity to duty, and to conviction by his consistency and uprightness of character, but he endeared himself to all with whom he came into contact by his transparent simplicity and his kindly and generous disposition.

Following the service at High Street Church on Sunday evening the 19th inst., the Chairman of the Congregation (Mr. W. Vickary, J.P.) proposed that a letter of condolence should be sent to Mr. Ridgway's widow and family, and this was accordingly done. The funeral took place at the General Cemetery, Shrewsbury, on Wednesday the 22nd inst., and was largely attended. The Rev. A. E. O'Connor, B.D., officiated, and also conducted a memorial service last Sunday evening.

WEEKLY NOTES.

I have received a letter acknowledging a present of knitting wool which I sent to the girls of the colonies scolaires, after hearing that they could not get any. The Directrice writes: "I was perfectly delighted with the splendid wool. It comes in beautifully for the school where six girls are able to use the knitting machine and are making the supply of stockings for next autumn." She continues: "The men's clothing is also most useful. The administrator has been asking me for six months to provide some clothes for our teachers (in the boys' schools), because they are very devoted to our children and because we can only afford to give them a small salary. Very seldom do men's clothes reach the Vestiaire.

"You will be interested to hear that on account of the splendid English advance in Belgium, which we follow so anxiously many of the civilians had to be taken away from the villages and we are receiving numerous children and are erecting some more colonies at B——. We are looking for more big buildings to house still more children in Normandy."

It is practically certain that we can send the whole 200 beds required for the old people at La Chartreuse—in fact, I have ventured to give the order (trusting that the rest of the money will come in), as time is important and it takes so long to get a large consignment like this to its destination.

I shall be away for the next fortnight, so will friends kindly be patient if their letters are not answered very promptly?

Rose Allen.

The name and address of sender and list of contents should be enclosed in each parcel.

Contributions of money and clothing should be sent to Mrs. Bernard Allen, 14 Gainsborough Gardens, Hampstead, N.W.3.

THE OXFORD SUMMER SCHOOL.

PROBLEMS OF RECONSTRUCTION.

II.

THE exponents of Industrial Reconstruction did not deal primarily with economic questions of wages, profit-sharing, hours of labour, trades unions, and bonuses, but with a moral ideal, in which these things took their appropriate but subordinate places. Materialistic demands were regarded as a means to an end, while attention was directed to the moral and social rights of labour. As for the idea of "right" in this connection, it seems to be, according to T. H. Green's definition, "a claim of the individual arising out of his rational nature, to the free exercise of some faculty....a concession of that claim by society, a power given by it to the individual of putting that claim in force." The admirable speech of Mr. J. R. Clynes, M.P., was a general enforcement of this claim. "When you talk of workshops," he said, "think of millions of men and women, assembled in factories, engineering shops, mines, great warehouses, goods yards, railway stations, in all those other places where the mass of wage-earners pursue their daily calling"; and one visualised not machines of production, not "hands," but persons arrived at self-consciousness, and demanding out of their rational nature the "right" to exercise those potential human faculties hitherto denied development. There is, of course, a very insistent demand for a larger and more assured share of the wealth produced by their co-operation. But it seems true, if strange, to say that this is not the primary aim but a means to an end in the best and most representative minds. When the need for self-suppression is over—and, deafened by the noisiness of those who claim to speak for labour and are not themselves of labour, we often forget how great and silent that self-suppression has been—there will be an intense determination that the willingness to die shall be followed by the right to live in every sense of the word—the right, not the permission conceded by even the most benevolent or far-sighted of employers. It will no longer be a question of a helot caste to be provided for passively by legislation. "There is not," said Mr. Clynes, "the same submissiveness, the same disposition to yield to authority, as existed twenty years ago. The worker holds up his head not as a wage-earner but as a human being." The war has shown him once for all that the very existence of the nation in war or peace rests on his shoulders, and he will never forget it any more. The conservative-minded may or may not like this, but the fact itself is not to be put by.

Mr. Clynes was not concerned to deny the improvement effected in the conditions of labour, especially since the outbreak of the war. It is now almost an axiom that employers stand to gain by reform and improvement. But he warned them that if reconstruction aimed chiefly at increased output it would fail. "The workman will not look kindly," he said, "on plans for making him merely a better instrument of production." Not that he is opposed to increased production; he approves and admits the necessity; but he is suspicious of plans and means which ignore his body and soul as the primary concern. In fact, he fully realises at last that wealth is in the worker rather than in the thing he works. The specific claim made by Mr. Clynes for a share in the government of workshops by those who spend their daily lives therein, and a voice, even an equal voice, in deciding conditions and differences, is being sympathetically considered by the Ministry of Munitions. All depends, as he said, on the spirit existing. He sketched the working of such committees, showing them not as opposing but as negotiating with employers, utilising their skilled knowledge and experience for the general advantage, removing injustice, becoming proud eventually of their responsibility to both colleagues and owners. Associated effort will have to come. "Employers and workmen must agree," Mr. Clynes declared; "we may as well agree at the beginning rather than the end. We are amazed at our patience and long-suffering. Now we think that because, not although, we are working men we are worthy of the better thing—of the mind above the picture palace, of the higher soul, of the worthier life." The sympathy of the audience was evident, not only with Mr. Clynes's propositions but with the spirit in which he made them.

There was an interesting conference on 'Industrial Organisation' in both morning and afternoon sessions, presided over by Lord Henry Cavendish Bentinck, M.P., who echoed quite independently many of Mr. Clynes's contentions, with perhaps some difference in viewing their ultimate aim. "Things cannot go on in the future as in the past," he said. "If we are to get greater production, so essential to our national welfare, we must give the workers a greater control of their own intimate lives in the industrial machine." Mr. G. Gaunt of Springfield Mills, speaking as an employer, admitted the widening breach between capital and labour which might conceivably end in revolution. He described his firm's method of bridging the chasm by co-operating with the workpeople—a works committee, in fact, showing happy results. This was welcomed by Mr. Clynes as a successful example of co-operation. An assertion Mr. Gaunt had made that the workers' discontent arose from a belief that the war was being fought in the interests of capitalism he warmly denied. "If they did believe this," he said, "they would immediately put an end to it, so deeply are they associated in the agony of the war. All but an infinitesimal number believe a nobler thing and a worthier aim in it than the interests of capitalism. They simply would not permit so base a purpose to be at the bottom of this tremendous struggle in which they are giving themselves and their sons." Among various interesting points raised was that of a lady speaker, who remarked with some justice that in this matter of workshops committees nothing had been said about women in industry.

On Sunday afternoon, August 12, a conference was held on 'The Church and the Problems of Industrial Life,' at which the Bishop of Winchester presided. The Bishop, who characterised himself as "a Victorian," said it had been "rubbed into them" that the Church had failed with the people at large, and he started with an acknowledgment of failure—though that sort of thing might be overdone into an almost Pecksniffian repentance. The Church and labour needed one another: they might say the Church started from the workshop, and when she returned to it she would find herself at home, not in a strange place. He urged the drawing into the ranks of the ministry men who came from the workshop; and, on the other hand, men entering the ministry from other parts of society should be given actual experience of the tasks of labour. If the Church is, indeed, to get out of the position of "a hedged and cultivated garden—incurious of the wide spaces beyond it," to use in another connection M. Romain Rolland's metaphor, if it is once more to be set on the highway of life and become again the thoroughfare of wayworn feet, some such reciprocity as this suggested by the Bishop would seem to be imperative. Revolutions as hard as this have occurred before in the effort to get again in touch with reality.

The most notable speech, though a depressing one, of this conference was given by Mr. H. E. Kemp of Bradford on 'Class Antagonism.' He made an alarming picture of the dangerous temper which he saw underlying all the unrest of civil life, and he questioned whether the unity of effort compassed by the Empire when confronted with a most unscrupulous, efficient, and long-prepared enemy could be maintained in the presence of the coveted peace. He saw class antagonism rampant, dangerous, ubiquitous. "Going in and out among men," he said, "one hears expressions of distrust of the Government, of the Cabinet, of the royal family, of Parliament, of the masters. It is rare to hear people of one class give credit even for honest purpose to people of another. It is impossible to overstate the evil result of this." The speaker elaborated and illustrated at length this assertion of mutual dislike and distrust, and concluded that the position was not only dangerous; it was critical. "It seems to me," he said, "that the personal sins of impurity and intemperance are less threatening to the community than this fearful evil of the separation and mistrust of its different classes." He found the one hopeful sign in the evidence of a revival of interest in religion—he would not say in Christianity alone. He accused professional religion of outraging the country's religious instincts for more than a century, especially by its bitter internal disputings, and urged a unity that recognised theological diversities in order that it might act on the common ethical results of all the beliefs. Some means must be provided whereby the distrustful sections of the community might be got to understand each other. "I do not think," said Mr. Kemp, "there is any height far enough removed from the passions of party strife except it be upheld by religious belief."

If this very able address represents the real state of things it is certainly time for the Churches to sink their differences, and undertake speedily the rôle Mr. Kemp suggests to them. And when one reflects how our ears have been assailed by the devastating omniscience claimed by certain sections of people in press, platform, and pulpit since the war began, denouncing in an orgy of denunciation everything and everybody, and particularly the responsible and over-burdened men whom Fate has placed in authority over us at this dread moment of our history, one can hardly be surprised if such a diligent sowing of tares has resulted in some such harvest as described by Mr. Kemp. That the majority of Englishmen and Englishwomen come under this category we do not believe; and Mr. Kemp's views were not borne out by the other lecturers. Mr. G. Barnes, M.P., has recently disavowed this exaggerated class-consciousness and class hostility. Even English snobbishness, that refuge of an ignorance more hopeless than any lack of knowledge in the workers, has diminished since all sorts and conditions and classes went forth side by side to die. That this great brotherhood in arms and aims is to be broken up by class hatred and social disintegration is not in the nature of things. We reckon too often without the soldiers, that army of the dead and the living, who will have their great part in making "the atmosphere and the climate," as Dr. Jacks said, of reconstruction:—

Nay, we should dread
If we return,
Dread lest we hold bloodguiltily
The things that men have died to free.
Oh, England's fields shall blossom red
For all the blood that has been shed
By men whose guardians are we—
If we return.

The Master of Balliol lectured on 'Education and Empire.' His knowledge of the workers showed them, not hating, but rather prone to take dreams for realities, to believe readily in the efficacy of good intentions whether in London, at Petrograd, or even at Stockholm, to be impatient at the slow coming of the millennium. The Imperial sense, or, rather, the sense of the Commonwealth, was growing in them, too; induced by the war and the splendid men who came amongst them from overseas.

Mr. John Hodge, M.P., was prevented by the crisis over the Stockholm Conference from giving his lecture on 'Demobilisation.' Mr. A. W. Ashby, speaking on 'Village Life,' urged the development of our rural civilisation by means of the elementary schools in a very suggestive and useful lecture. Mr. C. R. Ashbee, moved by that exasperation which the contemplation of existence in England provokes in the artist mind, lectured on 'Art and Industrial Problems,' and declared that if beauty was missing science and brain-power would fail among us as miserably as with the Germans. Beauty must be brought back into common life, and the horrors of industry removed. A most practical speech on 'Town Organisation' was given by Mr. F. G. D'Aeth of Liverpool University, who brought to bear on his subject the experience gained by his work in Liverpool.

The Inaugural Address by the Right Hon. Herbert Samuel, M.P., was at once a warning, an encouragement, and an inspiration. He enumerated some of the problems facing the country—a veritable mountain range of problems, in the coming era which might be a Renaissance or might be one of disorderly cynicism. There was only one worthy memorial to those fallen in defence of freedom: the building up of a civilisation great indeed, informed by great ideas and energised by the will to a fruitful peace. More splendid would be such a memorial than bronze or marble to those who died that it might be.

Lord Selborne spoke finely and with a fine loyalty on the 'Problem of the Commonwealth,' substituting this last word for "Empire." He drew a telling contrast between British and German methods with natives. A particular instance within his experience, unfortunately too long to quote, left the audience thrilled and thankful that our place in the sun cries to high heaven of other things than murder, bestiality, and treachery. Yet he did not deny the mixture of good and evil in the growth of the Commonwealth because it had been made by men. "But, I maintain two things," he said; "the good has exceeded the evil, and we are not responsible for the sins of our forefathers. What we are responsible for, every single one of us, is the use we make now of the heritage that has been left to us." One of the greatest possessions we have is the native African thought of our race and our King. The name of the King and of the British race is a password throughout that vast continent to the trust of the natives. Yet the Commonwealth, and with it the destinies of helpless millions, was nearly destroyed in October, 1914—how nearly we did not realise even yet—because we had never thought out its problems. The German calculation failed because it did not reckon with our psychology. The hearts of the Empire rallied to it and the quivering balance dropped in our favour. Now the problem must be faced, and it is this: How can the Empire be organised for common purposes of brotherhood, foreign policy, and defence, and be left free in every part for internal autonomy? That solution will be the greatest step ever taken for human welfare, and the first towards "the Parliament of Man and the Federation of the World."

Lord Islington's great speech on 'Indian Government,' widely reported in the press, gained yet more distinction by the almost simultaneous publication of Mr. Gokhale's 'Testament,' and the quickly following demonstration of Governmental sympathy with the principle of Indian self-government as embodied in the words and forthcoming tour of Mr. Montagu. An interesting incident was the criticism of this speech by a young Indian gentleman—a Parsee—at the "class" on 'Imperial Reconstruction.' He recognised Lord Islington's voice as that of a friend, but said he did not go far enough. There was no question of loyalty to Britain, for India needed Britain, and her free institutions were India's inspiration. But there was a revolt against Anglo-Indian "snobbery," and an intense demand for Indian equality with the British in India. The speaker defended Mrs. Besant. "India always returns love for love," he said, "and she has brought East to West and West to East as no one else has ever done." At the beginning of the meetings a leaflet entitled 'What India Wants' was handed to each person on entrance to the Sheldonian, putting forth moderately and courteously India's demand for her place in the Empire. "The India League," it concluded, "undertakes an educative propaganda, for Britain only needs to understand in order to do the Right."

Mr. J. A. R. Marriott, M.P., for twenty-two years the popular Secretary to the Delegacy, who is probably relinquishing the secretaryship for political life (he takes the Aristotelian view of politics as the noblest of human activities), gave with his accustomed force three valuable lectures on 'The Imperial Executive,' 'Imperial Legislature,' and 'Agriculture in England'—the last almost at a moment's notice in place of Mr. A. D. Hall, who was unable to fulfil his engagement. Mr. Marriott spoke the final words in his brilliant address, 'Retrospect and Prospect,' which left, however, a feeling a sadness at the possibility of the loss of one who had been for so long mentor, guide, philosopher, and friend. It is, in fact, difficult to imagine the Oxford Summer Meeting without him, and one can but cling to a hope that the severance need not be made. F. Roberts.

A "REAL CREDIT."

Some remarks in a letter by a young Artillery officer, well known to the Rev. W. G. Tarrant, may specially interest our school-workers. "I was very glad," says the writer, who is in the firing line in Flanders, "to get the enclosure from the S.S. Society, about the moral and religious instruction of young people. I cordially agree with all that is said in the letter and wish the S.S.A. 'more power to their elbow' in this and all their good works. At the same time I would sincerely echo some views expressed a while ago in The Inquirer about the moral standard of our war-workers. I don't know anything about munition works, but I do know a bit about the soldier-boys out here, and I assure you that, generally speaking, they are a real credit to England in every way, both as regards clean living and language and all the other virtues. Really I think that many of those who, perforce, have never seen the boys out here, would be amazed at the fine way they show up. Not only do they display unfailing courage against material danger, but seem equally proof against the more insidious tendencies of depression, grousing, and unworthiness.

"You should see how the merest 'common soldier,' whatever may have been his job in civilian life, turns up trumps out here. There seems to be something latent in every Englishman that flourishes best under the worst conditions. I suppose that ancestry has something to do with it. And I remember seeing a dozen of these same men running with smiles and chaff to an urgent job that meant practically certain death. (As a matter of fact five were killed outright, and four badly wounded.) I felt as though I'd have given everything to be allowed to lead that merry rush into what a poet would call 'the mouth of Hell'—because it is a privilege to lead such men. I don't know what sort of moral and religious instruction these men had had in their youth; but anyway they were only typical of the spirit that prevails in our army, and is beating all the frightfulness that the Boche, that prince of frightfulness, can invent."

WAYSIDE EMBLEMS IN FRANCE.

In the arctic weather of January, when our men were billeted for a fortnight in barns, I used to take brisk walks into the country in order to get warm. There were three roads entering the village, and on each was erected an iron crucifix surrounded by leafless trees. It was my habit to contemplate these solitary images, and at that time I concluded they did not express the grandeur of God—rather His weakness and defeat. Since that time I have seen many of these wayside crosses. Their size and make seem dependent upon local conditions. Where the place is poor, a sort of standard pattern metal crucifix, resting upon four iron rods is found. In wealthier places one may see more ornate crosses, and sometimes little shrines containing an altar. Two crosses stand out in my recollection. Shortly after we commenced our advance across the evacuated district, I was sent out with a trench-digging party, our rendezvous being the crucifix just outside B——. Judge my amazement when I found an unusually large rood among stout trees, with a ladder leading to a platform which rested on the cross and trees, built by the Germans for artillery observation. Nothing is sacred in war except ideas. The other cross, stark and gaunt, overshadowed me in the moonlight at "Suicide Corner," as you enter L——. I had a crater on my right where the road junction had been blown up, and on my left this symbol of divine compassion. It seemed auspicious that the cross should have survived at such a place.

In January I would have removed these wayside emblems as unworthy of true religion. To-day, a beautiful August Sunday, with its bright sunshine and blue sky and singing birds, I want them to remain, for while they do not express what are called the metaphysical attributes of God—Omnipotence, Omniscience, Omnipresence—they certainly speak of His ethical qualities—lovingkindness, mercy, sacrifice. War often boasts of "kingdom and power and glory," but the cross is eloquent of blessed charity and sacred pity. Burne-Jones finely justifies the wayside rood in his picture 'The Merciful Knight.' That is how I felt at midnight when the cross loomed above me in the darkness at L——. The inward voice told me that gunfire notwithstanding, charity and pity were still alive.

The cross is strangely interwoven with warfare. The Emperor Constantine claimed to have seen it all-fiery in the skies, with the behest "By this sign thou shalt conquer." In later times succeeding generations of Crusaders took their name from it, and enshrined it in orders of chivalry. Many military decorations are in its form. How paradoxical that in the present war both sides should use the cross! One may go into German Military Cemeteries, and find forests of crosses, just as in British or French, the only difference being that the German crosses are bigger. Reflecting on this matter when reading German names, I have concluded "What a blessing for the whole world if Germany had really believed in the Cross! Then she would not have lost her soul, and Europe would have enjoyed brotherhood and friendship."

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Belfast.—In a reference to the recent death of Mr. F. D. Finlay in the Non-Subscribing Presbyterian Mr. S. S. Millin gives the following particulars of Mr. Finlay's father, Mr. Frank Finlay, who was widely known as the founder of the Northern Whig: "'Old Frank,' as he was popularly called, was a devoted member of the Second Congregation, and a close personal friend of its minister, the Rev. John Porter. There is no more interesting figure among the early Belfast Unitarian worthies than Frank Finlay. The son of a small farmer in Ards, he worked his way from a 'printer's devil' till he became the founder and proprietor of the Northern Whig, through the columns of which he fearlessly advocated the cause of Catholic Emancipation and religious toleration generally. In 1826 he was convicted, at Carrickfergus, to 'three months' imprisonment without the option of a fine,' for libel. Four years later he was defendant in a second action for libel, in connection with three articles which appeared in the Whig, on the Hertford extortion of tenants. On the eve of the Downpatrick Assizes, Dr. Montgomery and Finlay met Dan O'Connell to engage him as Counsel for the impending action, and the latter remarked: 'My Church is so greatly indebted to the Whig for what it has done in the cause of toleration, that I will act as your Counsel on one condition—and that is, that I accept your Brief without a fee.' The action did not come to a hearing."

Carlisle.—On Sunday, August 26, special services were held. In the morning the Rev. H. L. Phillips was the preacher; in the evening the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie. A meeting of trustees was held on Saturday afternoon. While in Carlisle Mr. Bowie took the opportunity of visiting several of the inns taken over by the Board of Control for the provision of meals and the limitation of drinking facilities—an experiment which has created widespread interest.

Nottingham.—The High Pavement Chapel Chronicle quotes an interesting note from the Nottingham Literary Bulletin for August referring to Dr. Jacks, whose early years were spent in Nottingham: "Those of our readers who have enjoyed the writings of L. P. Jacks, will find satisfaction in the knowledge that the gifted writer of 'From the Human End,' 'Mad Shepherds,' 'Philosophers in Trouble,' and other essays, can be claimed as a local author. Dr. Jacks is now Principal of Manchester College, Oxford, and is also well known as the Editor of the Hibbert Journal. In response to a request from the acting City Librarian for various particulars regarding the question of his local connection, Dr. Jacks has replied: 'I first went to a school kept by John Wild, whom you may remember. The school was in St. James' Street, and is now a furniture store. It consisted of John Wild, four pupils and a cane; but Wild was a right, good, conscientious teacher. Then I went to George Herbert's school, and when my father died, leaving us very poor, I earned my living for some years by teaching and have had a hard life. I was born in a house at the top of Elm Avenue. We had numerous relations, but now, so far as I know, I have not one in the town. I am glad to be remembered by any Nottingham people, and especially pleased they should like any of my books.'"

ONE of our readers, who has a complete set of the Hibbert Journal for disposal, will be happy to send it to a minister or lay worker on payment of carriage. Application should be made to the Editor on a postcard.

MARRIAGES.

JACKSON—BUCKLEY.—On August 29, at Mill Hill Chapel, Leeds, by the Rev. Dr. Hargrove, M.A. (Minister Emeritus), Edgar Rénard, second son of Mr. and Mrs. G. W. Jackson, 20 St. John's Terrace, Leeds, to Ethel Maude, 4th daughter of the late Mr. James Buckley and Mrs. Buckley, 34 Cardigan Road, Leeds.

HUDSON—JONES.—On August 29, at the Unitarian Church, Swansea, by the Rev. Simon Jones, assisted by the Rev. W. J. Philips, John Keble Hudson, youngest son of the late Thomas Barrow Hudson of Manchester, to Sarah Gwendolen (Lena), second daughter of the Rev. R. Jenkin Jones, Broniestin, Aberdare.

DEATH.

LEIGH.—Killed in Action on August 18, Lieut. Bernard H. Leigh, only son of George H. Leigh, High Lea, Worsley, Manchester, and husband of Ethel M. Leigh, Wyton, Huntingdon.

OUT OF THE HEART OF THE STORM.

Twelve Sermons preached at Rosslyn Hill Chapel, Hampstead, and Manchester College, Oxford.

BY

Rev. HENRY GOW, B.A.

The sermons are written by one who believes with President Wilson that "right is more precious than peace," and that no personal sorrow or loss should discourage us and turn us from our firm resolve to overthrow the Prussian autocracy. They are written too in the growing confidence that faith in God and in the supremacy of Love has become more and not less possible and real through the conflict and agony of recent times.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

The address for our Belgian Hospital Fund, to which cheques and parcels of clothing should be sent, is Mrs. Bernard Allen, 14 Gainsborough Gardens, Hampstead, N.W.3.

WHEN we wrote last week about President Wilson's reply to the Pope it was on the basis of a summary. Now that the full text of the message is before us we are able to appreciate both the strength and the dignity of the message. It is a State document, admirably phrased, which is worthy to be ranked with some of Lincoln's speeches as a classical expression of calm moral power in the service of a righteous cause. In its inflexible rectitude it bears no trace either of unbalanced anger or of disabling pity. "This agony must not be gone through with again, and it must be a matter of very sober judgment which will insure us against it." This is a sentence from which there can be no appeal.

In no utterance that we can remember has the criminal mind of Germany been arraigned with such terrible exactness as in the following words :—

> The object of this war is to deliver the free peoples of the world from the menace and the actual power of a vast military establishment, controlled by an irresponsible Government which, having secretly planned to dominate the world, proceeded to carry the plan out without regard either to the sacred obligations of treaty or the long-established practices and long-cherished principles of international action and honour ; which chose its own time for the war ; delivered its blow fiercely and suddenly ; stopped at no barrier either of law or of mercy ; swept a whole continent within the tide of blood, not the blood of soldiers only, but the blood of innocent women and children also, and of the helpless poor ; and now stands baulked, but not defeated, the enemy of four-fifths of the world. This power is not the German people. It is the ruthless master of the German people. It is no business of ours how that great people came under its control or submitted to its temporary zest, to the domination of its purpose ; but it is our business to see to it that the history of the rest of the world is no longer left to its handling.

MR. WILSON is no less explicit in his repudiation of selfish aims in the war, and of the desire to inflict any kind of deliberate injury as a reprisal for intolerable wrongs. The American people, he says, believe "that peace should rest upon the rights of peoples, not the rights of Governments, the rights of peoples great or small, weak or powerful, their equal right to freedom and security and self-government, and to a participation upon fair terms in the economic opportunities of the world, the German peoples, of course, included, if they will accept equality, and not seek domination. The test, therefore, of every plan of peace is this : Is it based upon the faith of all the peoples involved, or merely upon the word of an ambitious and intriguing Government on the one hand, and of a group of free peoples on the other ? This is a test which goes to the root of the matter, and it is the test which must be applied .... Punitive damages, the dismemberment of empires, the establishment of selfish and exclusive economic leagues we deem inexpedient, and in the end worse than futile, no proper basis for a peace of any kind, least of all for an enduring peace. That must be based upon justice and fairness, and the common rights of mankind."

A CYNICAL commentary upon Mr. Wilson's scathing words of distrust of the German Government has been supplied by the series of letters between the Kaiser and the ex-Tsar in 1904, which have been published this week in the Paris edition of The New York Herald. They contain the most unpleasant disclosure of low-minded intrigue which has appeared for a long time. It is not easy to find words which are fit to describe these criminal designs of decadent autocracy. Kings in the past have known sometimes how to sin magnificently, but there is no redeeming feature about these squalid plotters. The vulgar deceit and the brutal contempt for the rights of others revealed in this correspondence only fill the reader with disgust. With this spirit and all that it represents we can make no terms. We know it now for what it is in all its naked repulsiveness, and the champions of freedom fight not merely to weaken it but to destroy its power over the lives of men.

ON the recommendation of its Parliamentary Committee the Trade Unions Congress has accepted a satisfactory way out of the Stockholm impasse by laying it down that general agreement of aims amongst the working classes of the Allied nations must be accepted as a fundamental condition of a successful International Conference. Stockholm has thus been shelved without a weakening conflict with the Government or any attempt to probe the suspicions of intrigue which have gathered around it. At the same time the Congress passed the following resolution as an indication of future policy : "We are strongly of opinion that an International Labour and Socialist Conference would be of the greatest service, and is a necessary preliminary to the conclusion of a lasting and democratic peace, and we recommend that the Trade Unions Congress Parliamentary Committee be empowered to assist to arrange and take part in such a Congress."

IN this connection attention must be called to the important manifesto issued by the Belgian Labour Party, which is animated by a deep distrust of the Stockholm proposal. It also criticises severely the failure of the various sections of the Internationale to denounce the policy and acts of the Central Powers. "It was [it says] particularly painful in this respect to note the incoherent attitude of certain English Socialists who, from a particularly keen hatred of Imperialism, set themselves up to blame their Government for having taken part in the war, not seeing that England's abstention would have consecrated the triumph of the worst of Imperialisms and militarisms."

The Belgian manifesto closes with the following moving appeal against all agitations in favour of a premature peace :—

> We see with sorrow in France, in Italy, and in England well-tried Socialist comrades giving themselves up to these peace manœuvres, and we cannot understand their blindness and obstinacy in thinking that Europe will be delivered from the nightmare of the war by treating with autocratic and military Powers, and that it will be possible to obtain from them a sincere and real recognition of the rights of nationalities. To neutrals we deny the right of parading sentiments of pity and humanity at the risk of seeing the most sacred rights trampled under foot, but to the pacifists of France, Italy, England, and Russia we believe that we have the further right to say : "Your sufferings are nothing by the side of ours ; your people are working and fighting for themselves ; they are better fed, better clothed, better warmed than ours ; they have sources of moral satisfaction of inestimable value. Our Belgian people, on the contrary, have been for three years in a stifling gaol ; they are often obliged to work for the enemy ; they lack food, clothing, and warmth ; they have as comfort neither a friendly Press nor visits nor letters from their sons at the front ; well, in spite of all, these people who remain —you can ask them—do not want a lame peace ; they disapprove of any agitation which would result in sowing illusions, doubts, weariness, or discouragement among the comrades who at the front are performing the task, so hard and so noble, of liberating humanity at length from the forces of the past."

We are sorry to see that the proposal to amend our divorce laws, so as to secure legal power to convert permanent separation orders into absolute decrees for the dissolution of marriage, is being linked up in some quarters with a fantastic suggestion that power should also be obtained to dissolve marriages which have been contracted between English women and German men. The arguments in favour of the first proposal are very strong, and they are not weakened by the appeal which Lord Halifax makes in a letter to The Times to the "principles which from the beginning have governed the members of the Christian Church in regard to holy matrimony." Christianity only discredits its own influence when it clings to legal prohibitions, which press hardly in many cases and are obeyed reluctantly without any consent of conscience. No duty is created by permissive legislation. The Christian who agrees with Lord Halifax will, as a matter of course, leave it severely alone.

THE INTERNATIONAL MIND.

There are some people who regard national distinctions as the source of most of our present troubles. They imagine that if we could only obliterate our special characteristics and merge ourselves in the general mass of humanity peace would look down from heaven and righteousness would again flourish on the earth. Like democracy, internationalism has become a word to conjure with in certain quarters. International conferences are in high favour as the best school of wisdom, and international control is advocated as the one solution for many of the disputed problems of the commonwealth. All this springs from generous instincts and a deep sense of the disasters which have happened in the past through the clash of national ambitions ; but we have to be on our guard lest words of high pretension, which trip lightly off the tongue, should act as an opiate for thought. It is in any case worth while to ask ourselves what we mean by the international mind and what are the proper limits of its influence.

The emergence of international problems into the field of social theory and practical politics is due to the immense development of the principle of nationality in the modern world. Nations are a product of history, and their distinctive qualities cannot be understood apart from some knowledge of the furnace of conflict and struggle in which they were created. What is most distinctive in a nation and gives to it a deep consciousness of its unity is not the possession of common territory or certain racial characteristics, but something far more spiritual. As Professor Ramsay Muir writes in his illuminating book on 'Nationalism and Internationalism,' "It is probable that the most potent of all nation-moulding factors, the one indispensable factor which must be present whatever else be lacking, is the possession of a common tradition, a memory of sufferings endured and victories won in common, expressed in song and legend, in the dear names of great personalities that seem to embody in themselves the character and ideals of the nation, in the names also of sacred places wherein the national memory is enshrined.... Heroic achievements, agonies heroically endured, these are the sublime food by which the spirit of nationhood is nourished : from these are born the sacred and imperishable traditions that make the soul of nations. In contrast with them mere wealth, numbers, or territory seem but vulgar things." From this point of view modern history has been a long process of spiritual creation. Out of the welter in which the Roman Empire broke in pieces, and the intervening period of the Middle Ages, when the noblest minds were still haunted by a dream of imperial unity, the nations of the modern world have crystallised slowly into definite forms. But this process, which marks the emergence of a higher type of civilisation, has been accompanied by the growth of new possibilities of antagonism. As the nations have developed in strength and distinctiveness and inspired their citizens with an ardent patriotism, their power of being either a blessing or a curse to their neighbours has increased immeasurably. Their ambitions and desires conflict in various ways with those of other nations and require adjustment either by diplomacy or war. Opportunities also open up before them of serving common ends. Because they live in the same world and breathe the common air there is a vast network of mutual relationships which it is in their power to control for the general good. It is here that the international mind finds the field of its activity, and it is this which has made international problems the most insistent of all problems for the modern world.

But it is just at this point that we are met by an element of misunderstanding. It is based upon differences which are largely temperamental, and it is most desirable that it should be softened, if it cannot be removed. According to one school we are to arrive at agreement by lowering our patriotism. We are to treat what is distinctive in national character as ignoble in the obstinate cases where it cannot be ignored. We must regard the common mind, which is based upon the largest measure of agreement which is possible at any given moment, as our only safe guide. In this way nationality is despised as a hindrance instead of being welcomed as an opportunity, and the aim seems to be to eliminate its influence as far as possible from the international society of the future. For most of us, however, it is impossible thus to misread the lessons of history and to dethrone some of our deepest instincts. Instead of being suspicious of our sense of nationality we try to look upon it and the duties which it imposes upon us in the light of the highest principles of public conduct. We are convinced that mutual co-operation demands of us the richest development of our distinctive gifts, not their suppression. We have no desire to pit our country against the world. In strong agreement with Mazzini, we take as our watchword "Our country with and for the world." But we know that we cannot be faithful to this aim unless we have the courage to recognise that easy agreement is not always the way of virtue. We have our own gifts of political insight and moral wisdom. They are the fruit of hard struggles for freedom and long experience in the tasks of government. To a large extent they determine the special part which we have to play in the commonwealth of nations. In cases where we are well assured that the methods and decisions of the international mind will be on a lower level than our own practice, both loyalty to our own tradition and deep concern for the good of mankind may justify our resistance to proposals, which on paper seem to provide a satisfactory way out of some of our besetting difficulties.

We are thinking here chiefly of the suggestion that all our colonies in the tropics should be placed under the control of an international commission. It is supported on the ground that it would be a generous line of policy for us to adopt, and would do much at the same time to disarm suspicion of our ulterior aims in the war. But we have to ask first of all whether it would be fair and just to the native races, for whom we act as trustee. It is no exaggeration to say that at present there is no such thing as an international conscience on the subject of native races, and it cannot be created by the simple expedient of setting up an international commission. Such a commission might inaugurate a definite decline in the standards of honourable dealing and humane treatment, which have been characteristic of our own policy in recent years. We believe also that it might force us to accommodate ourselves to methods of administration of a lower type than those to which we are accustomed, and this would certainly involve some blunting of moral sensibility throughout the community. Anything that is likely to do that is to be resisted. Our duty is not to rush forward to greet proposals of this kind, as though everything that is called international must necessarily be good. We must meet them with caution and cool criticism, and refuse even to pay them the tribute of sentimental admiration unless we are satisfied that they will contribute to the increase of human welfare and happiness. The world is still unprepared for any scheme of common control, for the underlying moral agreements are far too weak to be effective. Meanwhile it is for us to face the long and arduous task of training an international conscience on these questions, to screw up our own standards, and to accept the burden of responsibility which is laid upon us without misgiving or fear.

In no direction do some of us trust so earnestly to the influence of the international mind as in the sphere of religion. Christianity we acknowledge knows no barriers of race or colour. Sometimes we are inclined to look back with lingering regret to the sway of the mediæval church over the hearts of men, forgetful of the physical coercion which enforced spiritual rebuke. We long to recover for our own day something of its imperious and impartial witness to the things of God. In the light of its ideal national churches and denominational interests may appear too narrow and particular for generous minds who strive to live, even in the midst of the havoc of war, in the unity of the spirit and the bond of peace. But a world-wide brotherhood of the faithful, capable of promoting Christian righteousness among the nations, cannot be the creation of glowing rhetoric or pleasant dreams. It must rest upon an open acknowledgment of the distinctive value for religion of national character, and its appeal must be addressed not to a romantic affection for the past but to the living witness of the Christian conscience. These are matters upon which we hope to write more at length in another article.

TO BELGIUM

CROWNED WITH THORNS.

Thou that a brave, brief space didst keep the gate
Against the German, saving all the West
By the subjection of thy shielding breast
To the brute blows and utmost shames of Fate;
Thou that in bonds of iron dost expiate
Thy nobleness as crime! Even thus oppressed,
Is not thy spirit mystically blest,
O little Belgium, marvellously great?

Thou that has prized the soul above the flesh,
Dost thou not, starving, eat of angels' bread?
With every sunrise crucified afresh,
Has not this guerdon for all time sufficed—
That thou shouldst wear upon thy haggard head
The awful honour of the Crown of Christ?

FIELD AMBULANCE NOTES

By the Rev. Mortimer Rowe, R.A.M.C.

I.—The Children and the Guns.

We had finished a hot and dusty journey from the camp, on top of motor 'buses, on foot, and otherwise; our destination—a quiet French village—was reached, and our kit left in the farm-loft which was to be our billet for awhile. So presently we rambled idly through the village, and climbed the steps which led through the churchyard to the door of the rather poor little church, from which came sounds of a service. Entering, we saw the old priest in his robes kneeling before the lighted altar, and around him a group of village lads and girls, who chanted the responses with not very musical voices, unhelped by organ or choir. But he laboured at the task of teaching them to utter the Holy Name and lisp their petitions for forgiveness and for grace. As we left by another door and stepped out into the churchyard again, uplifted high before us stood a rough wooden cross, and on it the figure of the Christ. At the same moment, from the distance where lay the trenches and the long curving battle-line, came the ceaseless reverberation of the guns. It almost seemed as though that figure on the Cross were listening to both the distant battle-thunder and the wavering voices of the children chanting 'Miserere Domine'; as though he heard them both, and through his Cross had power to harmonise the tremendous contrast and the apparent opposition.

II.—Two Rival Storms.

The "Corps Rest Station" occupies an ideal position amongst the trees close by the village, and thither arrives a most miscellaneous assortment of cases, the slightly wounded and the sick of various lesser ailments. Night duty is a pleasant task for a change: a busy evening followed by the quiet watches of the night, until Reveille brings the work of rousing everyone and helping the "bed-patients" (there are no beds, really) to wash.

Towards Sunday midnight everything was very quiet, and the eighty patients in X hut were all at rest. Outside, the dark night was unusually close and still, but from many miles to the east there came the incessant thud of artillery, and the eastern horizon was continuously lit up by flashes like distant summer lightning. And presently the flashes were more vividly repeated in the western sky, followed by thunder of another kind in ever louder peals, until amidst a sweeping downpour of rain the far-off storm of man's creating was finally eclipsed and silenced by Nature's own lightnings and thunder-peals. Hour after hour they continued, until daylight arrived; then at last the storm died down, white fleecy clouds replaced the heavy grey, and sunshine was gladly greeted by the song of birds among the trees. And from the east for awhile there came no sound of war to break this early morning's peace.

III.—A Moonlight Picture of War.

We left the trenches at dusk one Sunday evening, a small R.A.M.C. party of nine, and made our way down the slope of the ridge to the ruined village of ——. Darkness had fallen, save for the dim light of the stars and the silvery crescent moon, when we entered the village. The road curves through it to the right, and suddenly a striking picture was revealed for a moment and fixed on the memory in that pale half-light. Directly before us on the curve rose the high-built church, now almost roofless, the chancel a broken ruin, the windows a lattice-work of shattered glass; on the left a line of dark and silent homesteads, on the right a tall farm-building whose ragged walls were still crowned with the tumbling bare rafters of the roof, a gaunt skeleton through the bones of which the crescent moon came floating into our view. From somewhere in the district came the repeated and intensely sharp report of our guns, and the long rapid whistle of shells that soared high on their way. And very soon, when we had left the village behind us, we twice turned and looked back on hearing the loud crash of German shells, to see a tall red column leap up for a few seconds and then die down again, as more of the ruins were fired and scattered by the explosions. To some of us it was the first sight of devastation actually in progress, and, as it happened, a somewhat impressive one.

IS PATRIOTISM ENOUGH?

To the Editor of The Inquirer.

Sir,—In your issue of the 18th inst., which has just reached me, I read with great interest the article by Mr. H. H. Johnson under the above title. While naturally hesitating to offer any comments upon the article itself, which indeed I am quite unable to do, it has struck me that perhaps your readers might be glad to read a few words on this subject from one who has had opportunities of considering these matters from another point of view. Mr. Johnson lays considerable emphasis upon the necessary difference between our love for our country and our love of the Divine, which latter we call Religion. He points out that this same love of our country, in so far as it results in disinterestedness of action, is a step towards the religious belief for which our Churches stand to-day; and he also lays stress upon the point made in that remarkable book 'A Student in Arms'—that our soldiers know and practise all the Christian virtues with scarcely a thought of conscious religion. In this last fact (and it is an indubitable fact) many people will doubtless find a source of wondering regret. To me, whose privilege it has been to live and work with these same soldiers, it appears as a source of neither wonder nor regret, but the most natural and comforting fact that emerges from all these troublous times. When Christ was on earth, he never sought for lip-worship; that his followers should keep his commandments, and try and make earth more like Heaven, was all his desire. And it is this that our soldiers do, in deed rather than in word or conscious thought; for if they ever think about it at all, they realise that some irresistible force—call it Religion or Patriotism, what you will—is guiding and impelling them in paths of right and duty.

I regret that Mr. Johnson should have seemingly found it necessary to deplore this absence of outward religious expression and to lay stress upon the inadequacy of Patriotism as a living creed. To many of us, out here, Patriotism and Religion are practically one and the same. Of course, I do not mean by Patriotism the narrow insular pride in the material greatness of our country; I mean that love that comforts us in misery, that protects us in danger, that soothes the wounded, enfolds the dead, and comforts the bereaved. We believe that England was given to us by the Heavenly Father as a solemn trust, and that if we love her and protect her and serve her as best we can, we are doing what is well-pleasing in His sight. So when the shells are screaming and our comrades are falling fast, we commend ourselves to His care, having done our best to be faithful to the trust committed to our charge. We are only poor soldiers here, with no ear for the niceties of religious discussion, or understanding for the intricacies of theology. We are glad to do our best for our country (the finest country and the most precious gift God ever made to mankind), and to do our utmost to help the cause for which she stands. The rest we leave to the Divine Love which enfolds us all and does not let even a sparrow fall unheeded. This is our Patriotism, and this our Religion; to love mercy and to do justly and to give our all for God's kingdom on earth, which (we pray) may one day be set up "in England's green and pleasant land."

And there is one word more to be said. Mr. Johnson says, there will come a time when England shall be no more. I cannot find it in my heart to agree with this. Whenever, in future ages, men and women talk and think of things honourable and of good report, they will remember the little country that saved the world in the face of all the powers of darkness; her name and fame will live whenever great deeds are spoken of, and will set the youth of the world to doing lovely things, in far-off ages and among nations yet unborn. England is now in travail of a new birth of everlasting glory and honour; she is the mother of our immortal souls, and she herself is immortal. Justice and righteousness and freedom are now the watchwords of her being; these are the things that cannot die; and of these she has made herself a crown of imperishable glory.—Yours, &c.,

BOOKS AND REVIEWS.

THE UNITARIAN HISTORICAL SOCIETY.

Transactions of the Unitarian Historical Society. Vol. I. Part I. At the Lindsey Press.

The first issue of the 'Transactions of the Unitarian Historical Society' deserves a more extended notice than the note of cordial welcome with which we greeted it on its appearance, both on account of its intrinsic excellence and because it marks the beginning of a new enterprise in the by-ways of research. The editor, the Rev. W. H. Burgess, has contributed a useful preface, in which he summarises the work that has been done in the special field of Unitarian history. His references to books are particularly useful, and prompt the hope that ultimately he will provide a good working bibliography. Next in order come three important articles dealing with the 'Deeds of the Free Christian Church, Horsham,' by R. M. Montgomery, K.C., 'The Old Nonconformity at Norton, Derbyshire,' by the Rev. C. J. Street, and 'Early Records of a Presbyterian Congregation' [the High Pavement Chapel, Nottingham], by Mr. J. C. Warren. These are followed by some short notes on the 'Old Meeting, Framlingham,' by the Rev. Alfred Amey, Reviews, Notes and Queries, and a List of Members of the Society, together with the Annual Report and the Rules.

The articles which we have mentioned are all marked by diligent research and the keen appetite for small facts, without which it is impossible to do good work in local history. Mr. Montgomery's contribution is an excellent example of the service which a highly trained legal mind can render to the interpretation of old trusts, by making them reveal their human interest and the continuity of family interest which constitutes the quiet romance of many an old meeting-house. Mr. Street has had the good fortune to disinter an almost forgotten chapter of Nonconformist history, which is of special interest to the members of the Upper Chapel, Sheffield; while Mr. Warren reveals once again his devotion to the High Pavement Chapel, Nottingham, and every detail of its history. For him even the faded ink of a register is brimful of human interest. Here is a pathetic example: "Another fact these registers reveal is the woeful amount of infant mortality even in well-to-do families. Thus the Rev. John Hardy enters, in 1724, the baptism of his daughter Elizabeth, 'baptised at the age of eight days by me her father,' with the pathetic addition, 'decd. seven days after,' and in 1727, is the baptism of Joseph his son, 'baptised by me his father,' with the words 'he died the following day.' Constant entries occur of baptisms in private—'the child being very weak,' or in others 'near death,' and though the following are extreme examples, they are only examples of frequent similar notes: thus 'Esther, the fourteenth child and the sixth now living' of so-and-so; 'Samuel the fourteenth child and the sixth now living' of another married couple, and another 'Samuel the nineteenth child but the second now living.'" Similarly, Mr. Warren makes those registers tell him a number of interesting facts about local trades. "It is noticeable," he says, "how widely small trades were distributed at this time." He also has a keen eye for the humour of Christian names, and cites some which are likely to be new to the patient collector of such trifles.

We can congratulate the Society unreservedly on its first publication, but at the same time we are tempted to make one suggestion. We hope that a love of antiquarian lore and devotion to the genealogies of forgotten worthies will not be allowed to exclude historical questions of wider and more permanent interest. The contribution of the Unitarian movement to liberal theology and social reform, and the reaction of intellectual and political change upon the quality of its religious life and the range of its activities, are among the subjects which might be discussed with great advantage. There is always a little danger that Nonconformist history may become a branch of archæology. When we treat it too exclusively in the spirit of the local antiquarian we are liable to miss some of the most important lessons which it contains for our present difficulties and our hopes for the future. One word in conclusion in praise of the excellent "get-up" of the 'Transactions.' There are no signs of war-time economy in print or paper to offend the most fastidious taste.

THE AUTUMN PUBLISHING SEASON.

The announcements made in Messrs. Macmillan & Co.'s Autumn List reach a high level of interest. The biographical section is especially strong, containing as it does 'Recollections,' by Viscount Morley, in two volumes; a new 'Life of Keats,' by Sir Sidney Colvin; and 'The Life of Lord Lister,' by Sir Rickman J. Godlee. Poetry is represented by 'Moments of Vision and Miscellaneous Verses,' by Mr. Thomas Hardy; and 'Sacrifice and other Plays,' by Sir Rabindranath Tagore.

The Macmillan list also includes 'Per Amica Silentia Lunae,' a volume by Mr. W. B. Yeats; and 'Priest of the Ideal,' by Mr. Stephen Graham, a book which is in the form of a novel with emblems, and which gives the author a great opportunity for examining the spiritual inheritance of England and what is really our "imperishable substance" as a nation. 'Folk-Lore in the Old Testament' is dealt with in two substantial volumes by Sir J. G. Frazer, the well-known author of 'The Golden Bough.' Other items of interest are 'Political Portraits,' by Mr. Charles Whibley, which deals with some of the greatest figures in English and European history; the first volume of an exhaustive 'History of the French Novel,' by Dr. George Saintsbury, which carries the record to the year 1800; and Vol. V. of Mr. Humphry Ward's 'Selections from the English Poets,' which includes Tennyson, Browning, Swinburne, W. Morris, and many other of the later poets of the nineteenth century.

Theology and philosophy are represented by the following works of outstanding interest: 'Essays on the Early History of the Church and Ministry,' by various writers, and edited by the late Dr. H. B. Swete; 'Immortality,' a series of essays from different pens, edited by Canon B. H. Streeter; 'The Church in the Furnace,' essays by seventeen Church of England Chaplains on Active Service in France and Flanders; 'Sermons preached in Westminster Abbey,' by Canon R. H. Charles; 'Christianity in History with Reference to the Development of its Principles and Forms,' the joint work of Dr. A. J. Carlyle and Professor J. Vernon Bartlet.

Among the forthcoming publications announced by Mr. John Murray are the 'Life of the Rt. Hon. Sir Charles W. Dilke, Bart.,' begun by Stephen Gwynn, M.P., completed and edited by Gertrude M. Tuckwell; 'Basil Wilberforce, D.D.: A Memoir,' by the Rt. Hon. George W. E. Russell, and the 'Life and Letters of Maggie Benson,' by her brother, Dr. Arthur C. Benson.

Mr. John Murray will also publish almost immediately the 'Life and Letters of the Rev. Stopford A. Brooke,' by Dr. Jacks. The book, which will be in two volumes, and is to be issued at 12*s.* 6*d.* net, is likely to be one of the most interesting religious biographies of recent times.

In addition to the two volumes of 'New Testament Studies,' by Dr. James Drummond, already announced, the Lindsey Press will publish this autumn 'The Soul of the Nation: Essays on Religion, Patriotism, and National Duty,' by the Rev. W. H. Drummond. The volume will contain a selection of the editorial articles which have appeared in The Inquirer since the beginning of the war.

MEMORIAL NOTICE.

CAPTAIN ROBERT BLAKE ODGERS, A.S.C.

It is with deep regret that we have to announce the death at the age of 27 of Captain Robert Blake Odgers, A.S.C., third son of Dr. W. Blake Odgers, K.C., and Mrs. Odgers. Like many another bright and eager spirit he has given his life in the service of his country. A short time ago he broke down from overwork. He died peacefully in his sleep early on the morning of August 31, having undergone a serious operation to relieve pressure on the brain a few days before. All who knew anything of the radiant happiness of his home life will desire to express their deepest sympathy with his father and mother, and with his young widow in their loss.

Robert Blake Odgers was educated at Sedbergh Grammar School and at St. John's College, Cambridge. In 1911 he entered upon his engineering career in the Birmingham Metal and Munitions Co., Saltley, and obtained a commission in the Territorial A. S. C. In two years' time he was promoted to the post of assistant to the Head of the Inspection Department. On the declaration of war he was mobilised, but he could not be spared from his post, and was allowed to return to Birmingham while retaining his rank in the army. He was soon appointed Assistant Works Manager and subsequently General Superintendent of a large new Government cartridge factory. In the August of last year, at the request of the Minister of Munitions, he visited Russia, and represented his firm in matters connected with his profession. This year he became a member of the Institute of Metals. In 1915 he married Olive Askwith Brewerton, the elder daughter of Mr. and Mrs. George Brewerton, of Edgbaston. His early death is deeply deplored by all his friends, and not least by the men who were proud to work under his direction.

The funeral took place on Tuesday. A service was held in Rosslyn Hill Chapel, Hampstead, conducted by the Rev. J. Collins Odgers, followed by the interment in the West Hampstead Cemetery. In the course of his address, the Rev. J. C. Odgers said: "To-day, friends, we mourn the loss of one who in his brief earthly life had endeared himself to many. His loving nature opened like the flowers to the sunshine of affection, and to all who knew him he afforded the sympathy and friendship of a true and unselfish heart. To the home of which he was a member, he brought the spirit of a radiant joyfulness, a disposition of happy contentment which no difficulties or pressing duties could subdue. The melody and the harmony of the music which he loved were the counterparts of a life which flowed on in its happy peaceful way, but was not without its symphony of deeper chords. In the arduous tasks which came to him, he always did his best with marked success, and with the enthusiasm of an earnest spirit; and those who were associated with him were not slow to acknowledge his goodness of heart, his kindly bearing, his devotion to every task and duty. And he gave his life for his country, not on the battle-field, nor in the trenches amid the shriek of the shrapnel and the roar of the great guns, but in the workshop where the pressure of his responsibilities bore too sorely on his tender frame, and gradually wore down his strength, but could not diminish the hopefulness and the brightness of his busy buoyant nature. On every side there are those to whom this sad war has brought the sorrow of bereavement, and for whom we ask God's help in their heavy trial, but in the case of him whose memory we would honour to-day, it is not easy to connect the thoughts of things so sad with the recollection of the brightness and ardour of his youth, and with so much that bore witness to high hopes and noble purposes. And so on this beautiful sun-lit autumn day let our thoughts dwell on that brightness, that joyfulness which were characteristics of his being, that heart of pure affection. Let us permit the sorrow of bereavement to be tempered by the thought of that gladsome spirit passing on to fairer scenes and worthier tasks; let us not speak of separation, for he still belongs to all who loved him, and that love we feel to be the bridge which cannot be broken connecting this earthly life with that which is beyond."

A PIONEER OF NEGRO EDUCATION.

The New York Evening Post recently gave the following account of the work of the late Dr. Frissell, one of the pioneers of Negro education in America :—

By the death of Dr. Hollis B. Frissell of Hampton there passes one of the great constructive leaders of America. If to some this seems an extravagant statement, we can only reply that it is because of Dr. Frissell's extreme modesty and self-subordination that the American public does not realise as it should how great is the loss the country has sustained. Never was there a man more devoted to a noble cause, and never one who was so ready to stand in the background himself. He sought no honours ; he never advertised himself ; he never posed as an authority on matters of the Negro or the Indian or the education of the South—yet few if any had a profounder knowledge of these problems. His was the desire to serve, and serve he did faithfully, devotedly, with complete absorption, a divine patience, and in many ways which few suspected. No one can rightly measure the influence for good which he exerted, because of his refusal to disclose his manifold activities.

He was known as one of the founders of the Southern Education Board, thus being associated from its beginning with the great educational movement which is slowly but steadily revolutionising the South. That he was one of the wisest and soundest members of the General Education Board and of the Anna T. Jeanes Foundation is also known, as is the most important of all of his labours—his principalship of Hampton. There, from 1893 on, succeeding the better known but not less devoted Gen. Armstrong, Dr. Frissell worked in season and out of season for the advancement of the school, which is not only the " mother of Tuskegee," but the parent of every one of the three hundred odd schools of this type, and really the pioneer in the development of industrial education in the United States. Here Dr. Frissell impressed his personality deeply upon all who came into contact with him. Literally, hundreds of the scholars leaned upon him as their best friend, turned to him in years after for ever-ready aid and counsel and for that wisdom which was the more convincing because of the quiet, gentle, unassuming manner of the man from whose lips it came.

To Hampton, truly, Dr. Frissell gave his life, which would assuredly have been spared to-day had he not had to combine with the principalship the heartbreaking work of raising the large funds needed to keep the school going and abreast of its needs. Up and down the country he went, whose presence at Hampton was so vital and so needed, to beg for the necessary funds to keep alive the work which has meant more of hope and help to the Negro than any other undertaking since freedom. If a statue of liberty to commemorate the freedom of the Negro is ever erected, it will naturally be placed on the grounds of Hampton, where the torch of educational and industrial emancipation was so nobly raised when the Government lost its interest in the freedman, and a new slavery to prejudice and passion seemed inevitable.

That such a man as Dr. Frissell should have had to fritter away his strength and shorten his precious life by such drudgery is a reflection upon America and its civilisation, and never more so than at this hour when we are avowedly at war for democracy—the democracy that we deny to our coloured citizens as we deny to the bulk of them that education which is surely the birthright of every American child, whatever its race or creed. Two millions of dollars would have set Dr. Frissell free for his constructive work—a sum we spend in half a day for killing human beings—yet our Northern philanthropy fell short here, and our Government was utterly indifferent. But from Dr. Frissell came no word of complaint. From a meeting that brought him in $20 he came away as cheerfully as from one that produced $20,000. " Who knows ? " he would say. " We may have made a friend who will give us thousands in years to come." Others might chafe ; not he, for there was in him that faith which renders supreme the spirit which possesses it. He believed in the slow but certain processes of time ; he knew that the mills of the gods grind surely if slowly, and he never doubted that the coloured people of this country will yet come into their own.

Yet his heart always cried out against the monstrous injustices he saw on every hand. To many others in that work, less patient and perhaps less wise, he often seemed too resigned and too slow of utterance. It was his lot to work in the South, and therefore there were laid upon him restrictions which he cheerfully accepted, honouring others who differed with him, meeting reproaches with warm and kindly recognition of the other's point of view and zeal. Yet he never yielded on any principle once accepted. We shall hear much of heroism and devotion in this war, as we are already hearing pæans of praise for those who have gone to Washington at great personal sacrifice to aid the Government in democratising Germany. But no one of these, we venture to say, can possibly deserve better of his country than Hollis B. Frissell, for forty years a noble patriot in the least popular and most neglected field of philanthropic activity, ever ready to do his share toward ending a wrong that is the shame of America.

THE AMERICAN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

PROGRAMME OF THE GENERAL CONFERENCE AT MONTREAL.

For the first time the General Conference is to be held on Canadian soil, and the meetings will take place in the Church of the Messiah, Montreal, September 25-28. The names of ex-President Taft and Prime Minister Sir Robert Borden, of Ottawa, among the speakers indicate both the international character of the meetings and the notable attractiveness of the programme as a whole. The former, as president of the Conference, will deliver his address on the morning of the 26th, and afterwards the Rev. John Haynes Holmes will report as chairman of the Council. The Rev. William L. Sullivan will give a theological paper, with discussion opened by Professor Harry A. Overstreet. The Women's Alliance luncheon will be held on Wednesday at noon, Miss Lucy Lowell presiding. There will be a ministers' and a laymen's luncheon also. On Wednesday evening Mr. Taft will present an International Peace Programme, and addresses will follow on behalf of the United States by Professor Colby of McGill University, and of the Dominion of Canada, by Sir Robert Borden.

The communion service will be conducted by the Rev. Dr. Howard N. Brown on Thursday morning. 'Religious Education' will be the subject of the meeting following. Mr. John A. Fitch, of The Survey staff, will speak on Thursday evening on 'Industrial Relations,' and Mr. Frederick Almy, Buffalo, president of the National Conference of Charities and Correction, on 'Abolition of Poverty.' Mr. Thomas Mott Osborne and Professor Anna Garlin Spencer are also on the evening's programme, the general subject being 'Applied Christianity.'

Canadian Day, Friday, will include addresses by Mr. Petursson of Winnipeg, Dr. Westwood of Winnipeg, Mr. Irvine of Calgary, of the Unitarian forces in Canada, on the work of the church ; Dr. F. H. Sexton of the Military Hospitals Commission of Nova Scotia, on 'Vocational Training for the Returned Soldier' ; and Professor William Alexander of Edmonton, on 'Unitarianism and the New Democracy.' The impressive ceremony of dedicating the commemorative tablet will take place on Friday afternoon, with addresses by Dr. Samuel A. Eliot and Dr. Milton L. Hersey of Montreal. The Unitarian Proclamation will make a stirring final meeting on Friday evening, the speakers being the Revs. C. S. S. Dutton and E. H. Reeman, and Dr. S. M. Crothers.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Dundee.—The doctrine of heaven as understood by Unitarian and Universalist organisations was the subject of a sermon preached by the Rev. Henry Williamson in the Unitarian Christian Church on Sunday, September 2. He said that every day young men were suffering death in their effort to save the people of the earth, and they must be unprepared, according to certain theories, for the change. If there was a better way of regarding the condition of the departed than that which afforded no hope it would do no harm to state it. John Milton offered his account of the loss of happiness which might have been man's if certain unhistorical things had not happened, and had given his ideas to two centuries of religious persons. The looking back to what had been lost was a custom of ancient nations. But he was entitled to assert that the tendency of men's thoughts now was to look to the future as containing the glorious state for humanity far exceeding all they had lost. Never before was it possible for intelligent men to look forward to the unknown future with such increasing hope and faith. They were told that " it is the will of God that all men should be saved." That meant more than was found in the teaching of the system-makers. Salvation had meant to many nothing more than a free pass into a heaven of mere sensual enjoyment. The love of God was confined to a few, and the case of many was entirely disregarded. The most damaging assertion respecting the small heaven of the old superstition was that such a large proportion of the human race would be eternally excluded from it. It was a feast for a few guests and millions shut out. It would be a gain to religion and to men's thoughts when the borders of Heaven were extended and room found for all. It would be an easy task to point out how the old doctrine of the total depravity of man by nature was being abandoned. Schools and other institutions were being relied on, not to convert children " from a state of wrath into a state of grace," but to enable the good in them to have a chance of growing until it will overcome the evil. He was able to affirm that, in spite of all attempts of men to save their system of dogmas from utter ruin, men's minds were becoming broad and generous, and they were daring to believe in a universal Heaven.

Hull.—On Saturday, September 1, an interesting event took place in the schoolroom of Park Street Church, the occasion being a presentation to Mr. W. Bailey Holmes, the retiring superintendent. The Rev. T. M. Falconer presided, and in his opening remarks referred to the long period during which Mr. Holmes had occupied what he (the speaker) considered one of the most important positions in connection with any church, viz., the superintendency of the Sunday school. The orderliness, happiness and general healthiness of tone in the school had appealed to him on his introduction to the Church as most remarkable, and gave evidence of the good generalship, the tact, love, wisdom and care which Mr. Holmes had unceasingly bestowed. Mr. Holmes first joined the School Executive in 1867 ; he was part superintendent in 1877 and had been sole superintendent since 1890. The secretary of the school, Mr. W. M. Holmes, proposed a resolution of thanks and congratulations, and suggested that the retiring superintendent had created a tradition of excellence that would be an inspiration and a guide for all time. Mrs. E. E. Strachan seconded, and remarked that Mr. Holmes was her ideal superintendent, and she spoke advisedly after considerable experience in other schools. Miss Grace Holmes and Mr. Leonard Walker (the new superintendent) supported the resolution, which was adopted with applause. The presentation was made by Miss Wilkinson, and consisted of an autograph album, beautifully illuminated by Miss Muriel Holmes, also of a portrait of himself which Mr. Holmes asked Mr. Falconer, as president, to accept on behalf of the Sunday school. Mr. E. Davey and Mrs. Burberry kindly contributed a programme of song during the evening.

London : Hampstead.—The sermon preached by the Rev. H. Gow at Rosslyn Hill Chapel on the occasion of the third anniversary since the beginning of the war has been printed for distribution among the members of the congregation. A few copies are available for other friends, and may be had on application to Mr. E. F. Grundy, 14 Thurlow Road, Hampstead, N.W.3.

Mansfield.—The first meeting of the Social Union in connection with the Old Meeting House was held on August 30. Invitations were sent to soldiers, connected with various Unitarian Churches, who are now stationed at Clipstone Camp, and an excellent entertainment and refreshments were provided by members and friends of the Old Meeting House congregation. In the course of the evening, the Rev. T. P. Spedding, who kindly made a special journey to Mansfield from London, gave an interesting account of the work at Lawrence House, and of his experiences when visiting the Home Camps. Friends are asked to send without fail to the Rev. C. M. Wright the names and full addresses of soldiers from Unitarian churches who go to Clipstone.

Northampton.—The address given by the Rev. W. C. Hall at the Kettering Road Church on Sunday, August 5, entitled 'After Three Years of War' has been published, price one penny. Orders for copies should be sent to Rev. W. C. Hall, 75 Semilong Road, Northampton.

Stenhousemuir.—Special services and a social meeting of the congregation were held last month to celebrate the jubilee of the Universalist Church. A special booklet has also been prepared containing a short history of the movement, a photograph of the church and various portraits. Speaking at a special jubilee service, the Rev. E. T. Russell gave some account of the Universalist position. He said "People often ask me, What is universalism? It is important that occasionally this question should be answered from this pulpit. I believe the statement I am about to make will have the approval of all who attend the services here. Universalism is a religion that emphasises the doctrines of the Universal Fatherhood of God, the universal brotherhood of man, the absolute importance of right-doing, the need of freethought, the possibility of goodness in everybody, and that all men and women are in God's care and keeping both in this life and in any other that God may give us. Universalism has a message for all men—for the poor, the rich, the sinner, the saint. To the poor it says, You are members of the great human brotherhood, but you are not receiving all the benefits from life that you ought to receive. The unfair laws and privileges that may be the cause of your poverty must be altered, and better laws made. Do not be disheartened. Do your best, and Universalists will do their best, so that if you are not lifted out of your poverty your children will be. To the rich it says, You are members of the great human brotherhood. You have duties you owe to your fellow-men and to God. Do not try to selfishly monopolise the wealth you possess and the privileges you enjoy. Recognise the fact that your fellows are God's children, and that service rendered to them is service rendered to God. Try to make life worth living to all, and this world a place worth living in. To the sinner it says, It is a pity you have not been able to keep right. Your environment seems to have been against you. Universalists will try to help you to do better, and will work to remove the harmful environment. Do your best to help yourself and them. You are a man. All wrong-doing is hurtful both to the wrong-doer and to others, therefore put forth your best effort to refrain from wrong and to fill your life with good and helpful deeds. To the saint it says, Keep on doing right. You are ennobling your life, earning the 'Well done' from God, helping to make earth a heaven, and showing to others what may be done with life."

Several correspondents have applied for the set of The Hibbert Journal mentioned in our last issue. The editor regrets that it has only been possible to gratify one of them.

OUT OF THE HEART OF THE STORM.

Twelve Sermons preached at Rosslyn Hill Chapel, Hampstead, and Manchester College, Oxford.

BY

Rev. HENRY GOW, B.A.

The sermons are written by one who believes with President Wilson that "right is more precious than peace," and that no personal sorrow or loss should discourage us and turn us from our firm resolve to overthrow the Prussian autocracy. They are written too in the growing confidence that faith in God and in the supremacy of Love has become more and not less possible and real through the conflict and agony of recent times.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

The address for our Belgian Hospital Fund, to which cheques and parcels of clothing should be sent, is Mrs. Bernard Allen, 14 Gainsborough Gardens, Hampstead, N.W.3.

IT is very difficult to say anything illuminating about the situation in Russia. We watch the tragic scene with mingled hope and fear, feeling the vastness of the issues which are at stake and realising at the same time that we know far too little to enable us to form even a provisional judgment. But it is not easy to resist the temptation to take sides, and some of our leading newspapers, on the basis of what seems to us very inadequate information, are already showing their partiality for Kerensky or for Korniloff. If we interpret the situation aright, it is possible that both of them may be animated by an unselfish patriotism. A dictator is the need of the hour in the face of appalling danger, and the contest is between the civilian who distrusts the iron rule of the soldier and the soldier who sees the last chance of saving his country slipping from his grasp. At the time of writing it is Korniloff s line of action which is in most danger of misrepresentation, as all the means of communication with other countries are in the hands of the Provisional Government, and the official messages do not shrink from making the gravest accusations.

In these circumstances it is well for us to fall back upon the words of Mr. Lloyd George spoken before the stirring events of the past few days. They were a plea for patience and sympathy in face of the overwhelming difficulties of the situation. We must bear in mind, he said, that the Russian soldiers are repairing the machine that has broken down, and they are doing so under the fire of the Prussian guns. At the same time he did not attempt to disguise the disasters which would follow if Russia were defeated and humiliated under the leadership of a Revolutionary Government. "The credit of democratic government in Russia and elsewhere is at stake. No people will readily forgive a system of government which cannot defend their native land against an invader."

WE have passed the stage at which fresh revelations of German perfidy can cause us any surprise. The use made of the Swedish Legation in the Argentine by the German Chargé d'Affaires, in order to transmit information to the Foreign Office in Berlin which would lead to the destruction of ships by submarines, is entirely in character. The fact that some of the ships belonged to the country to which Count Luxburg was accredited was evidently a matter of no importance. They were quite small, besides it was possible to sink them without a trace being left [spurlos versenkt] to tell the sordid tale. It is clear that the result of these disclosures for Sweden in her relations with the United States and ourselves must be very serious, while the Argentine can hardly preserve her neutrality without an entire loss of self-respect. Apart from these diplomatic questions the general effect upon public opinion has been to strengthen the conviction that with this spirit of dishonour there can be no compromise without wrecking the whole fabric of civilisation. So far from the moral issues of the war being weakened and blurred they become sharper and more imperative with the lapse of time. We wait, and often we ask ourselves how long must we wait in vain for some open and indignant disavowal of these acts of cynical treachery by any influential section of the German people.

* * *

A TERRIBLE description of the sufferings of Belgium under German rule has been submitted by Mr. Maurice Pate to the Belgian Relief Commission. It is based upon his own observations in the Province of Hainault. The diet of the people is so low that their whole physical condition has been weakened. They have little strength to resist sickness, tuberculosis is rampant and there has been an alarming increase in the rate of mortality in the industrial districts since the beginning of the present year. Thus, at Mons, a town of 30,000, the number of deaths recorded for the first quarter of 1917 was double that for 1916. In Southern Belgium the situation has been made worse recently by the enforced settlement of large numbers of French refugees, who make an additional drain upon the very inadequate supplies of food.

IN spite of these terrible privations Mr. Pate is able to pay a high tribute to the steady confidence of the people in the final triumph of their cause. They maintain an attitude of obstinate resistance to all forms of German propaganda.

> The Belgian "moral" [he says] which, unfortunately, has been the object of misinformed discussion abroad, is, I may vouch confidently for the territory I know so well—the Hainault—beyond reproach. Resistance to submission, quiet but never relinquishing, maintains its historic reputation. This would be evident to anyone who has had the occasion to observe the stern fight put up by the Hainault against German requisitions of men since last October, in which not one of the 445 communes gave up the "chomeurs" lists; in which one town (Tournai) paid a million francs rather than give up the name of a single man; in which hundreds of men have laid down their lives in Germany, or in Northern France, or have undergone unbearable physical torture or returned home in broken health, rather than submit, for an instant, to the Germans—any one who has been a witness to these events knows the meaning of Belgium's sacrifice. The very quietness and resignation with which Belgium is bearing her present double burden of starvation and oppression should urge us to exert every force and influence in finding a solution to her unfortunate situation.

As President of the Welsh National Eisteddfod Lord Leverhulme made a remarkable speech last week on the conditions of Labour after the war. He laid stress upon the need of avoiding fatigue, overwork and excessively long working hours, and startled his hearers by advocating a six-hour day as economically sound in spite of our colossal burden of debt and the amount of waste which would have to be made good.

The only possible way to produce wealth [he said] is by the labour of all classes working shoulder to shoulder together in co-partnership during reasonable hours and without individual over-fatigue or overwork. There must be no idle overfed and underworked men or women or no overworked underfed men or women. It has been estimated that less than half of our total population are actual producers of wealth, but if we are as a nation to make good the wastage of this war and to maintain our position amongst the nations of the world after we have won complete victory and the unconditional surrender of our enemies, then it will require that all able-bodied men and women, from school age to dotage, of all ranks and stations, shall be workers for six hours each day for six days each week. There will be no place in the whole British Empire for the idle rich or the idle or "ca'-canny" poor. We cannot consent as a nation to there being any loafers, nor can the British Empire become a loafer's paradise if it is to continue to exist.

One of the dangers which we have to guard against at the present time is the waste of overstrain. Many people are taxing their physical strength in ways which may be positively injurious to the results which we want to secure. The conditions imposed by the war are not those of a short spurt but of a long struggle, and we do our best service when our expenditure of energy is at a level which can be maintained. This applies specially to women who have taken up unfamiliar work involving long hours and considerable physical exertion. In The Times a few days ago a doctor called public attention to the evidence of strain and debility which he has found among munition girls who are required to work 10½ hours daily. He makes the very reasonable suggestion that they should have the option of working only 8 hours a day. "The extra two hours in sleep," he says, "would make all the difference to a large number of women, who are at present faced with only two alternatives: Either continue the long hours and break down, or give up the work they love, and do well, altogether. Many are inclined to risk the breakdown, and refuse in the national interests to be protected against themselves. In any case 8 hours of good work done by a rested and healthy girl should at least equal the 10½ hours' work of one who is languid, anæmic, and under par."

TOWARDS AN INTERNATIONAL CONSCIENCE.

At the close of an article on 'The International Mind' last week we had to leave over for further consideration the religious aspect of the question. How far can we rely upon Christianity to act as a mediating and healing influence in international disputes? Granted that its ideal is peace and goodwill among men, are there any fresh methods which we can employ in order to make it effective in the special conditions of the modern world? These are questions of primary importance for all of us for whom Christianity is something more than a dream of heaven or a mystical vision which is confined to the interior life. Justice, love, generosity, kindness, and the other great qualities of the Christian character have nothing about them which is peculiar to any time or place. It is our plea that they are universal because they are divine. The basal doctrines of our faith, that God is love and that all men are partakers of the divine nature, exclude any belief in a nation that is highly favoured to the disadvantage of the rest. How, then, is our religion to adapt itself to conditions in which there are sharp lines of cleavage between one nation and another? Are we forced to the conclusion, as some disenchanted people suppose, that for the Christian man the sense of nationality is a hindrance and patriotism only a counterfeit virtue after all?

The difficulty is a serious one, and we have no desire to minimise the distress which it creates for many sensitive minds. At the same time we are not likely to discover any way out unless we attack it with boldness and commonsense. It is just here that every attempt to ignore national divisions in our religious discussions breaks down. We must either use them or destroy them. Nothing can be more foolish than to pretend that they are not there, or to take refuge in a gentle form of religious idealism which has few points of contact with the world of hard realities. A word of warning must also be spoken against the tendency to draw highly coloured pictures of the unity and moral control of the mediæval church, as though it were possible for us by some act of historical repentance to bring back a vanished world. Those who have intimate knowledge of that turbulent time and a keen admiration for the achievements of its best minds are not likely to be captured by these romantic dreams. They know that it is distance which lends enchantment to the view. But there are others who fall an easy prey to this habit of working backwards in religion, and they need to be reminded that few things are more likely to deaden the intellect and cripple the healthy activities of conscience. It is not in any form of mediævalism that we shall find an answer to our problem.

The suggestion we have to offer is in another, and we think more hopeful direction. As the disappearance of the dream of empire, which haunted the Middle Ages, coincided with the growth of nations and the extension of political freedom, so the break up of the unity of the mediæval church has resulted in the creation of a richer variety of character and given a new autonomy to conscience. In losing the element of centralised control Christianity has developed a noble passion for liberty, which is inconsistent with the policy of a spiritual autocracy. Nations are daring experiments in the art of living, and religion as it blends with the national life helps to mould it into its own pattern and in turn assumes much of the distinctive colouring of its surroundings. We thus get on the one hand a common Christian civilisation, which is marked chiefly by certain moral agreements and common standards of behaviour, and on the other hand different types of religious character which bear upon them strong and indelible traces of their national origin. In actual experience we seldom come across a pure type of virtue, which owes little or nothing to any other training but that of religion. Climate and soil, national history and tradition, heredity and personal temperament, the vexed political and social questions of our own day, and the religious associations in which we have been nurtured, all these things help to determine the particular angle from which we approach our duty and the pattern of conduct which we accept as the highest for ourselves. Without renouncing its claim to control, the Christian spirit has a marvellous power of entering into alliance with the most varied gifts and characteristics. Its object is not to run all men into the same mould but to use distinctive personal qualities and strongly marked national groups for the fulfilment of its perfect work.

From this point of view the practical task of religion is not to create a supernatural society, which ignores national distinctions, and places its own loyalties in antagonism to those of the nation. It is rather that of inspiring national life with justice and mercy and high standards of honour and broad-minded sympathies, which will give it spiritual value in its relations with other peoples. We are still at an early stage in the long process of nation-making. The conflicts which cripple and impoverish us are international only to a limited extent. Their deepest root must be sought in the fact that the national will is hindered in its pursuit of goodness by jealousies and selfish aims and class divisions. It is not nationality which blocks the way of brotherhood and peace, but undeveloped and low-minded nationality. There can be no true commonwealth of nations, until all of us have nobler gifts of character and purpose and are willing to spend them in its service.

The creation of an effective conscience first of all in national life, and then in the control of the interests which civilised peoples have in common, is the hard task to which modern Christianity has to set its hand, and nothing hinders it so much in its task as the antagonisms and the false emphasis of its own devotees. The common witness to justice and right-doing in our own country is halting and weak, because Christian men will not unite on these things without insisting upon the divine right of their own creeds and ecclesiastical arrangements. We have yet to learn that the only catholicity which can unite us to the mind of Christ and make us one with the great company of the faithful, is the catholicity of goodness. Looking out upon the world with an earnest desire to read the divine meaning which is hidden for us in the present struggle of the nations, we seem to hear a call to clear out of the way whatever obstructs the fellowship of good men whose hearts are set upon doing the will of God. Here, in our own life as a people, goodness must no longer be divided against itself. When we learn to accept it as the corner stone of our religious fellowship the influence of Christianity upon national character will receive an immeasurable access of power, and the problems of international duty will become simple and direct as they have never been before.

It is in the light of these considerations, and of others of a similar character which will easily suggest themselves, that we must judge the proposal which has been put forward in some quarters that steps should be taken to summon an international congress of Christians to promote a temper of conciliation and to consider terms of peace. Apart from the danger that such a congress might be composed of members of ecclesiastical coteries with no authority to interpret the common Christian mind, we are faced at once by the difficulty of finding any international conscience, wide in experience and mature in judgment, of which such a congress could claim to be the public organ. But without this foundation of definite moral agreement its verdicts could not rise above the level of pious aspirations, which in a critical situation like the present do serious harm to religion, because they are felt to be weak-minded and ineffective. The recent Papal Note is a plain warning to us of the danger of attempting to make any appeal to a common Christian sentiment on a basis of moral neutrality. But this is no counsel of despair, for we believe that with the growth of democratic feeling, the wide diffusion of Christian ideals of fellowship and service, and the growing sense of social responsibility an international conscience may emerge in the field of practical affairs in the near future. It is for us to speed its coming by removing everything which holds good men apart and weakens the forces of righteousness within the life of our own nation.

FIELD AMBULANCE NOTES

By the Rev. Mortimer Rowe, R.A.M.C.

IV.—When the Day Dawned.

We had dozed uneasily through half the night in our cramped little corner of the old German concrete machine-gun emplacement near the exit from the trenches, sleeping in our clothes in readiness for a call to turn out on duty. Fortunately, no wounded had come down the line of relays for many hours, but just after dawn we were awakened by the call of "stretcher-bearers!" and hurried out to take over the stretcher-case and a couple of walking cases which the preceding squad in the line had conducted as far as our post. Shoulder-high we lifted the former—a lad who had lain in a shell-hole for some hours after being bandaged, not being very seriously wounded, until he was brought safely in after night-fall. How glad he was to know that this was the last stage of his long "carry," and that another few minutes would see him at the Dressing Station! As we picked our way cautiously down the slope of the ridge and descended the rough track to the road below, the sun was rising gloriously in a sky of rich and varied clouds, lighting them up with ever-changing shades of colour—yellow as bright as the purest gold, and red as deep and warm as the reddest of roses. And everywhere within our hearing the guns were silent and still, as though hushed by the wonder and the beauty of the day's beginning.

V.—The Chastisement of our Peace.

It fell to our lot to go forward in relief of a squad which had been on duty for two days and nights at a post of considerable danger and strain, and as we drew near to it the narrow communication trench took on the familiar form of a series of alternating right-angles. Word had been given us that we should come to the place where four out of a party of a dozen men had just previously been killed by the direct bursting of a shell as they passed along. We turned a corner and suddenly saw them lying still and silent where they fell—probably without even hearing the crash of the shell which ended for them the turmoil and the struggle; my first sight of death in the trenches, the death of the numberless lads who have been called upon to make the supremest of all sacrifices for the love of their native land. Peace came to them in a flash, in an unexpected moment, but they were in truth "bruised for our transgressions....and the chastisement of our peace was upon them...." After reaching our post we returned and lifted their poor shattered bodies on to the firing-step of the trench, covering each with his ground sheet, ready for removal and burial later in the day. Shells were descending around us all the time, but I think we only half heard their menacing crashes in our attention to the difficult duty, and none fell near enough to do us hurt.

VI.—An Afternoon Service.

It was surely one of the most curious congregations that a parson could ever address. For one thing, his descent upon us was altogether unexpected. Nine of us had just come out of the muddy trenches after a spell of rainy days, and had not had time to shave or tidy up before leaving; our boots, of course, were clotted with clay, our legs had sand-bags wound round them and tied on with string, and as the day was hot the faces beneath our "tin-hats" can be imagined. Others of the group were en route for the trenches, or engaged on duty at the Dressing Station, outside of which we were resting and smoking in the expectation of a cup of tea to follow shortly.

Suddenly arrived the Nonconformist chaplain and claimed us cheerfully, without so much as "by your leave," for a short service. So we dropped our miscellaneous equipment and chose the first hymn—fortunately he was good at striking a tune—and all enjoyed the impromptu hour of worship and the friendly talk he gave us in lieu of a sermon. I noticed the gold stripe on his left sleeve, and afterwards inquired as to the occasion. "Oh," he said, "that was on the Somme, when I was in the ranks—a lance-corporal in the infantry; I was a theological student when war broke out." I ventured to ask which position he preferred from the point of view of his profession and influence. "Chaplain, undoubtedly," he replied with a smile. I dare say he had discovered that the "non-commissioned" parson lost in the ranks, though he may have a constant lesser opportunity of extending his influence, has a much more difficult task, a refreshingly rough life to lead out here, and no outward sign or distinction to aid him or give him any footing other than the one which he can earn by his own daily conduct.

VII.—Beauty for Ashes.

Our walk to the trenches sometimes takes us through a tract of undulating country seamed with disused trenches, which has been all sorts of things in its time, including No Man's Land, and more than once the scene of heavy bombardment. But all that is long enough ago. Everywhere now is a wilderness of weed and thistle and grass; here are lengths of light railway twisted and riven above the hollows made by the shells which tore them like so much cord; yonder is a derelict Tank; and winding snake-like across the ridge are three or four broad bands of barbed-wire entanglement, red-brown with long months of rust, and cut to pieces by the guns. But war has finished his work in this strip of land, and Nature has been quick to run riot in profusion of growth. Nothing is so striking as the way in which that kindly mother has dealt with the million shell-holes which pit the district like the craters on the moon's volcanic surface. Between them on the untroubled soil grows little but weeds and grass; in their deep hollows, however, where the shells have scattered the weeds and the exhausted soil, and brought to light a deeper and richer layer, she now has planted a wild but beautiful confusion of flowers of every colour—the blood-red poppy, the deep blue cornflower, and a hundred others. So has she wrought with her healing power to make of every violent wound in the soil a garden of floral beauty. And is she not one with that Power whose silent working in the hearts of men can surely, if we are attuned to His will, give beauty for ashes, and cause the wilderness and the solitary place to be glad?

WHY SHOULD A REASONABLE PERSON PRAY?

By the Rev. J. T. Sunderland, D.D.

I have recently received a very interesting letter. It is from an esteemed friend, a gentleman of much intelligence and high character, expressing his disapproval of prayer, his surprise that I, with my idea of God as a Being who conducts the on-goings of the universe in orderly ways, can do anything so plainly unreasonable as to pray, and his desire to know the reasons why, in conducting a church service, I make use of prayer, and why I encourage prayer in private. Of course, I felt that the letter deserved my careful consideration and a candid reply. Since my friend's trouble regarding the question of prayer is one that I know is in the minds of many earnest persons, it has occurred to me that the correspondence may possibly be of interest, may possibly have in it some slight helpfulness or suggestiveness, to others besides the one to whom it was written.

The essential part of my correspondent's letter was the following sentences: "Is it not immoral to pray to an all-wise and unchangeable Being, whose plans are as determined and unchangeable as gravity, and not to be moved by the contradictory desires of mortals? For myself, as a believer in God, I should consider it useless, and a kind of insult to Deity. I really think that in the future, prayers will be omitted from church services, and given up generally, as inconsistent with a belief in the order of the universe. I think the time is coming when the work of the Christian preacher will be to preach physics, the laws of nature," &c.

My letter in reply was in substance as follows: Your letter interests me much. I am grateful that you have told me frankly how you, as a believer in science and law, look at prayer, and the objections to it which exist in your mind. Since you desire me to do so, I gladly give you, very briefly, my own thought, and try to answer the objections which trouble you. As I look at it, the higher and more rational conception of God, which in our day is coming into many minds, and which the churches of the Liberal Faith with which I am associated are trying to represent, instead of making prayer less reasonable, makes it even more reasonable and more fitting. Only, we need to have the higher and more rational conception of prayer as well as of God. When you write what you do, are you not thinking of prayer under the old low and poor conception, of begging and importuning God to change His mind for our sake, and do for us what He does not want to do, and would not do but for our begging? But this comes no nearer to what I (and, I suppose, believers in Liberal Religion generally) mean by prayer, than does the old idea of God as an arbitrary ruler on a heavenly throne to what we mean by God. Prayer means to me the following five things (it means more, but it means these), to wit:—

1. Reverence (or worship) of a Being worthy of reverence and worship.

2. Thankfulness or gratitude to the great Source of all life, light, love, and blessing.

3. Love, to One whom I believe to be worthy of my highest love.

4. Confidence and trust in Him whom I believe to be the Infinite Power, Wisdom, and Goodness over me and over the world.

5. Uplooking, yearning, aspiration after higher attainments in character and life; the soul's upreaching toward that perfection which it sees symbolised in God.

Surely all this must commend itself as rational and good to every thoughtful, earnest believer in God. Does it not so seem to you? If so, then you see we have a large and very noble field open for prayer, entirely aside from petition or asking for things at all. And if we should analyse the prayers of Liberal ministers generally, or thoughtful men and women, not ministers, holding liberal religious views, I suppose we should find that, as a matter of fact, by far the larger part of the utterances of which these prayers are made up would fall under one or another of these heads: expressions of reverence, gratitude, love, trust, or aspiration.

I think it is only when we come to the small part of prayer which consists in petition, or asking for things, that you and I would not agree. And even here I am rather disposed to think we should agree, if we really understood each other. I hope you do not think that I ever ask for things in my prayers, desiring to put my poor wisdom (or folly) in the place of the Higher Wisdom; or wishing God to do what I ask, unless it is best. On the contrary, if I thought my prayers could have such an effect, I should never dare to pray again. Every true prayer couples with its every petition an expressed or implied "Nevertheless, not my will, but thine, be done." It only asks that such or such things may be, if they are best in the sight of the Higher Wisdom. But you say, "If you want only those things to take place which are wisest and best, why pray at all? For will God not do what is wisest and best anyhow, even without your asking?" To this I answer: (1) I, as a human parent, always try to do what is wisest and best for my little children, whether they ask for it or not; but, all the same, I am glad to have them come and tell me their wants. It gives them pleasure to do it; it draws them nearer to me in confidence and trust and love, to do it; and it gives me real happiness to have them do it. Now, I believe it is exactly so, only more so still, between us poor weak, shortsighted, erring men and women, and our wise, kind, loving Heavenly Father. I believe that for us to go to Him in the spirit of loving, trusting children, and tell Him our sorrows and wants, cannot but be well pleasing to him, as I am sure it is also very cheering, strengthening and helpful to us. And if so, then surely this part of prayer also must be thoroughly rational. (2) Then again, I think there are some blessings which, in the very nature of the case, God cannot give to us, or, in other words, which cannot be received by us from God, no matter how willing He may be to grant them, until we put ourselves in a mental attitude or condition to receive them. And prayer, the opening of our hearts, the uplifting of our desires to God, puts us in such a mental condition. Just as, in the morning of a bright day, the sun may shine outside ever so brightly, but if we do not open our window blinds it cannot shine into our rooms, so we must open our minds and hearts by earnest thought and aspiration, and uplooking desire to God, or else we are not in a condition to receive any highest gifts and blessings of God's spirit, love, and peace. This is the way it seems to me. And now, as you look at it further and thoughtfully and from this standpoint, does it not seem to you so, too? If I am right in this, then you see prayer (according to this higher conception of prayer) is in every aspect entirely rational, as well as something very sweet, uplifting, and helpful.

I join with you in hearty appreciation of physics and all science. I feel sure that in the future men are going to believe in and study science and nature a great deal more than they have done in the past. And I have no doubt that the old idea of prayer, as a begging of God to set aside wise laws to accommodate puny and often foolish men, will more and more fade away as men grow wiser. But I think that all this will only prepare the way for true prayer—that prayer which seeks to get the highest spiritual good by conforming to the highest spiritual laws of our nature. This kind of prayer, I think, we shall no more outgrow than we shall outgrow hope, or love, or gratitude, or aspiration, or reverence, or the sense of dependence on a Higher Power, or the need, in our weakness and sorrow, of comfort and strength from some source higher than our poor selves. Instead of universal law cutting us off from access to God and communication with Him, it seems to me it brings us into a hundred times closer relation to Him. It fills the whole universe with Him—with His presence, His power, His wisdom, and His goodness. For what is law? Only one form of the manifestation of God—a God who is too great, and wise, and beneficent to be arbitrary or fickle, or deal with the world otherwise than in an orderly way, which intelligent creatures like man can find out, and depend upon, and trust.

Thus, I think, as we get away from the old, lower views, and come to understand the higher conception of prayer which corresponds with the higher conception of God, it becomes clear that religion has nothing about it that is more perfectly rational, and certainly nothing about it that is more uplifting, and in the profoundest way helpful, to weak, erring, and sorrow-laden human beings than prayer—the communion of the earthly child with the Heavenly Parent—the carrying of our little cups of heart-need and spirit-need to the great Fountain to get them filled—the reaching up, when we are weak or sad, and laying hold of the Infinite Source of strength and joy which is forever above us.

MEMORIAL NOTICES.

MR. THOMAS MYERS SPIBY.

For more than thirty years Mr. Spiby has been one of the most faithful and zealous supporters of the Aberdeen Unitarian Church, holding the office of treasurer for twenty-five years. From that office he retired in 1912 when he was presented with an oil-portrait made by the minister. Since then, though not actually holding office, he has been most faithful in his attention to the work of the church, rarely missing attendance at the services at least once on Sunday. He passed away early in the morning of August 30 in the 70th year of his age. Up to the last failing of consciousness he was full of thought about the church, and regretted that he did not think he would be strong enough to meet Mr. Bowie on the occasion of his visit to Aberdeen. Mr. Spiby was born in Hull, of parents who were members of Bowl Alley Lane Unitarian Church. He taught in the Sunday school of that church while still a lad. In 1872 he removed to Tyneside and became a member of the South Shields church. Seven years later he was appointed manager of a mill for the Aberdeen Commercial Company, which post he retained till his death. Respected for his honest business methods and his mechanical ability in all commercial circles in Aberdeen, and known for his cheery optimism and his oft-repeated praise of the splendid faith of Unitarianism, he recommended that faith by his character and disposition, in business circles; and in the church his recommendations took the form of distinct verbal praise addressed chiefly to the new members when they paid their first subscriptions. They were invariably greeted with the assurance that they came into the best fortune possible when they joined the Unitarian Church. The office bearers and church members acknowledge the debt they owe their late treasurer for his splendid management of the finances during the vacating of the old George Street Church and the building of the new one in Skene Street. His genial manners, kindly disposition and optimism were communicated to the members of the congregation; and the memory of his personality and work will long be a sacred possession of Unitarian Church life in Aberdeen.

MR. HERBERT DORMER.

It is with deep regret that we have to announce that Mr. Herbert Dormer, one of the most respected and highly skilled members of the printing staff of the Athenæum Press, was killed in action on August 27, at the age of 33. Until he joined the 1st Border Regiment about a year ago he was closely associated with the Inquirer, and always showed great interest in the "make up" of the paper, which week by week owed much to his skill and intelligence. His brightness of manner and his unfailing pride in good workmanship made him the pleasantest of colleagues. He has left a widow and a little boy to mourn his loss. We desire to express to them and his other relatives our deep and respectful sympathy.

UNITARIAN WORK IN JAPAN.

The Rev. Clay MacCauley, who represents the American Unitarian Association in Japan, has sent the following account of recent developments of his work to The Christian Register:—

It is known to many friends of our Japan Mission that in the spring Mr. Bunji Suzuki gave up his position as the Mission's secretary that he might use all his time for the care of the Yuaikuai, the "Friendly Society," founded by him five years ago. This Society has now become so large and so important as a factor in the social and industrial development of the Japanese people that as its president Mr. Suzuki found it necessary to concentrate his energies upon its care. The Society, for the present, has its headquarters in our Unity Hall, where it received its birth and its marvellous early growth; it now luxuriates in at least one hundred and ten branches and a membership of about thirty thousand. Ere long it expects to build for itself adequate headquarters and an assembly hall.

In losing Mr. Suzuki's direct service, however, the Mission has had the good fortune to find, as his successor, Mr. N. Imaoka, known to a number of persons in Boston, two years ago, when he was pursuing some graduate studies at Harvard University. I speak of his taking office with us as "good fortune," because of his cultured intelligence and his evident desire to make of our liberal faith a widespread influence for the best things, especially among the Japanese "intellectuals" and the leaders of opinion among his country-people.

Just before I set forth upon my vacation outing, Mr. Imaoka had an extended talk with me about his wishes and his cherished plans for the office he has undertaken. And, since what he said takes form as a sort of indication or guide for the near future of the Mission's development, I wish to make a brief résumé of his opinions and purposes as something that will interest the home-friends of our far-away work.

There is a Japan Unitarian Association, hitherto composed, by choice of its members, in the interests of a safe-grounding of their faith and methods of work, of comparatively few persons. Its officers have closely guarded their membership and in this may have given to their organisation definiteness and firmness. Mr.

Imaoka desires now to begin an expansion of this membership so as to make the Association a more generally pervasive influence among the many liberal Christians who are to be met with throughout the empire.

In the direction of publication, for instance, he would not only give all impetus possible to the circulation of our "significant work," the Mission's magazine, the Rikugo Zasshi (the Cosmos), making it even yet more distinctively the religious expression of our enterprise, but he would revise thoroughly the pamphlets which at one time made our Post-Office Mission department of empire-wide importance, and would put them upon a well-advertised sales list. "A free distribution of pamphlets," he remarked, "is apt to let the receivers make light of them. The experience of all missionary workers confirms this." He said also that the series of Rikugo, miniature, treatises we have lately begun "is sure to be welcomed by the public." We have issued three, and we expect to put out seven more of them, giving "succinct presentations of philosophical, ethical, social, and religious ideas of liberal Christians." Then he made the following proposition which I will reproduce, literally as he gave it, that our home-friends may know of some of the fine and well-meaning purposes that inform our new secretary's conception of the office he has entered :—

"I am sorry [he said] to find that Japanese Christianity has yet produced no reliable books covering the whole field of Christianity. I suggest, therefore, the following plan. The series will consist in some ten books covering the Old Testament, the New Testament, history of Judaism, life of Christ, Church history, history of Christian doctrine, theism, and systematic theology. The authors should be first-class scholars or specialists, and should be chosen from among the whole Christian body in Japan, regardless of denomination. According to circumstances, translation of some authoritative foreign books will do too. At any rate the series should be of such a kind as to be a great contribution to, and of lasting influence upon, the religious world of Japan. The work can be started as soon as we get some one thousand yen, the contribution of which by Unitarian friends abroad and at home is most earnestly desired."

Mr. Imaoka is also deeply interested in our Unity Hall library. Once we received several hundreds of books from friends in America; but after we had to give up our Senshin Gakuin (School for Advanced Learning), the library has been but little used. Mr. Imaoka wishes to revive interest in the library and to increase it, not with old and out-of-date books, however, but with copies of the very best and newest books dealing with appropriate themes. He asks me to say that "it will be highly appreciated if friends in America and England are kind enough to favour the library with good books, pamphlets, and magazines."

Another aid to the extension of our Mission Mr. Imaoka finds in the expansion of our Summer School, and in the holding of sessions for special lectures at some favourable time during the year. He remarked: "The popular evangelical meeting is not necessarily a work for our Association to do. Our work should be much more rational and intelligent. Not only should we hold every year our Summer School, but also at least one series of special lectures. Our mission is to influence the intellectual circles of Japan. I think that there is great need for supporting such meetings as those which I have just started, for the study of thought in Japan. I shall hold two meetings every month. One of them will be devoted to the study of fundamental problems (old and new, Occidental and Oriental) in religion, philosophy, ethics, society, and state. The other will be given to the study of important books, classical and modern."

At the close of our talk our new secretary passed a general judgment upon the scope and character of our Japan work which, I think, home-friends will like to hear. He said :—

"The proper missionary work to be carried on by our Association should be national in character. The Post-Office Mission, which I have resumed, is the first step in our national campaign.

"Unitarianism should be strong not only in criticism and thinking, but in organisation also. The Association, therefore, should first strive to keep the two sister churches in Tokyo in most intimate relations.

"Moreover, the Association should be the nucleus of the co-operation of all liberal Christian bodies. It is needless to mention that our attitude should be, always, not exclusive but inclusive, even toward orthodox Christians and Buddhists. The mission of our Association is to be the centre of all liberal religious movements in Japan, and to supply a fresh inspiration and stimulus to all religious bodies in Japan."

I quote Mr. Imaoka's words verbatim, and I am confident that our Mission's American friends will be glad to know that in its new secretary their Japan Mission continues to bear forward the high ideals and aims that have long given to their faith its distinctive value and its real reason for being.

CONGREGATIONAL WEATHER.

I've tried to discover, but failed altogether,
What is the best Congregational Weather.
In Winter 'tis always too chilly and freezing;
In Spring the fair country is so much more pleasing;
In Summer the sun's heat too scorching and blazing;
In Autumn excuses are still more amazing.
'Tis too fine when it's fine, too wet when 'tis raining,
Too hot when it's hot, the good folk are complaining.
The service at morning is so much too early;
At evening to leave their hot tea makes them surly.
They prefer, as I take it, for worship instead,
To commune with their own heart upon their own bed;
For whether the climate is hot, cold or wet,
This is the place where its change they forget.
When the weather's unsettled, the wind in the east,
In bed is the spot where men feel it the least.

This for the morning; at evening things differ.
To find good excuses is many times stiffer.
But the changes of weather supply these in dozens,
Wherewith he who shirks service his naughty self cozens.
"The dews in the evening are damp, cool and chilly;
They keep me at nightfall in-doors, willy-nilly."
"The draught in the night gives a cold in the head,
So I read a discourse (!) by the fireside instead."
"'Tis so hot in the evening, that should I go out,
The cold air would kill me, beyond any doubt."

Good brothers and sisters, I pray, do not hide it,
You don't do your duty, for you cannot abide it.
Don't make such excuses, so twisted and mazy,
Nor find fault with the weather because you are lazy.
What you know wouldn't keep you from business on Monday
Should never detain you from worship on Sunday.
If you wish much for happiness, riches and beauty,
On Sundays, as Mondays, forget not your duty.

A MINISTER WHO HAS SUFFERED.

[From The Sheffield Unitarian Monthly Record.]

UNIVERSAL regret will be felt at the death of the Rev. Gaetano Conte, the leader of the Unitarian Movement in Italy and editor of the Riforma Italiana, who after a long and painful illness passed peacefully away in Florence, on August 26. We hope to give some further particulars of Mr. Conte's work and career in a future issue.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Billingshurst.—The Rev. H. Maguire, B.Sc., formerly of Wareham, has accepted a unanimous invitation to the pulpit of the Free Christian Church at Billingshurst. Mr. Maguire intends to make his home at Billingshurst, but will continue his work as science master in a London school in term-time.

Cullompton.—The Sunday-school Anniversary in connection with Pound Square Chapel was combined with the Harvest Festival on Sunday last, September 9. The chapel was beautifully decorated with flowers and fruit, and special music was effectively rendered. Miss Ethel Galpin presided at the organ, and sang a solo at the crowded evening service. The minister, the Rev. Jeffrey Worthington, preached morning and evening, and Mr. W. Broom gave an address at the afternoon service for the scholars and their parents. Mr. Broom also read the lessons throughout the day from a handsome oak lectern, which has been made and presented by Mr. John Salway, one of the Sunday-school superintendents.

Derby.—The Rev. W. E. George, who is with the Y.M.C.A. in France, has sent the following letter to the members and friends of Friar Gate Chapel and Sunday school, Derby: "It is just four weeks since I began my work in connection with the Y.M.C.A. in France. I should like, therefore, to send you a short word of greeting and to remind you again of my existence. Since I have shared here in the activities of the Y.M.C.A, I have been more than ever impressed by the value of its work and of the services it renders to our soldiers. What they would do without it it is difficult to say. It is a privilege to take part in its activities, and my experiences have, I think, fully justified you in the self-denying resolution which you have passed at your annual meeting. It is a work that is to me extremely interesting and enjoyable. It has, however, its pathetic, and even tragic features. But of this I cannot say more. The particular hut to which I am attached, with three other ministers and a Lancashire business man, is said to be one of the busiest huts in France. It can certainly provide us with strenuous hours, though the amount of work varies daily. Our regular duty is to minister to the bodily needs of the men who come our way. But their higher needs are not forgotten. On Sundays and other days we have religious services to which a good number of men willingly come. These services are very inspiring. You should hear the British soldier sing well-known hymns, such as 'O God, our help in ages past,' or 'God be with you till we meet again.' Both are great favourites. We ministers take our regular turn in the conduct of these services. There are also opportunities of helping men in more personal ways. But any attempt to give a detailed account of my experiences would prolong this letter unduly. I need hardly say that my mind has been much at Friar Gate and with you all. With the generous help of Mr. Ballantyne and many loyal friends I am sure things will go well. I think often also of those dear boys of ours, many of whom are not many miles away from this place—so near and yet so far. I should like my very affectionate good wishes to be given to them all and my address. If any of them should chance to come this way they will have a good welcome, you may be sure."

Liverpool.—The Rev. Lawrence Redfern, M.A., B.D., of Norwich, has accepted the invitation of the congregation of Ullet Road Church to become their minister, and hopes to take up his new duties at the beginning of December.

Liverpool : Bootle.—On Sunday, September 9, Second Lieutenant Walter Short, home for a few days' leave from the front, preached in his own church morning and evening to large congregations. His fine and virile words, spoken out of a full heart and full knowledge, were most inspiring. His text in the evening was "He that endureth to the end the same shall be saved," and while giving a glimpse of what "enduring" really means "out there" he thrilled us with the splendour of determination of the army to endure until the great end is won, whatever opposes it in front or whispers and works behind. He defended the Christian man from the charge of being a weakling. Christianity is not made up of the passive virtues; there is something austere, stark, unyielding, severe about it. It is active service and discipline; it is a crusade; it is uncompromising when confronted with evil. He described one or two of the crusading Christians at the front—serving their conscience as their king, enduring hardness, not complaining, living and dying cheerfully and calmly, unconscious of martyrdom yet sharing the suffering of Christ, living no longer for their own ends and so aware of Christ's secret. Many who were present were deeply moved and felt that it is such words as these the nation needs now to hear: words of faith giving reality to ideals from "our sons who have shown us God," that for their sakes we may sanctify ourselves, and not break faith with those who die.

Nottingham.—With reference to the extract which was published in this column on September 1 from the Nottingham Literary Bulletin giving some of Dr. Jacks's early reminiscences in that city, the Rev. J. C. Ballantyne has sent us the following correction by Dr. Jacks: "Regarding the sentence 'I have had a hard life'....what I wrote, or meant to write, was 'I had a hard life,' referring only to the time when I was teaching in a school, when I had a very hard life indeed. Since then my life has not been harder than that of others, and not nearly so hard as that which falls to the lot of many, though I think I have always been a hard worker. Perhaps the matter is not of much importance, but I don't like to appear as claiming 'a hard life.'"

Southern Provincial Assembly.—The Annual Meeting of the Provincial Assembly of London and the South-Eastern Counties will be held at the Unitarian Church, Finchley, on Tuesday, October 9. The business meeting will be held at 3 o'clock, the President, Mr. E. R. Fyson, in the chair. This will be followed by a conference on "Prayer in Its Relation to the Life and Thought of the Modern World," to be opened with a short paper by the Rev. L. Clare, of Birmingham. At the service at 7 o'clock the preacher will be the Rev. J. H. Weatherall.

Stenhousemuir.—In connection with the Jubilee celebrations referred to in these columns last week, a social meeting was held in the Universalist Church on Saturday afternoon, August 25, Mr. Robert Stark, president, in the chair. The Revs. E. T. Russell, Henry Williamson, S. T. Pagesmith, Dr. J. K. Wood, Dundee, president of the Scottish Unitarian Association, and Mr. Alex. Harley were on the platform, and there was a large attendance of members and friends. Mr. Harley said that they were there that day to celebrate the jubilee of the church and also the jubilee of their worthy chairman. He was one of the original members of the church, of whom few now remained. He was seldom absent from the service without good reason. For forty years he led the praise, and for sixteen years he had been president of the church, filling the position with tact and unfailing courtesy to all. Special services were conducted next day by the Rev. Henry Williamson of Dundee. In the morning he referred to the fact that in Scotland Universalist Societies had been formed in Edinburgh, Paisley, Glasgow, and in later years, under the missionary zeal of the late Rev. J. U. Mitchell, the church at Stonehousemuir had been built and a congregation formed. In the evening he gave an account of the work rendered by the late Rev. Caroline A. Soule, of the United States. Mrs. Soule was president of the Women's Missionary Association of the Universalist Church of America, and was requested by some people in Scotland to come as an evangelist. For about twenty-five years she served the cause in Dumfermline, Glasgow, and elsewhere.

WE are asked to state that a set of The Christian Reformer, 1815-55, from the library of the late Mr. J. R. Beard, is available for any library or private reader who would value them. Application should be made to Mrs. Woodhouse, 4 Birch Polygon, Rusholme, Manchester.

OUT OF THE HEART OF THE STORM.

Twelve Sermons preached at Rosslyn Hill Chapel, Hampstead, and Manchester College, Oxford.

BY

Rev. HENRY GOW, B.A.

The sermons are written by one who believes with President Wilson that "right is more precious than peace," and that no personal sorrow or loss should discourage us and turn us from our firm resolve to overthrow the Prussian autocracy. They are written too in the growing confidence that faith in God and in the supremacy of Love has become more and not less possible and real through the conflict and agony of recent times.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

The address for our Belgian Hospital Fund, to which cheques and parcels of clothing should be sent, is Mrs. Bernard Allen, 14 Gainsborough Gardens, Hampstead, N.W.3.

RETICENCE is still the best policy in dealing with affairs in Russia. In spite of the different estimates of the situation which have been sent by special correspondents and the dogmatism of some editors at home we know very little, and can only guess at the possible course of events in the light of deceptive historical analogies. For the time being M. Kerensky has triumphed, but the Korniloff movement seems to have had some beneficial effect in making him grapple seriously with the problem of the army. He has also found a way out of subservience to the extreme socialists by proclaiming Russia a Republic and making himself a virtual dictator. To produce order out of confusion and effective strength in the midst of divided counsels is M. Kerensky's formidable task. Russia's allies will watch his efforts and hope for their success with all the patience and sympathy at their command.

WE are accustomed to receive words of good cheer from our own leading men through the French press. We have no right to complain of this indirect method, for messages of this kind, deeply interesting as they are to us, are meant in the first place for the French people. The interview with General Smuts published in Le Journal is lacking in the flamboyant embellishments of some previous efforts, and may be accepted with all the greater confidence on that account as a faithful transcript of his meaning. He explained that he considered the military situation to be satisfactory because the tactics which we have adopted in France are giving us certain results. The development of modern warfare favours the defensive and makes progress slow; but our limited advances in zones, which have been rendered untenable by our artillery, have cost us very little in men while they have involved a maximum of loss to the enemy. "I do not know," he said "whether the public takes full stock of these efforts and of their success, whether it realises that there is no longer any question as to who is going to win, and that all we have to do is to arm ourselves with patience." This is a most timely word of wisdom at the close of a summer which has not yielded all the results which we expected, and yet has done a great deal to bring victory nearer.

IT is interesting to watch the working of the same forces with which we were familiar in the early days of the war, in the Church life of America. In many cases adjustment to the new order of things is difficult, and there is a temptation to think that the business of religion can go on without much reference to the stern duties of the time. Writing in The Christian Register Mr. F. J. Gauld says that the demand for church services and conference programmes which shall be free from all consideration of war needs and problems arises from a false and vicious conception of the Church as a place of refuge from the sorrows and battles of life. "We have joined in the battle for national freedom, the rule of law and justice between nations, and for the safeguarding of humanity against lawless might. The nation is mobilising men, money, munitions, food, ships, coal, and industry—the entire human and material resources of the people. All this vast effort will be insufficient to win a victory for democracy unless the heart and soul of the people are also mobilised. This last, supreme task is the solemn duty and opportunity of the Church. The Church must blow a bugle-call to the manhood and womanhood of the nation. The soul of the people must be aroused. A flame of patriotic devotion must be kindled."

* * *

AN editorial note in The Challenge last week treats the postponement of the Stockholm Conference as the opportunity of the Church. "We desire," it says, "to urge with all possible force the calling of a conference representing the chief Christian bodies in all belligerent countries. Let the Church take the lead in testifying to the world of the unity of the disciples of Christ in their allegiance to Him." The Challenge is aware that this proposal, like Stockholm, may break as soon as it moves forward into the world of realities, and so it adds the following caution: "We would not have the international conference discuss the rights and wrongs of the war; nor would we see them discuss political conditions of peace. We would see them come together, without prejudice to national loyalties, to discuss ways and means of resisting the pride and passion of war, of promoting the temper that makes for peace, and of strengthening belief in the unity of all believers in Christ."

WE fear that the writer of these words has allowed himself to be misled by the charm of beautiful phrases. He overlooks the fact that the war is not chiefly the result of political misunderstandings. It has its roots in fundamental moral disagreements. We have to bring back to the nations of Europe loyalty to a common law of right, which will govern all our public relationships and colour our deepest thoughts of religion, before we can promote unity in any effective way. For without it there is no foundation upon which we can build. Is it contended seriously that we can meet representative Christians from the belligerent countries, like the Kaiser and the Austrian cardinals, on the basis of our belief in "the unity of all believers in Christ," without any reference to the rights and wrongs of the war and the crimes which have marked its progress? Spiritual unity must always be our aim; without it our Christianity as a civilising force in the world is weak and disordered; but we do not hasten its advent by these attempts to create fellowship without looking closely into the moral agreements upon which all real fellowship depends.

IT was one of the rare privileges enjoyed by Dr. John Hunter that he was a link of connection between men and churches, whose religious traditions often kept them apart. This was not due to the eclectic quality of his mind or any haziness in his own thought where central problems were concerned, but to the moral passion which glowed at the heart of his message and his profoundly spiritual interpretation of Christianity. As a preacher he has had no imitators, for it was no æsthetic charm which held men and women in rapt attention but the driving power of intense conviction, which seemed impatient of the barrier of words in its eagerness to help human souls. The present writer remembers one occasion when Dr. Hunter was giving a lecture—it was more than half a sermon and had about it the rushing movement of his pulpit manner. At the close a distinguished historian who was present said, "How refreshing it is to listen to a man who almost pulls one out of one's chair."

ONE of the books which had a deep influence upon Dr. John Hunter as a young man was 'Spiritual Religion' by Dr. James Drummond. He came across it quite accidentally on a second-hand bookstall and always spoke gratefully of what it had done for him in the way of mental stimulus and inward illumination. A good deal has been said of his desire to improve Nonconformist worship, but this sprang from deep-seated instincts of reverence and not from any love of forms for their own sake. He was never content to be a mere copyist, and was well aware of the dangers of an antiquarian taste in ritual. A friend writes of him: "A strong and fine personality, Dr. Hunter grew broader and broader as the years passed. Although he did a great deal to develop and improve the worshipful spirit, he was deeply distrustful of everything ecclesiastical and priestly. The last conversation I had with him before his illness, he spoke of his entire distrust of sacerdotalism and of revived mediævalism; he could discern no promise of a living or fruitful religious faith in ceremonial observances out of which the spirit of truth had for ever fled."

IN an article on 'Facing the Facts' in the current number of The Modern Churchman the Rev. Alfred Fawkes calls attention to the serious effect of prolonged emotional excitement upon mental balance and normal self-control. "No revival of religion," he writes, "can be expected under the circumstances in which we find ourselves. The war has produced an acute tension and overstrain. Combatants and non-combatants alike, we are living at so high a pressure that our nerves have been thrown off their balance, the equilibrium of life has been disturbed. Hence an epidemic of excess in all directions, normal and abnormal—drink, drugs, sex, divorce, speculation; everything is seen out of proportion:—the result being the mental and moral chaos the record of which we read in the divorce and police courts, which any man of the world who knows the conditions would have foreseen. People talk of the problems of the after-war period. Such talk is premature. Before those problems can be even approached, much less formulated, the lost balance must be restored."

MR. WELLS AND THE BISHOP.

"IT was as if he had fallen suddenly out of a spiritual balloon into a world of bleak realism. He found himself asking unprecedented and devastating questions, questions that implied the most fundamental shiftings of opinion. Why was the Church such a failure? Why had it no grip upon either masters or men amidst this vigorous life of modern industrialism, and why had it no grip upon the questioning young? It was a tolerated thing, he felt, just as sometimes he had felt that the Crown was a tolerated thing. He too was a tolerated thing; a curious survival."

It is thus that Dr. Scrope, the Bishop of Princhester, talks to himself in Mr. Wells's new book. Like other men he felt the first excitements of the war, and then the sense of littleness and futility crept back again, and his ritual and theology became dead and unmeaning things to his tired mind. It is Mr. Wells's object to tell the story of his soul's journey from this prison-house of unreality into the presence of God who bids men "come out upon the Adventure of Life, the great Adventure of the earth that will make the atoms our bond-slaves and subdue the stars, that will build up the white fires of ecstasy to submerge pain for ever, that will overcome death." How far has Mr. Wells succeeded in his handling of this fascinating and tremendous theme?

It is fair to ask this question, and indeed it is the only question which seems to matter in connection with a book of this kind. Though it is written in the form of a novel, with a slight flavour of love-making and romance, it is really a religious pamphlet, planned to produce conviction. Mr. Wells wants to discredit the traditional religion of the churches in order to give men what he conceives to be a nobler faith in its place, and our verdict must be that he is greatly hindered in his task by the clever perversity with which he has attacked it. If the Christianity of our day is really so empty of all virtue, as he supposes, its futility deserves to be exposed with a satire as remorseless as that of Swift. Mr. Wells can poke excellent fun at the bishop's legs, which run twinkling through his pages till the gaiters are discarded for ever. But this amused contempt of the superior mind is a very different thing from the noble scorn of the prophet of righteousness. The satirist defeats his own ends when he allows his taste for unkind comment or grotesque exaggeration to be more apparent than his moral strength.

Serious as this weakness is it would be of quite secondary importance if the process of illumination, through which the soul of the bishop receives a clear conviction of the reality of God, were entitled to our interest and respect. But here Mr. Wells has been guilty of a trick of perversity which destroys much of the value of his book. Surely some imp of mischief must have guided his pen when he renounced the hard task of describing the growth of a soul and gave us this picture of the drug habit instead. We are reminded of the story of a man who got drunk every Saturday night and went to church with equal regularity on Sunday morning. When his clergyman reproached him on the score of inconsistency he replied, "Why, sir, you ought to be the last man to talk to me like that, for it is when I am drunk that I am certain that God is my Father." Mr. Wells's bishop reaches conviction in precisely the same way. He sees God face to face when he is intoxicated, not with vulgar spirits, but with a mysterious drug, the most golden of liquids with opalescent hues.

"It had been an act of courage, of rashness if you will, to take this draught. He was acutely introspective, ready for anything, for the most disagreeable or the most bizarre sensations. He was asking himself, Were his feet steady? Was his head swimming? His doubts glowed into assurance. Suddenly he perceived that he was sure of God."

On another occasion the author does not shrink from describing the sordid side of these visions of a drug-quickened mind. It is his wife, Lady Ella, who is speaking, as he emerges slowly from his stupor.

"'Dunk came to me in great distress. He said you were insensible and breathing heavily. I came. I realised. I told him to say nothing to any one, but to fetch me a tray with your breakfast. I have kept all the other servants away and I have waited here by you....Dunk is safe....You have been muttering and moving your head from side to side....' The bishop's mind was confused. He felt as though God must be standing just outside the room. 'I have failed in my duty,' he said. 'But I am very near to God.'"

While he is still in this unpleasant condition he goes on to confess "Our church is a vast hull. It is like the empty skin of a snake. God has gone out of it." All our sympathy is with Lady

Ella when she exclaims, "You have been uttering blasphemies."

When Mr. Wells described this disagreeable scene did he realise that he was linking his doctrine of God the invisible King with sordid vulgarity and doing his best to forge a permanent link of connection between the two things in the minds of his readers? It is unfortunately no passing freak of an inventive mind. It pervades the whole book. Drugs take the place of spiritual discipline as the Divine instrument of conversion. He might as well have described delirium tremens as the pathway to the kingdom of heaven.

For this reason 'The Soul of a Bishop,' which was clearly intended to give human and emotional interest to the more abstract treatment of 'God, the Invisible King,' is likely to create a suspicion that Mr. Wells is perhaps only playing with us after all. We cannot be surprised if some of his readers grow sceptical about the moral passion with which he preaches his new faith in the Divine Hero, when they find it associated with the nasty suggestion that the drug habit may be used in order to discover God. We believe, however, that this would be a mistake. In spite of its fatal blemish there are many arresting things in this book and not a few passages of real beauty and power. Perhaps its best service to us will be in the disquieting thoughts which it provokes. No sincere man in these days can be content simply to cling to the familiar routine, least of all in religion. If the secrets of many hearts could be revealed we should probably find that men of proved orthodoxy are beginning to question their creeds and their forms of worship as they have never done before. Is God dwelling in them and using them for the purposes of his kingdom? Are they, and they alone, adequate to express the strong emotions of self-sacrifice and loyalty and faith in the triumph of right, which are surging up in the hearts of men? We know exactly how the Bishop of Princhester felt when he wished that he could read the New Testament for the first time. "It was over-familiar. Everything latterly in his theology and beliefs had become over-familiar. It had all become mechanical and dead and unmeaning to his tired mind." With him too we have our oppressive moods, when we feel that much of the stately machinery of our religion is remote from reality, and begin to ask ourselves whether it is still serving the living needs of men.

"I see my futility. I see my vanity. But what am I to do?" the bishop exclaims. "The implications of yesterday bind me for the morrow. This is my world. This is what I am and what I am in. How can I save myself? How can I turn from these habits and customs and obligations to the service of the one true God? When I see myself, then I understand how it is with the others. All we priests and teachers are men caught in nets. I would serve God. Easily said? But how am I to serve God? How am I to help and forward His coming, to make myself part of His coming?"

In these words it is no longer the Mr. Wells of strange enchantments and magical drugs who speaks to us, but the Mr. Wells who has found salvation. It is at the peril of our souls that we refuse to listen to any sincere voice like this, which bids us accept all the risks to our own comfort and happiness as we fight our way to a deeper sense of moral reality in our service of God.

OUR OPENING DAY.

It had been duly announced, that first fixture of the season for the local foxhounds, and—well, "Business as usual, let's carry on!" we quoted to ourselves, and went off on foot to see the fun.

Fun? That's only a façon de parler. Other things apart, none of us are just of the funny age, but we recall the traditions of various sporting ancestors, and try to persuade ourselves that we ought to keep them up. I rather think we like doing it. Anyway, we went It wasn't so bad in one sense, the day was one of incomparable beauty, there was not the that proclaim a hunting morn; but we had what some of us liked better.

Southerly wind and cloudy sky

Following a night of heavy rain and wind that had stripped the trees of most of their remaining foliage, there had been a white frost. It had dropped a lacework of silver over the sodden grass, the fallen russet leaves. The morning rose, shrouded in mist, through which the cattle loomed larger than life, grazing here and there. Then the red sun shone through and scattered the vapour from about the wide silences of field and wood. Clear and even radiant they lay, disclosed in the mellow daylight. Only on the outskirts of the fields, or, perhaps, around some "lone thorn," ancient, fairy-haunted, grey-lichened, distorted, did a few rags of trailing grey cling still, adding I know not what of breathing mystery to the scene.

At this season our earth is currently supposed to be losing her every charm. But I don't know! Our wide, level outlook, with so little to be called picturesque about it, without a lake or river in sight, or even a hill that an easy ten minutes won't get you up—somehow it gains now. Perhaps an artist could explain something about the light, the colour-values of this wintry landscape, and how the gentle curves fit into the general scheme of things here; but would that make you love it any better?

The keynote of it all is peace, but it's a transfigured peace to-day. Why, our very roads, well-abused, rough, ill-kept.... this morning as we turn out of our own gates we are treading fairy paths. "For they're so dem'd moist (unpleasant, some would continue the quotation thus) that they reflect in their shining pools the gold of the sunshine, the deep, the unutterably lovely blue of the skies as if they had been transformed into mirrors to multiply beauty. Roads? And here is our own particular road-mender, busy with brush and shovel, but no gentle Michael Fairless is he, rather a sage of rough and bitter tongue.

"Have a paper, Mike?" and we hand him one; "they say we're getting the best of it."

"Sure, what else! why wouldn't we! Of course, them Jarmins will be bet! What men have they at this present?—only young schoolboys, and they sick and tired and hungry along wid all! Th'other soldiers were too old to run away, and all got took by the English; and look at the sort of men they're fighting! Them French is a very dangerous class of people, holy terrors, no less. I seen them meself over in England, in Hartlypool, fighting wid knives they'd be, till the po-lis would have to tip them over the quay-wall down into the water. That ud lave them cool; and them Injuns—afraid of nothing so they're not, and could fight all day on the smell of a greasy rag. Ay, indeed!" Mike snorted like a war-horse himself over these reflections.

"Well, we'd as good be pushing along. The hounds must be in the covert."

"Oh, ay, but in truth, yous have no call to be putting yourselves about for that! There'll be no hoont this day!" "Such an old Grimgrowdy!" we said, as we hurried onward to our favourite coign of vantage for these occasions. It is the sunny side of a bank along which waste grass and protruding tree-roots offer dry seats to the patient waiter on events. Before us lies the tranquil country-side, in the distance rises a dim, blue hill, where mighty Finn once hunted and drank deep. Suppose his spirit haunts it still, on what degenerate days does he brood! Why, even last year—

"There he is!"

"Where, where?"

"Sh—sh—sh." Wild horses wouldn't induce that lynx-eyed one to give a fox away, but she indicates a slim, graceful form crossing the wide pasture field in front of us with what looks a leisurely pace. Without fear or flurry, he just lopes along as if he understood it all, and was ready to play the game. "There must be a lot of the pack left behind in the covert! Look at them, straggling about all over the shop! Here's a hound just floundering along on his own—And where's the hunt itself?"

A red-coat appears from behind the wooded edge of the covert, then at irregular intervals, perhaps, a score of riders come charging along in the wake of the fox, already far ahead. They have almost a shamefaced air about them, and we — we turn for home. Where are the good old times gone? We used to feel rather wronged if less than 150, perhaps, 200 sportsmen didn't turn up. It was a gallant sight then. Mike came shambling round from behind a wall where he had been lighting his pipe.

"Sure, what did I tell yous? What comple-mint of min is there left to go hoont? Aren't the people getting very few everywhere wid this war! And the horses, glory be, to think of the fine, grand appearance there was last year upon them! You'd love to be looking at them. And all gone off. They tell me they're falling there like apples from a tree, and them that's not killed, living in want and hardship; them that never missed a meal, the same as a man like meself, would spend their time very pleasant and easy—sporting about. Off hunting Jarmins they are now, and, maybe, fitter for them, too, nor to be idling their time. I dunno will the weight of them ever come back?"

We didn't know, either, and as we plodded home we debated the point whether the ancient, almost sacred institution of fox-hunting is one of the things destined to disappear in this storm; but it seems a little thing now to bother over.

PATIENCE.

"Patience!"—cried one of those who ever scoff
At simple virtue and her service flout—
"'Tis but a mill to run Hope's waters off
And grind our own heart out!"

"True," qouth another, "he's but a machine
Who for endurance' sake endures the ill,
But how the ill assumes a sudden sheen
If Love but run the mill!"

WHY SHOULD A REASONABLE PERSON PRAY?

To the Editor of The Inquirer.

Sir,—The article of Dr. Sutherland in your current issue deals with a matter of prime importance for those who are in the van of progressive religion. I take it that the root idea of prayer is the appeal of one in need to one who has the power to supply the need. It is the hope to obtain, by supernatural means, from an outside source, help and benefit that cannot be obtained by natural means, by powers that we ourselves possess. Now all this is entirely altered for those who hold the most advanced religious views of to-day. We hold that it is derogatory to any worthy thought of God to imagine that the supply of our wants depends upon our asking or not asking for them. Also we believe that it is utterly unreasonable to expect that God, in order to gratify some private end of our own, will break a law that he himself has made. Again, we feel it is idle to ask God for what, if we are to have it at all, can only be obtained from ourselves. Oh, yes, Dr. Sutherland and the readers of The Inquirer will say, we all accept this; modern prayers do not consist of begging for benefits; "they would fall under one or another of these heads: expressions of reverence, gratitude, love, trust or aspiration." There certainly seems to be still a very true need for prayer, or what corresponds to prayer. As I have elsewhere said, "It is the main channel of communication between God and man. It is the summoning of our highest thoughts, emotions, hopes, resolves, for the highest ends; the quickening into life and motion of those unformed, latent elements that constitute the source and springs of high action. It is an energy of aspiration towards God."

But my main point here is to ask whether if our conception of prayer has been so radically changed, our forms of prayer do not also need more drastic change. The very word seems to need alteration. Communion, aspiration, adoration, these are not "prayer." The most modern of our forms of prayer, whether spoken or written, are still very largely framed to meet the old thought rather than the new. We still put up definite petitions for moral and spiritual benefits, knowing all the while that they will not descend upon us miraculously or even naturally from above or from any source unconnected with ourselves. I think we have to recognise that spiritual communion with God cannot be brought about directly, but only indirectly. We may have to learn that direct appeals to God are unsuitable forms of worship. And yet what other forms can be suggested? It may be they will be found in such means as the inspiration of the best music, vocal and instrumental; in seasons set apart for religious meditation; in the uplifting and stimulation produced by poetry and devotional literature and by the utterances of inspired preachers and teachers. May it not be that by such means, rather than by "prayer," the life of the spirit will be sustained and stimulated?—Yours, &c.,

P. E. Vizard.

To the Editor of The Inquirer.

Sir,—May I be permitted to state my views on this question? Mr. Sunderland's correspondent appears to be a believer in the omnipotence and omniscience of God in its strictest and most narrow sense, and practically to ignore any free will of his own. In your issue of November 11, 1916, I argued more fully than I now can, that we might regard God as being originally and essentially omnipotent and omniscient, but that he had endowed and entrusted human beings with a limited share of his life and power, sensitiveness and knowledge of good and evil, and with freedom and choice of action. By giving us these powers and freedom God must necessarily have deprived Himself of will to interfere with such freedom and of foreknowledge of our use of it. He cannot both give and retain the same thing. He cannot contradict Himself. Our freedom would otherwise be a sham and we should in reality merely be puppets with a false conviction of freedom. We must either be free or merely machines—there is no intermediate position. God chose freedom for us knowing it would work well in the end and make us infinitely superior to our mechanical inorganic surroundings. Thus alone can the original omnipotence and omniscience of God be reconciled with human free will. How, then, does this bear upon the question of prayer? God's will is that we should do right, but our freedom gives us power to do right or wrong. It also makes us morally responsible for our choice, which we could not otherwise be. We are entrusted, and the privilege creates the moral obligation to be trustworthy. We therefore pray for strength and guidance to do the Will of God which, being good, is for our good. And, as Mr. Sunderland points out, prayer is also worship and communion. Our Lord's model prayer contains no petition for any variation of the Divine laws in our favour.—Yours, &c.,

G. M. Herbert.

MEMORIAL NOTICES.

THE REV. JOHN HUNTER, D.D.

It is with great regret we record the death last Saturday of the Rev. John Hunter, D.D., after a long and painful illness. For some years past Dr. Hunter suffered from heart attacks which compelled him to take long periods of rest at Nauheim, and finally under medical orders brought to a conclusion his ministry in Glasgow. After his retirement from the labours of a settled pastorate a few devoted friends in London arranged that he should take Sunday morning service at the Æolian Hall whenever his health permitted.

John Hunter was born in Aberdeen, trained for the Congregational ministry at Spring Hill College, Birmingham (now Mansfield College, Oxford), and accepted the pastorate of Salem Chapel, York, in 1871. While at college he, with other students of that time, came very much under the influence of George Dawson, whose ministry they often attended—much to the annoyance of their tutors. For Hunter it was the beginning of an intellectual and spiritual movement which ended in his becoming one of the foremost exponents of Liberal Christianity.

From York the young minister migrated in 1882 to Hull, and from thence to Glasgow in 1887, where he remained, with the exception of a short interlude in London, during the rest of his active career. All over the country his services gradually came to be in much request. Denominational ties he held very lightly. He was as ready to preach in Unitarian as in Presbyterian pulpits. Twice he visited the United States (1907 and 1910), where he was greatly appreciated. In 1876 he was associated with Charles Beard, J. A. Picton, Edward Clodd, Mark Wilks, P. T. Forsyth, Herbert Rix, Prebendary Rogers ("'Hang theology' Rogers!") Joseph Wood, and others in calling the celebrated "Leicester Conference"—a conference "of those who feel that agreement in theological opinion can no longer be held to be essential to religious communion." The first meeting of the Conference—at which Dr. Hunter conducted a devotional service—was held during the autumnal meetings of the Congregational Union at Leicester in 1877. Dr. Hunter's association with "heretics" brought him into a good deal of disfavour with the authorities of the Union, and he was henceforth carefully ignored in all denominational affairs. But, backed up as he was by a large, faithful and enthusiastic congregation, Hunter went quietly on his chosen way. In Scotland, strange to say, he found a readier acceptance than in England. For Scotland, under the influence of men like George Macdonald, Principal Tulloch, Dr. Story, and the two Cairds, had turned its face from Calvinism towards a more humane, rational, and Christ-like interpretation of religion, so that it became possible for a man like Hunter to preach in University pulpits and in parish churches. No more potent voice was heard in Scotland for many years than that of Hunter. His short ministry at King's Weigh House Church, London (1901-4), while full of promise, was too much hampered by irksome conditions which he was powerless to overcome. Yet it may be said that from its beginning to its close Hunter's was a noble ministry, full of prophetic fervour, quickening power and enlightened thought, and with a broad outlook far beyond the limits of the particular portion of the Church of God in which he was born and bred. He received the honorary degree of D.D. from the University of Glasgow in 1893. Among his publications may be mentioned 'Devotional Services for Public Worship,' 'Hymns of Faith and Life,' 'A Plea for a Worshipful Church,' 'Angels of God, and other Sermons,' and a later volume 'De Profundis Clamavi,' which is typical both of the substance and the manner of his teaching in the maturity of his powers.

An Appreciation.

Dr. John Hunter was essentially the Preacher. In effect he said "This one thing I do, I preach." He concentrated all his gifts and studies on the pulpit. While he had many other interests, and was brought by them into contact with many aspects of life and a wide variety of human affairs, everything was subordinated to his God-given vocation as a minister of religion. He knew well his own limitations. He had no gift for public affairs; committees wearied him; skill in organisation was not his; platform oratory was for him an impossibility. In fact he had but few of the gifts and graces of the popular speaker. With no commanding voice or presence; having to contend with the drawback of a strong Aberdonian accent; tied always to his MS.; destitute of any of the tricks of the trade—the tear in the voice, the dramatic whisper, the studied gesture, &c.—he yet won for himself a distinguished place among the foremost preachers of the day. Liberal religion had in Dr. Hunter one of its greatest ministers. The lessons he had learned from Frederick Denison Maurice, Baldwin Brown, J. A. Picton, Dr. Martineau, Professor Harnack, Robertson of Brighton, became through him the treasured possessions of large and devoted congregations. To these lessons he added a spiritual fervour all his own. Perhaps the first thing that struck the hearer about his preaching was its intensity. The extreme rapidity of his delivery (200 words a minute) made him sometimes difficult to follow, but the flame and passion of the preacher never failed to move the heart and touch the conscience. Whether in Hull or Glasgow, London or New York, he carried men back to the large and simple religion of the Gospel, giving them an interpretation of Christianity answering to the deepest needs of the age in which they lived, and in profound accord with the progress of thought and freedom.

An equally striking feature of his preaching was its vivid consciousness of God. Here was evidently a man to whom the Divine Presence was the Reality of all realities. Men were awed and hushed as he opened to their eyes the spiritual glory of a Life enthroned above a visionary world—a Life which is love and truth, to be at one with which is the heart's final joy. "Have faith in God" was one of his favourite texts, and his endeavour was to make faith in God a reasonable, inspiring and gladdening thing as he dwelt in glowing language on all that which means God—the spirit of purity, truth, love, righteousness, peace, which are also the life of the soul, and the law and order which are the basis and the glory of creation. That he did not accept the scholastic terminology of the creeds of the Church concerning God, that he discarded much of it as no longer adequate to the progress of thought and knowledge, gave much offence to various ecclesiastical authorities. His preaching brought down on him many charges of heresy, but of these he took no heed. All through his public life he cared only for the truth and faithfulness of his ministry, and not at all for the poor thing the religious world calls "success." Men listened to him who turned away from the conventional religious teaching of the churches, feeling that he was a voice, not an echo—a prophet and not a pedant. At Glasgow, where he ministered to a congregation of high culture, capable of appreciating so strong an intellect and so sanctified a spirit, his influence was felt far and wide. He won to a remarkable degree the affection and loyalty of a church having on its roll more than a thousand members, many of them among the most influential men of the city and the University.

Only second to his passion for preaching was his care for the worship of the church, its service of prayer and praise. His was eminently a devotional mind. Wherever he conducted the service he created an atmosphere of reverence which to many was even more helpful than his preaching. He did much—perhaps more than any other man of his time—to abolish the too frequent slovenliness of Nonconformist services, and to emphasise the supreme importance of worship. The various editions of his 'Book of Devotional Services' testify to a wide knowledge of the liturgical utterances of the Catholic Church, and to a life-long desire and effort to "find words at once large enough and deep enough to express the common worship of Christian hearts." He knew that the best prayers are those which express in simple language the simple needs, aspirations, trusts and fidelities of the religious and Christian soul. Amid the bodily pain and weakness of his later years when he was often laid aside for months together from preaching, the knowledge that his book had contributed to the devoutness and dignity of public worship was to him a source of great happiness. He provided a beautiful companion volume to his 'Devotional Services' in compiling the well-known 'Hymns of Faith and Life'—one of the earliest and one of the best of the hymn-books of the Liberal Church, which, casting aside hymns written to express scholastic and sectarian interpretations of the Christian facts and truths, sought out those which give simple poetic expression to the fundamental experiences and persuasions of the soul, with its loyalties, affections and aspirations. He held that to make hymn, canticle or anthem the medium of dogmatic and theological statements about which men and churches differ is to pervert the worship of God into the worship of our own crude opinions and definitions.

Hunter was a widely read man and knew how to make use of the great masters in literature to light up his appeal. Also he had a consummate acquaintance with both the letter and the spirit of the Bible, bringing out of that treasure-house things new as well as old. Above all he knew the book of the human heart, and men listening to him felt that a brother-man who understood them and believed in them and in their possibilities of good was speaking to them out of his own experiences. His language rang always with that note of profound personal conviction which more than anything else carries conviction to the heart. Of him it may be said, "He was a burning and a shining light who made clear the way for many human feet to the hills whence cometh our help." He was a broad churchman of the best type, with an outlook far beyond all denominational lines. Sectarianism was a thing he utterly eschewed, and the unity of the spirit in the bond of peace and righteousness of life was the thing which he most dearly loved and prized.

Dr. Forsyth's Tribute.

A funeral service, which was largely attended, was held in the King's Weigh House Church on Wednesday afternoon prior to the interment in the churchyard of the Hampstead Parish Church. The service was conducted by the Rev. H. Martin, Dr. Hunter's brother-in-law, and the following tribute to his memory was spoken by Principal Forsyth, one of his oldest and most intimate friends.

"We are here for a tribute and not an estimate—to honour a dear and brilliant memory in the light of an immortal faith and hope. There in our midst lies silent one of the most eloquent tongues of his generation, moved by a soldier soul of manly power and tenderness. He was one of the very greatest preachers of Victorian Liberalism—the greatest master we had of manuscript preaching. And both his bold preaching and his humble prayer rested on a sound foundation and severe training of professional knowledge. He had great gifts, but from first to last he worked always as if he had none. He was a furious toiler both before the pulpit and in it. He had the austerity of a rich nature, but there was the austerity, which did not commend him to all. It is not easy nor common to combine that moral passion with culture like his—moral passion of height and range to be a public power. His was not a religion which had moral interests and sequels attached to it, but one intrinsically and overwhelmingly moral, from the heart and to the end moral—mystically moral. It was the religion of moral redemption, the redemption of a moral universe. The religion he most dreaded could not rise to feel that human history is one great epic, and that the epic of Humanity is the struggle for the kingship of God in the Cross of Christ as the crisis of the moral world. He was impatient, and even intractable, like some of the first figures of faith, in the face of moral stupidity sicklied with religious sentiment and easy egoism. His prophetic soul rose against crude sentiment, yet he never lost warm feeling for men; and he was rich in spiritual feeling, deep, solemn, and shy. You know what he strove to do for public worship and its reverence. He was so acquainted with God that he could never be familiar with Him. How much was meant for that side of him by his long walks on Swiss or Scottish hills accompanied only by the Book of Psalms! A prophetic mystic he was of the moral stamp, the historic mind, and the instinct of the holy war. That note of austere passion came chiefly from his great master Maurice, with streaks of Carlyle; and it lost him the crowd (as it did with our Lord). He did not always get quite alongside the religious mind of his own communion because he had found his soul outside it, as it then was.

"We leave him to his rest. But for such as he sleep would be no rest—this fiery spirit with the sweeping wing. He was finely mellowed in the last few years, but never quenched. For such souls rest is the full-blown energies of heaven. It is a share in the incessant resurrection of Him whose kingship is the energy of the world, and whose fullness and freedom are their own rest."

MISS M. C. MARTINEAU.

It is with deep regret that we have to announce the death of Miss Constance Martineau, which took place at her home at Letchworth last week. We hope to publish a tribute to her memory next week from the pen of Dr. P. H. Wicksteed

WEEKLY NOTES.

The following letter speaks for itself. It is from a chaplain of a convalescent depot in a remote part of France. He says: "Everything seems to show that my unfortunate compatriots will have to pass at least another winter in exile. I am, therefore, compelled to make another appeal to your benevolent charity to send me some clothing, especially for women and children (for there are no more men here). I have again extended the radius of my visits, so that I have a greater number of people dependent on my help. At H—— I have found 40 children and 12 women and 2 old men in a most miserable state. The government does its best to succour them, but it cannot prevent the price of living becoming higher and higher, and there is nothing left from their allowance to spend on clothing. Anything you can send me for these people will be extremely welcome." I shall be grateful for any contributions of suitable clothing to send to this chaplain.

The tennis season is just closing, and many people must have balls which they no longer want. I should be very glad of them for the Belgians.

Rose Allen.

NIGHT WORK IN THE BRADFORD KHAKI CLUB.

The Rev. Thomas Paxton, minister of Chapel Lane Chapel, Bradford, is the secretary of the Bradford Khaki Club, and has thrown himself into the work with the greatest enthusiasm. He is particularly interested in the night work, which is very arduous, and involves the welcoming, feeding, and dispatching to their homes of weary soldiers from the front arriving in the early hours of the morning at the Midland Station. He related some of his experiences in this connection recently to a representative of The Yorkshire Observer :—

The most striking thing [he said] is the extraordinary depth of gratitude shown by the men, and this in itself is ample reward for the work and the late hours. Yes, I have seen some curious incidents—humorous, pathetic, and sometimes tragic. It is always rather pathetic to see the women—wives, mothers, and sweethearts—waiting on the station, waiting sometimes for hours, to meet the men coming in by the late trains, and when the man does arrive to see the way he is embraced, kit and all. Once when I was meeting the 3.5 A.M. I saw an elderly woman and three younger women on the platform. When the train arrived a man from the front came and greeted them, and they all burst into tears. I asked the eldest woman what was the matter, and she replied: "I sent three sons out to France, and this is the only one that has returned. The other two are dead. My husband has also died while they have been away. Two of these women are the widows of my dead sons; the other is the wife of the boy who has just come in."

A soldier from the front once stayed the night at the club. We were rather surprised at this, for his home was close by. I learned the reason next morning, when I wished him a pleasant journey and hoped that he would find everyone well at home. He burst into tears and produced a telegram informing him that his wife was dead. The reason he stayed the night at the club was that he felt he could not go home until daylight.

There is, however, a more pleasant side to the work, continued Mr. Paxton. One man arrived by a late train looking weary and haggard. He drank three cups of tea, dropped his pack of 90 lb., and fell on the couch asleep. He awoke an hour afterwards, drank another three cups of tea, and then announced that he felt better. The motorists, too, whose work I consider beyond all praise, have their share of the interest. The men find it hard to believe that all this is being done for them without any charge. One man came from the front, and was met at the station by his father, mother, wife, and three friends. There was some difficulty in taking this large party home, until finally one of the Motor Volunteers agreed to take the man and his father and mother, and the officer decided to take the rest of the party. When they arrived home the father offered the driver a shilling for his kindness. In vain the Volunteer protested that he was not allowed to accept gratuities, the father was importunate. Finally the driver said that his officer would be there in a minute, and he advised the father to see him. The last he saw was the father arguing with the officer about the acceptance of the shilling.

Sometimes some unexpected difficulties arise. On one occasion an Australian soldier came in on a visit to some friends at Oakenshaw. He had the address, but as he had never been in England before, and as it was pitch dark, the problem was to find the house. The motorist knocked up the people in three houses, and discussions took place through the bolted doors. The fourth house, however, was the right one, and after the usual discussion, the bolts were slowly drawn, and four maiden ladies in white embraced their friend from across the sea.

Concluding the interview, Mr. Paxton said that he had been urged by many people to publish a book of his experiences at the Khaki Club after the war is over. If he does the volume will be an interesting record of some fine work done in Bradford for the soldiers at the front, and for the wounded men at home.

ANGLO-AMERICAN FRIENDSHIP.

Mr. H. S. Perris, secretary of the Sulgrave Board in connection with the British Peace Centenary Committee, has just sailed for America, where he will visit the chief cities in the United States during the next few months for the purpose of furthering the objects of the movement which he represents. It will be remembered that when the outbreak of war made it necessary for the National Committees in the United States, Great Britain and Canada to postpone, for a time, the celebration of One Hundred Years of Peace among English-speaking Peoples, it was decided that efforts should be concentrated upon the creation of an international foundation intended to perpetuate their purpose and carry on their work. The name chosen for this foundation was "The Sulgrave Institution," Sulgrave Manor, Northants, which was purchased by the British Peace Centenary Committee at a cost of fifty thousand dollars, being the ancestral home of the Washington family in England. It is hoped that the activities of the Committee for which Mr. Perris is acting will do a good deal to foster Anglo-American friendship in preparation for the educational and social work that will be necessary when the war is over.

SOUTHEND HOLIDAY HOME.

Mr. A. Stephen Noel, Hon. Secretary of the London Sunday School Society, writes as follows from 75 Hainault Road, Leytonstone: "May I be permitted to use a little of your valuable space for the purpose of assisting the work of the London Sunday School Society at their Home at Southend. It will be readily understood that conditions are not such as to give great help to a movement which seeks to provide a place of rest and quiet for London Sunday school workers, and the greatest difficulty is being experienced in tiding over this critical period. No appeal is being made for funds, though help in this direction is sorely needed and will be welcomed. We are simply asking, at the moment, that any minister, layman, or social worker who knows of any person who, at a cost of £1 1s. or thereabouts per week, would take up residence at the Home during the winter, will communicate with me. Such assistance will help to keep the Home going. May I also ask correspondents to note that after the 27th inst. my address will be 42 Woodcote Road, Wanstead, E.11.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Adelaide, South Australia.—A Social Gathering to commemorate the Diamond Jubilee of the opening of the Unitarian Christian Church in Adelaide was held in the Church Hall on Friday evening, July 6. There was a large attendance, and the evening's proceedings were of an interesting character. The Honourable F. S. Wallis, M.L.C., and Mr. R. H. Kay (son of Mr. William Kay, one of the founders of the Church), delivered addresses concerning the early history of the Church, and their personal reminiscences covering life-long association with the Church. The Rev. Wilfred Harris also spoke on the Unitarian doctrines, and an enjoyable musical programme was carried out by Mesdames Taylor, H. and W. Furniss, and the Misses Dittmar and Furness. On the following Sunday special services were held in the Church, the attendances being very good and the services helpful. An interesting feature of the morning service was the presence of a party of seventeen Unitarians from the Sister Church at Shady Grove, who had journeyed by charabanc from about thirty miles distant in order to be present. The history of the Unitarian Church in Adelaide extends over sixty years. In 1855 a number of gentlemen met with the object of forming a Church in this State, and six of them —Messrs. Robert and William Kay, E. M. Martin, J. Howard Clark, A. S. Clark and Alfred Simpson—guaranteed £400 a year for the first year, and obtained the services of the Rev. John Crawford Woods, who arrived in Adelaide from England in September, 1855. On the first two Sundays after Mr. Woods' arrival, services were held in the private residences of Mrs. Francis Clark at Hazelwood, near Burnside, and Mr. E. M. Martin at Norwood. Arrangements were then made to hold services at Green's Auction Mart in the City, and meetings were held there for about two years. In December, 1856, the foundation of the present building was laid by the Honourable John Baker. The first service in the Church was held on July 5, 1857. Mr. Woods conducted the services with marked ability and success over a period of thirty-five years, excepting for two years when he revisited the old Country, and his place in the pulpit was taken by Mr. C. L. Whitham, afterwards Inspector of Schools. Mr. Woods was succeeded by the Rev. R. C. Dendey, and afterwards by the Rev. John Reid, of Melbourne, and the present minister, the Rev. Wilfred Harris, M.A.

London: Essex Hall.—The Rev. Copeland Bowie's many friends will be interested to hear that he is taking a well-earned holiday in Scotland, although, by the time these words are in print, he will be busy again on behalf of the cause of liberal religion on the other side of the Border. In a recent letter from Aboyne, he says: "My wife and I are having a most restful holiday on Deeside. The weather is all that we could desire, and the combination of river, forest, and mountain offers a delightful variety of scenes for anyone with legs to walk. I start with meetings in a few days at Aberdeen, Dundee, and Kirkaldy, then to Manchester where Mr. Tarrant will join me, and back in London on September 28.

Newport, Isle of Wight.—The Rev. W. H. Drummond paid a friendly visit on behalf of the Sustentation Fund last Sunday. At the evening service he gave some of his personal impressions of the work of the Y.M.C.A. in France. The following evening there was a social meeting of the congregation. Mr. Leslie Chatfeild Clarke presided, and Mr. Drummond gave an address on the work of the Belgian Hospital Fund. A cordial vote of thanks for the help which his visit had brought to a rather isolated congregation was passed on the motion of the minister, the Rev. J. Ruddle.

Southampton.—The Rev. Victor Moody, speaking at the last of a series of Adult School lectures on 'Reconstruction' at the Kell Hall on Sunday morning, September 9, dealt with the relation of ethical theory to social facts, and emphasised the necessity of some supernational machinery being brought into play which would remove the menace of war. The spiritual element in nationality was an unspeakably precious thing, but in the political sphere some means of reconciling national antagonisms had to be found, or civilisation must inevitably break up in the devastating process of successive wars. Two paths had been brought into view by the present conflict—the one, absolutism, the habit of viewing ourselves and our personal interests as ends in themselves, existing in their own absolute right; the other, federalism, which consisted in viewing life as a vast organic whole, in which every part was interrelated with every other part, and the interests of each were so remarkably correlated as to be also the interests of the whole. Ethical reconstruction consisted in the working out of this principle and its practical application in every sphere of human activity, a difficult task demanding the best thought of all if it was to be successful. Absolutism expressed itself in many ways, in the theory of absolute monarchy and of unrestricted individualism in commerce, in certain claims of ecclesiasticism, in "sectionalism" in industry, and the menacing claims of wealth to be freed from the heavy financial burden which the nations must bear after the war. The absolutist principle had been challenged as a result of the war, which was now gradually transforming itself into an ethical rather than a national struggle, between the opposing ideas of absolutism, or autocracy, and federalism or internationalism. The speaker went on to develop the theory of federalism, which has its counterpart in the co-operation of every part of the human body for the welfare of the whole, and showed how it must be applied to the problem of labour, to education, and to religion. Ethical and social reconstruction were one, and there was no morality or religion apart from the practical morality and religion of the common life.

OUT OF THE HEART OF THE STORM.

BY

Rev. HENRY GOW, B.A.

The sermons are written by one who believes with President Wilson that "right is more precious than peace," and that no personal sorrow or loss should discourage us and turn us from our firm resolve to overthrow the Prussian autocracy. They are written too in the growing confidence that faith in God and in the supremacy of Love has become more and not less possible and real through the conflict and agony of recent times.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

The address for our Belgian Hospital Fund, to which cheques and parcels of clothing should be sent, is Mrs. Bernard Allen, 14 Gainsborough Gardens, Hampstead, N.W.3.

THE news from the Western front this week is excellent. In modern warfare this persistent advance from point to point in face of the most stubborn resistance is better evidence of overwhelming strength than a sensational victory. The last operations have been carried out with extraordinary success, and most of the high ground is now in our hands. This is the work for which our men have gone into the army. They know that they must beat the Germans soundly if there is to be peace and friendliness in the world, and they press on. We think with gratitude and admiration of their courage and success.

THERE are many signs that the Germans are getting very nervous From a political point of view they have become jumpy, and the air is thick with rumours especially in regard to Belgium. It has been stated in several quarters that they are prepared to evacuate Belgium; and some people already are beginning to say that we are within sight of gaining our chief object in the war. But let us beware of all manœuvres which are intended to cause controversy in the camp of the Allies. No proposal about Belgium has any value unless it is unconditional and accompanied by a promise to pay for all the material damage done to her. Neither can we accept any concession as a move in a game of barter, for which we must pay by lowering our terms in other directions. There are other essential terms of peace as they affect the interests of France and ourselves and the security of democratic government in the world which must be insisted upon to the letter, in spite of appeals to our magnanimity or protestations of virtue which may emanate from Germany. No judgment would be too severe for the guardians of freedom should they in some moment of weak good-nature betray their trust.

THERE is little to be said about the replies of Austria and Germany to the Papal Note. They offer nothing, and their lip service to exalted ideals of virtue will deceive nobody. The only matter of importance is their adhesion to a policy of limited armaments, which has little practical value at the moment, but no doubt it will be remembered when international arrangements for the security of peace come up for discussion, for it is from them that the chief guarantees will be required. So far as it goes it is a healthy sign if Germany under the shadow of impending disaster has begun even to play with these ideas.

MEANWHILE President Wilson and his Government are determined that there shall be no doubt about the stark moral issues of the conflict. They have accumulated a mass of evidence upon Germany's methods of treacherous intrigue and shameless corruption, and it is of a most damning character. Instead of publishing it en bloc, they have adopted the terribly effective method of instalments, in order to rouse public opinion whenever there is any sign of its growing jaded. Following the revelations in the Argentine we have had a horrible glimpse this week into the methods pursued in Roumania. Germany has cultivated the art of the poisoner with a callous precision undreamed of by the most shameless of mediæval despots. For long these stories seemed to us like the fairy-tales of crime, and our better feelings revolted against belief in them. But there they stand, written in indelible ink, in the Newgate calendar of universal history.

A DECISION of some importance to recent recruits to the ministry was given in the King's Bench Division last week. It removes any right to exemption from men who have been ordained since they became liable to be called up under the Military Service Act. The decision has called forth some adverse criticism, but to us it seems to be entirely reasonable. Thirty days after the passing of the Act certain men became liable to military service on the ground of their age and citizenship, and it seems on the face of it a ridiculous contention that they should be able to contract out of their legal obligation by the voluntary act of submitting themselves to ordination. It remains to be seen whether the military authorities will press their advantage and call up all young men who have become ministers since the Act came into force in March, 1916. Apparently they will be quite within their rights if they decide to do so.

WE are sorry to see that the Dean of Manchester in a letter to The Manchester Guardian has indulged in what we can only describe as a thoughtless gibe at the splendid work which is being carried on in the Huts of the Y.M.C.A. This talk about "the work of a professional grocer" is all nonsense. The present writer has had excellent opportunities of observing the life of the Huts in France over a wide area. There is rough work and drudgery of course, and it is good to see our doctors of divinity living a hard life and giving all their strength to lowly tasks of human service. But for the man who knows how to use them the opportunities of human fellowship and mutual influence are quite unique. We wish that we could persuade every minister to take his turn. It would make our stay-at-homes who prefer their own comfortable grooves into new men. It would quicken all their work with fresh vision and purpose, and give to the whole Church a sense of boundless opportunity in the days when the boys come home. We understand that at present many of the huts are understaffed and there is a great need of volunteers for the coming winter.

THE MORAL FACTOR.

We were prepared for some of our readers to dissent from what we wrote last week about the proposal to hold an international conference of the Churches in the interests of peace; but we hardly expected such a complete vindication of our argument as is contained in a letter which we publish to-day. Of course the vindication is quite unconscious. The letter is intended to be an exposure of our own lack of religious principle, but the writer by the vagueness of his own language only reveals his inability to grapple with the question in a practical way and to meet our arguments with opposing facts. We were not dealing with the pointless proposition that some Germans may be as good as some Englishmen, but with a definite proposal to promote the cause of peace by means of an international conference of Christian Churches. There is here no question of a pleasant meeting of a few friendly people who are conscious of their fundamental agreements, but of a congress sufficiently representative of religion in all lands to exercise a powerful influence upon the politics of the world. For that purpose there must be certain fundamental agreements, for religious phrases will have no binding force apart from the verdicts of conscience and common standards of goodness. But at the present moment these moral agreements do not exist, and without them an international congress would be limited to an attempt to conceal its helplessness under high-sounding language about brotherhood and peace. An essay in moral rhetoric on the lines of Germany's answer to the Pope would do nothing to heal our wounds. We do not get rid of the ugly facts of the world and of its towering and successful wickedness by pretending that they do not exist.

Our suggestion that the Kaiser is one of the representative Christians in Germany must be taken quite seriously. To millions of his people he is the symbol not only of their political loyalty but of the religion of valour as well. For him and for them Christianity is simply the obedient patron of aggressive ideals, which become right if they have force enough to succeed. This is one of the tragic facts which governs the whole situation, and wise men whose hearts are given to the cause of God and humanity in the world must have the courage to take the full measure of its strength, and then to rouse themselves to deathless struggle against it.

It is just the failure to recognise the presence of this sharp moral opposition which makes the emotional appeal of some religious men so thin and unsatisfying at the present time. For more than three years an apocalypse of evil has been unrolled before our astonished eyes. As seal after seal has been broken we have gazed into an inferno where the mystery of wickedness has mocked at our faith and sometimes almost unnerved us. We can no longer drug ourselves with meek platitudes about the goodness of human nature. We know that the heart of man is desperately wicked, not only the hearts of our enemies when they seek to enslave the world and commit insensate crimes against justice and mercy, but our own hearts as well in their weakness and vacillation, their selfishness and folly. It is in the light of this apocalypse of evil that our faith is being tested. Unless religion can supply us with some sovereign remedy, in face of this new conviction of the reality of evil, it will disappear, like human breath upon the chill autumn air. And no remedy can be found unless men are prepared for the obedience of great and decisive action. We must commit ourselves, as the soldier commits himself when he joins the army, and there must be no looking back and no weakening compromises in thought or desire until the ends of righteousness are won. The first business of religion is not to paint pleasant pictures of the future but to reveal the presence of the God of judgment in the midst of our heart, and to arm us for conflict against every form of evil under his banner.

At the present time the religious conscience, while retaining all its sensitiveness for our private and hidden faults, has to try to direct political judgment and to give simple and binding verdicts upon public affairs. It cannot retire into some shadowland of neutrality owing to the confusion of the times and renounce the burden of deliberate choice. For it is no question of misunderstanding between people of like mind and purpose, who have been misled by the wicked devices of their rulers. The existence of small groups of dissentient people either in Germany or among ourselves does not alter in any practical way the grouping of forces with which we have to deal. There is an irreconcilable conflict between two types of national spirit. Let the meticulous critic make what corrections he likes, it remains true that Germany as a whole stands for domination and the unscrupulous methods of the will to power, and that we and our Allies as a whole stand for freedom and the rights of small peoples and international goodwill. Behind Germany there is the force of the German people, with all their disciplined energy concentrated upon the desire to grow big by crushing or exploiting other nations. Behind ourselves and our Allies stand our peoples, aflame with anger against brutal power, cherishing for themselves and all the world universal ideals of justice and brotherhood and peace. In no conflict of the past has the moral antagonism been so incapable of compromise, and religion only betrays its ineffectual weakness when it refuses to take sides. It is a simple act of piety to rely upon the help of God and his righteousness when we band ourselves together to thwart the cunning devilries of lust and greed in our own cities. Why then should we hesitate to take "God wills it" as our watchword when we go into battle against the seducer of the virtue of the world?

In all this there is nothing that has not been clear to most of us through these years of conflict, nothing that has not been written here many times already in the effort to keep the issue clear before our eyes and to turn to flight the armies of alien fears which lay siege to tired and doubting hearts. But we need to listen again to a plain word concerning our duty now in these critical days, when the whole future of the world depends upon our unbending steadfastness and our refusal to be deceived by any of the blandishments of the wolf in sheep's clothing. The enemy is beginning to waver; the armed strength in which he put his trust is crumbling day by day; he will soon be ready, if he can deceive us with soft words, to march away with the honours of war and a large share of the booty. Such an end would leave us with the bitter disgrace of moral defeat. We should have compromised, as the sentimentalist wants us to do, with the evil thing and left it unconquered and unashamed. True-hearted men, for whom loyalty to the austere will of God is never weakened by their desire for the piping days of peace, will fight on with fresh ardour as the conflict draws to its close. This war, cost what it may in human agony, must end in a crowning victory for Right, a victory which will be recalled in all the future ages of the world as a triumphant vindication of the righteousness of God. Then, when the cruel menace has been removed and a new foundation has been well and truly laid, we may set our hands to the long task of rebuilding on stronger and fairer lines the ruined temple of justice, brotherhood and peace.

WHY SHOULD A REASONABLE PERSON PRAY?

To the Editor of THE INQUIRER.

SIR,—The issues of this discussion on prayer are of the most vital importance to those who uphold the validity of religious beliefs. But are we not becoming almost painfully intellectual? Your correspondents seem to disparage "petitionary" prayer, and to argue that true prayer consists of communion, aspiration, and meditation. I see little to distinguish this attitude from ancient Stoicism and modern Positivism. It is a position, of course, which aims at being entirely logical and entirely reverent. It is the position of many thoughtful, noble-minded men and women, whose inmost thoughts about God are revealed in biographies. But what does it come to? "God is good, therefore we need not pray." Strange to say, this inverts the attitude of Jesus. Jesus contended, "God is good, therefore pray." "Ask and it shall be given you, seek and ye shall find." It seems to me that this somewhat austere attitude with regard to prayer can only be reached by leaving out of account, or by underestimating, the power and the implications of human emotions and intuitions. I thought that Bergson and others had restored the somewhat neglected emotions to their true place, when men seek to estimate the forces which govern and inspire human nature. Even Herbert Spencer, an apostle of the intellect, seems to argue that the emotions are primary; logic limps slowly after. To disparage science, intellect, and logic is obviously irrational. To disparage the emotions is just as irrational. People pray because their emotions prompt them to do so.

If we are not to indulge in petitionary prayer, then we shall have to censorise in our private and public prayers every sentence which is of the nature of a petition. There will not be much left. We should soon have arrived at a prayerless religion, scarcely distinguishable from humanitarianism, or from an ethical society devoted to "auto-suggestion." True, we cannot expect God to deflect the flying bullet, in order that the life of some one dear to us may be saved. The world would soon become a chaos if every petition were faithfully answered. But are we not to obey the great instinctive impulse to pray for safety or relief or restoration, when we are in trouble or in danger? The attitude which says: "God is good, therefore do not pray," may be entirely reverent. But it seems to me to be still more reverent to say: "God is good, therefore, let us pray." I cannot think of a good, wise, and merciful Being, ever anxious that his children should always be making a painstaking choice of phraseology before offering their prayers to Him. I should think that His Fatherly heart would be more gratified by the simple, natural outpourings of the child-like heart, praying in obedience to a great emotional impulse, earnestly asking for help and guidance, trustfully hoping, and yet saying: "Nevertheless, not my will, but Thine be done."—Yours, &c.,

WHY SHOULD A REASONABLE PERSON PRAY?

To the Editor of THE INQUIRER.

SIR,—Dr. Sunderland's article makes no direct allusion to the use of prayer as intercession on behalf of others. We have first to determine whether prayer is to be regarded merely as a means of self-culture or as a real working force bringing things to pass outside of and beyond our own personality. If, in some mysterious manner, it is possible for men to strive with God and prevail, then intercessory prayer may well be a ministry of at least equal value with that of preaching, teaching or social service. To those who approach religion from the side of pure reason, this view of prayer will, no doubt, savour of superstition; God advances to great ends along lines of inviolable law, and it is impertinence to think that he requires or will be moved by our petitions. But those whose idea of God arises out of experience and who have found, or rather been found by a God "down in the dust," will be little perturbed by these considerations. They have found that this God both hears and answers prayer and they are willing to trust that instinct which prompts them to pray for their friends. If God asks our co-operation for the bringing in of his kingdom, he may also use our prayers for the winning of souls, as the mother of St. Augustine found. Perhaps we may no longer offer "prayers for rain," or even for the bodily safety of our friends, since this may not be expedient for them, but we may surely pray that "their faith may not fail," and that they may be "kept from the evil." We have to-day a growing sense of the sovereignty and uniqueness of life among the energies of the universe, and in prayer, especially in "wrestling," intercessory prayer, living men believe themselves to be in effectual touch with a living God. Are we to remain outside the experience and declare its impossibility from a priori reasons? Might it not be wiser first to try it for ourselves? I refrain from quoting King Arthur.—Yours, &c.,

IS AN INTERNATIONAL CONGRESS OF THE CHURCHES POSSIBLE?

To the Editor of THE INQUIRER.

SIR,—May I express the profound disappointment which must be shared by many of your readers with the editorial attitude of the journal which represents our religious body on questions affecting the moral relationships of belligerent states? This is exemplified in the two paragraphs in your issue of September 22, in which you deal with a suggestion put forward by The Challenge for an international conference of Christian bodies "to discuss ways and means of resisting the pride and passion of war, of promoting the temper that makes for peace, and of strengthening belief in the unity of all believers in Christ." Beautiful phrases, you admit, but apparently they derive their beauty from some source other than an appeal to our highest ideals, for, you say, the war has its roots in fundamental moral disagreements, and we cannot meet "representative Christians from the belligerent countries like the Kaiser and the Austrian Cardinals" without reference to the rights and wrongs of the war. We do not, you say, hasten the advent of spiritual unity by these attempts to create fellowship without looking closely into moral agreements. That the war is the result of moral disagreements is no doubt true, but will you seriously contend that these disagreements correspond exactly with the belligerent divisions of the nations? It is an easy and comforting attitude of mind to some, perhaps, to assume that all the peoples of the Allies are moved by a passion for righteousness, and all the peoples of our enemies solely by selfish and wicked aims; that right as represented by the Allied armies must and will sooner or later achieve a complete military victory over the forces of unrighteousness, and so inaugurate the kingdom of heaven upon earth. But does not the voice of reason cry aloud that the moral divisions of Europe are not thus drawn; that the division between the men of selfish aims and those of pure and Christian motives, in so far as it can be made at all, cuts clean across trenches and frontiers; that God has no chosen people, but speaks with as clear a voice to German and Turk as to Englishman and Frenchman; that it is only the "pride and passion of war" which can obscure this elementary truth from any sincere man?

Is it necessary to take the Kaiser and the Austrian Cardinals as representative Christians among our enemies? Have we not entered into religious fellowship with many a subject of Germany and Austria before the war, and found ourselves in the closest possible sympathy with representative Christians of all nations? Have we not faith enough in mankind to believe that it is only by the misunderstandings and misrepresentations of politicians that these fellow Christians of ours have ever been induced to support the actions of their Governments, who in every country proclaim this war as one of self-defence against grasping and unscrupulous enemies? Many of your readers, I am sure, believe that an international meeting of religious bodies would reveal an amount of moral agreement and pureness of motive which would astonish the pessimists in all countries, and that such a meeting would be productive of incalculable good in promoting that spirit of mutual forbearance and understanding on which alone a lasting peace can possibly rest. We do not need from our religious teachers, it seems to me, in these times, an insistence on the wickedness of our enemies, and the impossibility of any attempt at reconciliation until more millions of Europe's manhood have been destroyed; the political press surely does all and more than all that is necessary in that direction. Your duty, surely, is to keep bright in these dark times the ancient faith in the Fatherhood of God, the brotherhood of man, and the fundamental goodness of human nature in all lands; that Christian faith which our teachers were wont to proclaim to us in times of peace as higher than any limited brotherhood of race, of nation, or of family. Let us, then, "look closely into the moral agreements on which all real fellowship depends," and for God's sake let it be done quickly, that the blood of the living may not be shed in vain.—Yours, &c.,

COMFORTS FOR THE LABOUR BATTALION.

To the Editor of THE INQUIRER,

SIR,—Please be so kind as to allow me to intimate to all good friends who have sent parcels of woollen comforts, or the like, to the 10th Labour Battalion R.E., that they are to be reached now under the address O.C. or Ration Corporal, A. Platoon, 709th Labour Co., B.E.F. There have been changes in the organisation of the different Labour Battalions. I had a plea put in yesterday for the continuation of the kindly offices of my, and their, good helpers. My former comrades are still at work in the forests, and dispatch props for dug-outs at the front. They are a fine lot of fellows: but work and untoward conditions naturally tell on them.—Yours, &c.,

WINIFRED HOUSE.

To the Editor of The Inquirer.

Sir,—The friends of our little Hospital Home will know as well as the workers how the serious rise in cost of food must be affecting the management. It means £10 every week for a household of twenty-seven in place of £6, that is a demand on our funds for an extra £150 during the last nine months. Will well-wishers who know something of the work help the treasurer to meet this extra outlay? I think they gladly would do so if they could pay a visit to Winifred House and see the little band of nineteen children gathered there. These are hard times, but not for them. The year's work of the nurses has been strenuous and at times anxious, but on the whole has gone smoothly and happily.—Yours, &c.,

MEMORIAL NOTICES.

MARY CONSTANCE MARTINEAU.

Born Oct. 16, 1830; died Sept. 13, 1917.

About four years ago, an old lady of 82 years determined to retire from London and the benevolent activities there which she had hitherto maintained in spite of failing strength.

She came to spend a week or two in Letchworth, with no particular object or plan, but she liked the condition of life and soon took a house there. Here home became a centre of hospitality and kindness; and a friend who had long been her support in her London work, was still her right hand in all she planned and strove for (for it was not in her nature to be merely passive) in her new surroundings.

Letchworth soon found in her not only generosity, on the material side, in support of every cause that could enlist her sympathy, but a still active mind, an unquenched zeal for righteousness, a graciously inventive and responsive kindness, and a combination of unbending fidelity with a catholicity and charity that gave men who came into her presence a deepened sense of saintliness.

On September 13

Like a shadow thrown
Softly and lightly from a passing cloud,
Death fell upon her.

The next night, in a little child's evening prayer, God was asked to "bless dear Miss Martineau who was so kind to me and everybody." A neighbour, long active in local affairs, wrote, on hearing of her death, that her residence amongst them "had lent a dignity" to their collective life, and that to him and his "her presence had been a benediction." A distant friend wrote, "Kiss her hands for me, her dear helpful hands." "Wise, kind and good," in another letter, most simply and perhaps most adequately echoes the impression that her "full and happy life" had made on her Letchworth circle. She was a living embodiment of the ideal of old age, for "after our own proper perfection which is acquired in manhood, that perfection should also come which enlightens not only ourselves but others, and man should open out like a rose that can no longer keep closed, and should spread abroad the perfume which has been generated within; and this should come about in the period of old age." But rare and precious as is this gift in itself, there is something specific in the case of Miss Martineau which touches it with a pathos and even a kind of splendour that are its own. We have seen what impression she made alike upon casual acquaintances and intimate friends in her old age; but the casual acquaintance of her middle life will utterly fail to recognise the portrait. The intimate and discerning friends of that period will find in it an uplifting record of the triumph of essential spirit over outward and inward impediments and obstructions, that seemed invincible.

Respect Constance Martineau always secured, but it is not too much to say that in middle life she seemed to many of her associates and acquaintances positively to repel affection. "It always seemed to me that it was a sadly frozen and repressed life. Such a fine character, but—" writes one, in speaking of that period. Her disconcerting taciturnity seemed to damp and almost to rebuke conversation, and her conspicuous zeal for righteousness and desire to serve, wore a mask of rigidity that altogether robbed them of pervasive power. But behind it all was a depth of feeling, a longing to express it and to make a response, and a consciousness of inarticulateness and want of graciousness, that would have made her life a tragedy, read only by the small circle of friends who understood and loved her, had she not lived to the old age in which "the mellowed beauty of her character seemed to break into unclouded light." And so one friend calls her "One of the saints who seemed to shine out more and more the longer she lived"; another says she was "far brighter and more human in her later years." And another speaks of "steadfast achievement and faithfulness, a triumph of spirit, unfolding traits of character lovable and beautiful which have adorned the evening of her life more than in the days of strenuous activity." Yet another writes (to the companion and friend of the last fifteen years of her life): "God gave you to that brave heart, hitherto so unable to express what that warm heart must have ached with suppressing, and we all have shared the dear gift, and the gentle, beautiful sunset has been one of the unforgettable treasures for each."

If anyone could trace the steps of this conflict and victory, he would for once be able to write a real "Life." If I had to attempt to give the key to that "life" in a single word, that word would be "loyalty." She never violated or suppressed a conviction. She never dropped a task in weariness of heart. She never forsook a friend. And she had her reward. She followed her clues and she came out into the light. "It seems," she said in her old age, "as if I had had all my unhappiness when I was young."

But in those unhappy days, she sometimes had a premonition of the light. Her early life fell in the days of "journals." She has destroyed much of her own record, but enough remains to show that, at the age of 17, she was in the valley of the shadow of death, "relentlessly pursued" by high but somewhat hard ideals, and a sense of sinful failure to realise them. She writes, "We are reading the life of Mrs. Fry; some parts of her diary, written at the age of 17 or 18, struck me as similar to my own feelings now. "She seems sometimes to have been ready to despair. One passage even indicates a tendency to jealousy. She also seems to have had a sort of morbid self-consciousness, and disposition to self-blame. It is cheering and encouraging to read of what she was then, and think of what she afterwards became, an ornament to the Christian religion, and a blessing to hundreds!" Is it in my power to 'go and do likewise?' If I should ever become an active and holy Christian, perhaps this record of my youthful weakness and wanderings may serve to encourage some who come after me."

Her father, Richard Martineau, a partner in the brewing firm of Whitbread & Co. (from which his daughters, both convinced teetotallers, subsequently withdrew), was a first cousin of Dr. James Martineau. He was a Liberal in politics, a Unitarian in religion, and a generous supporter of many public movements and institutions. Her mother was a Needham; the first of five sisters to marry. Mary Constance Martineau was the first child of her parents.

Mrs. Turner, of Nottingham, with whom she was at school, was a constant friend and correspondent, and a uniformly wholesome and bracing adviser, on into her extreme old age. Dr. Hutton, whose ministry in Carter Lane Constance attended, and whose daughters were amongst her closest friends, had a profound influence upon her. Later on, in 1855, when the Newman Street Sunday school, which afterwards developed into the Portland British Schools, was founded, she came into relations with J. J. Tayler, Mr. and Mrs. Philip Worsley, Miss Swanwick and others, was able to realise her long-cherished wish to become a regular Sunday school teacher, worked in close fellowship with her cousins Dr. Martineau and his daughters, and formed friendships with Miss Rutt, Miss Humphreys, Miss Tyrrel, Miss Kate Scott and others. In one form or another, her connection with the Portland Schools continued for nearly fifty years. She gradually added other activities, largely in connection with Miss Octavia Hill's schemes, and with the Royal Victoria Hall, and she was for a time on the Board of Guardians for Paddington, where temperance and restraint of excessive zeal in the administration of the Vaccination Acts were her special interests.

Constance Martineau's mind had early been exercised on the subject of war, and she was strongly inclined to the Quaker position, but she always had some doubts or reservations as to wars of defence, or such a case as that of Hungary. In the present war, the invasion of Belgium decided her. She held the intervention of England to be of the nature of a true crusade, and wrote in an unusually high tone of enthusiasm to that effect to a despondent friend. But she often quoted the saying that the real danger was that we might "vanquish the German arms and be vanquished by the Prussian spirit." And as the war went on, Conscription, the administration of the Defence of the Realm Act, and the persecution of the conscientious pacifists pressed upon her the question whether we were not betraying the cause for which we were fighting; and the stress of her feelings was more and more directed to warning against dangers, protests against abuses, and pleading to accept or make opportunities for negotiation or mediation that we might guard ourselves from the crime of continuing the war a day longer than was necessary. She took many special opportunities of writing to the Press on these topics, and her letters were always restrained, direct and lucid. But she never withdrew from her first position, and when a friend met her deepest fears and forebodings with the expression of his firm conviction that the heart of the Army was sound, that its hatred of war was greater than we at home can feel or even realise, and that it would be a sure barrier against militarism, a light broke across her darkened face, and she uttered a deep "Thank you," for his words of hope and faith.

Miss Martineau had seen and had shared great changes in religious thought during her long life, but she had gone through no disturbing doubts or revolutions, and she retained to the last a simple and unquestioning faith in what had always been her essential beliefs. With almost her last breath she dictated a message to one of her dearest friends, which broke off with the words "So now I await the close, not with 'decent triumph,' as Mrs. Barbauld says—that never seemed to me the right word—but with grateful trust."

P. H. W.

MRS. A. T. HIBBERT.

The death of Mrs. Alexander T. Hibbert of Hyde has already been announced in these columns. Being prevented by illness from preaching her funeral sermon, the Rev. H. E. Dowson in a letter read on the occasion said: "I cannot let your Sunday morning's service pass without joining in your thought of one who was held in great esteem by us all....She was a beloved member of this church, a true Christian soul. She had a rare gift of sympathy. It sprang from her warm affections, and her deep living interest in those she cared for. She lived not for herself, but for others, making their interests hers. If this was so in private, it was the very life and soul of her many public activities. She was one of the pioneers in woman's entry into public life. We who were her colleagues on the Higher Education Subcommittee, or the county school, or the Free Library Committees, know how faithfully and constantly she fulfilled her duties, not by attendance only, but by the active part she took in their management, and the intelligent grasp she had of the business, and more than all by her personal labours."

As secretary of the Hyde Women's Liberal Association, Mrs. Hibbert did very good work on behalf of the Liberal cause for some years.

MEETINGS AND GENERAL NEWS.

TOYS FOR BELGIAN CHILDREN.

Our scheme for sending toys as a Christmas greeting to the refugee Belgian children in the Colonies Scolaires in France was such a happy success last year and gave so much pleasure to all concerned that we have decided to repeat it. Last year we had numerous gifts of new and old toys, games and money, and in the end 1,500 toys and games were sent out to France. The letters received and the gratitude expressed on the occasion of some personal visits last spring revealed an amount of pleasure on the part of the children which was as delightful as it was touching. Mrs. W. H. Drummond will again act as secretary and treasurer for the Toy Fund. She would like to suggest that many children in our churches may be glad to spare some of their own toys. Where Children's Guilds exist it would be a good thing for part of the meeting to be devoted to dressing dolls or making scrap-books or other suitable things. In this way our own children may learn a beautiful lesson of kindness and goodwill by helping the less fortunate children of another country.

All parcels and money to be sent to Mrs. W. H. Drummond, 23 Cannon Place, Hampstead, N.W.3.

YORKSHIRE UNITARIAN UNION.

The Annual Meetings of this Union were preceded by a religious service in the Joseph Street Chapel, Hunslet, Leeds, on Saturday, September 15, conducted by the resident minister, the Rev. F. Coleman. The preacher was Lieut.-Colonel C. Seymour Bullock, minister of the Unitarian Church, Ottawa, Canada. A note in the local Press says of the preacher that he confessed on Saturday that his methods had been likened to those of the famous "Billy" Sunday. As a matter of fact, Mr. Bullock, as secretary of a Y.M.C.A. in America, was one of the first, practically the first, to persuade Sunday, while he was yet playing baseball, to speak under religious auspices. In his sermon the preacher dealt with the nature of religious power, its source, and the conditions by which it could be obtained. By a treatment of the subject that was fresh, arresting, full of apt illustration and many touches of humour, he held the attention of his hearers to the end. There was a good congregation, including representatives from the congregations in the Union.

At the business meeting, Mr. Grosvenor Talbot, J.P., presiding, the Rev. W. R. Shanks, secretary, read the Report of the Committee, which gave a full account of work attempted during the year, including the giving of special financial assistance to the congregations, and the settlement of a minister at Dewsbury; similar assistance to effect repairs at Broadway Avenue, Bradford; an effort to re-open the chapel at Elland; special grant and settlement of a minister at Pudsey; the establishment of Independence Funds at Malton and Huddersfield; and the making of grants towards the maintenance of the ministry, and the provision of supplies, at nine of the churches. The Union lay preachers had conducted over two hundred services, voluntarily, during the year. The disturbing and depressing effects of the war had been felt by all the congregations. Some of them had suffered losses that could never be replaced. While some had grown less strong, a few remained as they were, and others had shown signs of growth and life.—The Secretary, in the absence of the Treasurer, Mr. J. Hess, read the balance sheet, which showed the finances of the Union to be in a healthy state. The total income from collections, subscriptions, and interest from investments and the Hargrove fund had enabled all claims to be met, leaving a deficit smaller than any during the past four years.

The reports and balance sheet were adopted. The Rev. W. L. Schroeder moved that the thanks of the Union be given to the retiring officers, and their re-election, and spoke of the excellent services rendered by them, particularly the Treasurer, the Secretary, and the Plan Secretary. The officers are: President, Mr. Grosvenor Talbot, J.P.; Vice-presidents, Dr. Hargrove, Messrs. G. E. Verity, C. H. Boyle, E. O. Dodgson, J. T. Kitchen, Dr. S. Moore, J. Teal and (now added) S. Hall; Treasurer, Mr. J. Hess; Secretary, the Rev. W. R. Shanks; Plan Secretary, the Rev. F. Coleman; Auditor, Mr. S. Hall.

About a hundred friends partook of tea, after which a public meeting was held in the schoolroom, Mr. Talbot presiding, supported by the officers, Lieut.-Colonel Bullock, the Revs. H. McLachlan, M.A., B.D., Manchester; J. W. Lee, Sheffield; R. Newell, Pudsey; J. W. Maw, M.A., Dewsbury; A. Cobden Smith, J. S. Mathers M.A., and others.

The President expressed the opinion that our soldiers would return with a strong religious feeling, ready and eager to take up the duties of the church, and he advised those who remained at home to do their best to keep up all their churches and chapels in such a position that they would be a Christian home for these men. Unitarians had done much in the past to keep up their small congregations, and they must do more in the future. Although they might not be able to do much proselytising, it was a great thing that there was a church like ours in a town or village.

The Rev. H. McLachlan, of the Unitarian Home Missionary College, Manchester, after giving a full account of the special work in the form of lectures to ministers to be delivered at the College, and courses of lectures to Sunday school teachers in various centres in the North of England, remarked that the growing movement towards co-operation among the evangelical churches was likely to be settled upon a dogmatic basis. He feared that the drawing together of the "orthodox" Nonconformist churches would be a drawing together by them without the Unitarians on a basis the Unitarians would not accept, and therefore he did not think from the point of view of active co-operation between the churches that the after-war period would give the Unitarians much more than they enjoyed at present. One of the greatest obstacles to the co-operation of the churches was the layman. He found more brotherhood, friendship, and co-operation among ministers than among the leading laymen, and he did hope that laymen would grasp the position and act accordingly. There would be something like a concerted movement without Unitarians, but that was not the worst. Unless he was greatly mistaken there would be a considerable reaction against liberalism in theology. Mr. McLachlan referred to a recent article on 'Theology Without Germany' in The Contemporary Review, and said that the attempt of the writer, if one read between the lines, was to show them how they could dispense with the liberalism for which the German theologians were responsible, and that in its origin this war sprang from the want of faith generated in Germany by liberal theologians. We had (continued Mr. McLachlan) taken a good many things from Germany that had not been good, but Germany had done a great deal for us in every type of thought and energy. He was one of those who were prepared to take whatever was good from any source. He thought there would be, as a result of the war and an examination of fundamentals by the men who had been brought up against the stern realities of life and death, a demand for a Christianity that was not merely metaphysical but positive, sympathetic, and practical. He saw some evidence of this in the writings of Donald Hankey. Many soldiers were Christians without realising the fact. It was there that he believed the Unitarians would be able to do a work that no other Church could do. We were prepared to meet criticism and discuss the Scriptures. Our message would be what it had always been, but, as the result of the war, changed in its presentation. We stood for freedom and liberalisation in theology, but this did not mean that we would not be positive and affirmative. Our Church would not only need to be in contact with the great problems of thought, but especially in contact with the problems of life and conduct. If we were fighting this war for territory, trade and commerce, benefits or revenge, we were not fighting as Christian men. There was no other ground. He did not believe that God made the war; he believed that it was entirely a man-made war. It would be partly our duty and obligation as Christian men to see that justice and righteousness came not only in the affairs and international councils of Europe, but also in the civic and national affairs of England. It was the duty of those who remained at home to make the country worth fighting for and clear up the problems and difficulties that repressed liberty, light, life, and love.

The Rev. J. W. Maw said we had reached a time of great opportunity for our congregations. While all the churches were now on their trial, Unitarians now had their chance to justify their claim to be pioneers of spiritual religion. We had traded too much on the past and had fallen into a kind of ancestor worship. Our problems were difficult, but we must fight the battles of our own age. Old enthusiasms were called out by attacking the problems of the old time; new enthusiasm would be roused by dealing with those of our own age. The task of the hour was the reconciliation of nation with nation, class with class. The influence of Christianity had not been strong enough to prevent the war. A spirit of hate must give place to a spirit of love. Where could we find the generating station? Only in the revival of religion.

Lieut.-Colonel Bullock denied that the Church had failed in its influence. It had, he submitted, developed a type of manhood that could stand against the damnable outrage proposed by Germany, and, so far from having failed, the Church had, during the war, developed manhood that was standing for justice and that kind of honour that said that the rights of little nations must be respected. It had, further, developed a type of womanhood that would give up its dearest treasure in order that the things that ought to be should be. Regarding a previous speaker's statement as to what Germany had given the world, Lieut.-Col. Bullock said Germany had been the greatest nation on earth to take up what somebody else suggested, and to carry it out.

The Rev. F. Coleman moved that the cordial thanks of the Union be given to Lieut.-Colonel Bullock for his service as preacher. The resolution was seconded by the Rev. R. Newall and adopted. The Rev. A. Cobden Smith moved, and the Rev. J. S. Mathers seconded, a vote of thanks to the congregation and workers at Hunslet, for the excellent provision they had made for the meetings; to Mrs. Botterill's singing class for the music it had so tastefully rendered, and to the President of the Union for his services in the chair. The resolution was passed, and Mr. P. Woffindin replied on behalf of the local congregation.

[We regret that owing to delay in the post this report did not reach us in time for insertion in our last issue.—Ed. of Inq.]

EAST END CHURCHES IN CONFERENCE.

"Neighbouring" may be a very good thing, and with this in mind the Stratford Church Committee arranged a service and conference for last Saturday. The preacher was the Rev. Basil Martin, of Finchley, and he had before him members of various neighbouring churches, who were evidently responsive to the suggestion of his sermon that they should ask themselves "What do I believe in?" and "What do I trust in in times of stress?" Possibly they would find that their favourite hymns did not always best express their convictions. Let them, for their own sake, then, write down their creed and see that their creed was their own. They would find out what money, law, physical force, culture, and goodness counted for. Some might find they were agnostics: but let them put it down; their creed must be their own. Next it must be intelligible: their ethical expression of a moral ideal; tolerant; and, finally, provisional. When churchgoers had the power to express their honest thoughts the church would once more be a power in the land as an inspired leader and guide amid the perplexities of human life.

Between the service and the meeting which followed came the opportunity for a common meal and for much interchange of thought and experience—a valuable adjunct to enlightened "neighbouring."

The meeting, presided over by the Rev. F. Hankinson, of Kentish Town, was called to consider the topic of 'Our Religious Message and the Future.' It was spoken to by Principal Mellone, Mrs. Sydney Martineau and Mr. F. Maddison, and the discussion was taken up by Mr. Woollard, Mr. Marshman, Mr. Peterken, and others.

Mr. Hankinson said that the future begins not after the war but to-day and to-morrow and the succeeding days. They must beware of lowering ideals, of thinking revelation is closed, of attempting to limit the love of God. It was essential to maintain the rights of conscience and reason, and to bring the services of our churches into line with honest thought.

Dr. Mellone spoke of the rightful struggle the burden of which England was feeling, and the importance of carrying on to the end. Out of the tragedy might well emerge what would inspire and strengthen faith in God through man. More than ever the heart of the nation was sound and the people were one people, with one mind and one will. The capacity of working together must be preserved; and it was important to the life of the church that the truth which the war had emphasised should not be forgotten—that it matters greatly whether children live or die. What those present and their class might think was not necessarily the final word. Worker and capitalist must co-operate, and beyond them were the nation's need and the nation's aspiration.

Mrs. Martineau pointed out that the position occupied by our churches was one of absolute sincerity: they were not called upon to declare their belief in what they could not believe: they could be simplicity itself in the expression of their message. But did the people want a religious message? It was about the one thing that they did want whether they knew it or not. The people would be what their leaders made them. If they were taught to depend on materialism they could observe an inevitable deterioration of national character. The ideal of life must be based on something outside, ethical conduct must be based upon religious conviction. She did not believe that when the war was over there would be a struggle between men and women: woman would have immensely more power than ever before, but that would not be a bad thing in itself. Let them begin, before the rising generation, with the women of to-day: the sense of the need for God was almost stronger in woman than in man.

Mr. Maddison insisted that the message must be religious and not merely ethical, and show a conscious adjustment to the idea of life beyond this. Religion was like God in that it was timeless—of the past, in the present, for the future. Religion translates into action more easily as it is free from creeds. Reality was reached as they thought of men and women as souls and not bodies, souls with a common origin and a common destiny—there lay the basis of democracy. Jesus was purely human, as human as the worst, and as human as the best. Let them get a conception of the church as a community of people living the good life, a real society of Jesus. A great heritage had been left by those who laid the foundations of our group of churches. It was not so much new methods that were wanted as faithful adherence to old principles. "Faithful to our trust" must be the contribution of each.

Principal L. P. Jacks (editor of The Hibbert Journal) has accepted an invitation to preach at the Thursday morning service (12 to 1) in the City Temple on October 4.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Banbury.—On Tuesday of this week the formal induction of the Rev. Percival Chalk as minister of the church took place. Tea having first been served in the artistically decorated schoolroom, the opening ceremony was performed in the church grounds, at which Dr. A. D. Tyssen, the Senior Trustee, officiated, handing the key of the church with badge of office to the minister. A most impressive Induction Service in the church was conducted by the Rev. Dr. J. E. Carpenter, as late Principal of Manchester College, Oxford, while the charge to the congregation was given by the Rev. J. M. Lloyd Thomas, as President of the Midland Christian Union. Many other churches in the town were represented among those present. At the Public Meeting which followed a telegram was read from the Rev. H. Gow, who had intended being present and at the last moment was kept away. Other communications were read from local friends who were unable to attend but who desired to express their good wishes to the minister on this interesting occasion. Votes of thanks to the visitors and chairman (Dr. A. D. Tyssen) were proposed and seconded respectively by Messrs. Phillpott, Haycock, Tieffenbach, and Hunt. The entire proceedings augured most favouraby for the continued welfare and development of the church.

Billingshurst.—Anniversary Services were conducted in the Free Christian Church, Billingshurst, on Sunday last. The chapel had been attractively decorated with flowers by the ladies of the congregation, and the chapel was well filled both morning and evening, the numbers assembling in the evening being particularly large. The preacher for the day was the Rev. G. Randall Jones, B.Sc., B.D., the newly settled minister of Pendleton, who is well known to the Billingshurst congregation and has been supplying the pulpit there recently. Preaching in the morning from 2 Cor. iii. 4, he told the stirring story of the Primitive Christian Church, the Church in which there was perfect liberty, whose sole creed was "Jesus is Lord." Then he went on to speak of the little community which gathered Sunday by Sunday in the old chapel, and the stalwart Puritans whose love of truth and liberty had called that community into being and made their descendants still a Free Church, the freest in Billingshurst. In the evening the Rev. Randall Jones spoke of the future, which he said was full of hope for the Churches of the Liberal Faith. The war had brought men face to face with the great realities of life. The old creeds were passing away and men and women everywhere were seeking a restatement of the fundamental facts of Christian experience. Here was the opportunity for the Churches of the Open Way. Let them be true to the spirit of their ancestors, let them go out as missionaries proclaiming their gospel to the unchurched masses, determined to win the world for Christ. Collections in aid of the chapel funds were taken morning and evening.

Bradford.—On Sunday evening, September 16, the Rev. Thomas Paxton, who has begun the sixth year of his ministry at Chapel Lane Chapel, preached to the largest congregation which has attended a service there for many years. Many soldiers, nurses, men in hospital blue and members of St. John Ambulance Brigade were present. Special music was rendered, and the sermon was particularly helpful and encouraging, the subject being 'Courage and Cheer.' At its conclusion Mr. Paxton said that years ago the tone of many religious folk was it was a good thing to die; to-day he would pitch their souls to the higher key—it was a good thing to live. It was a good thing to be alive, to lend a helping hand, to feel something of the spirit of world love. There might be other nations where the doctrine of hate was uppermost, but in this homeland of ours the leading and guiding motive was love. We were being drawn together as a people and a race, and knit together in such a way that the future, although clouded, was full of hope. We should have our problems and difficulties to contend with, but we should overcome them, never fear. There might be new perplexing situations to face, but we would get through them. If we kept our heads erect our hearts would beat brave and true. Individually, personally, we might have to go through the fires of suffering and affliction, but if we did our part the great Heavenly Father, who loved all, would never fail. Let them look back along their lives—that long yesterday—did they not see in it the guiding hand of God? To-day, with its anxiety and its agony, did they not feel something greater than these, divinely sweeter far, the inspiration that came from the presence and approval of God? That forever which awaited us, did it terrify them? How could it? It beckoned them on to still greater service, and at the end, the rest, the peace, the joy, the nearer fellowship of God.

Harvest Festivals.—We have received several reports of Harvest Thanksgiving Services, among them Bradford (Broadway Avenue), Framlingham, Halsted, Kendal, Newport (I. of W.), Ilford. In the accounts they give of beautiful decorations, large congregations and happy praise they bear witness to the renewed activity of Church life at the beginning of the winter season. We regret that it is impossible for us to refer to them more in detail.

London District Unitarian Society.—The Autumnal Meeting of the Society will be held at Essex Hall on Thursday, November 22, at 6. The Young People's Meeting has been fixed for Saturday, October 13, at Essex Hall at 4.

London: Hampstead.—We regret to learn that Mrs. Gow was knocked down by a motor lorry and received rather serious injuries on Haverstock Hill on Tuesday. She was removed to the hospital and is reported to be making good progress. The greatest sympathy will be felt with the Rev. H. Gow in his anxiety.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

The address for our Belgian Hospital Fund, to which cheques and parcels of clothing should be sent, is Mrs. Bernard Allen, 14 Gainsborough Gardens, Hampstead, N.W.3.

OUR London readers have been living in an atmosphere of air-raids. Many of them probably agree with us in wishing that the newspapers would restrain their obvious desire to make capital out of the new sensation. Some of them with their lurid descriptions are simply playing into the hands of Germany. It will not be unnatural if Berlin concludes that this sort of thing is worth while, if it makes even the great victory in Mesopotamia sink into a subordinate place in the public eye. To an observer who has not been on the prowl for copy the remarkable thing has been the quiet good sense with which the great city has gone on with its work. We know that war has its risks, and there is very little complaint that we are not better protected. There is indeed a genial tolerance for men who are doing their best to solve a problem of unprecedented difficulty even when their imperfect success means danger for ourselves.

THERE is one significant moral which may be drawn from the situation. We do not refer to the eager insistence of one section of the press which demands that the Government must rush into a policy of reprisals; nor to the critical remarks of writers of the superior school, who could have won the war long ago if only their advice had been taken. We have in mind the touch of realism which personal contact with the savagery of war gives to our convictions. Most of us may have held all along that physical suffering and disaster cannot be weighed in the same balance as the invisible claims of righteousness. But as soon as our own lives are in jeopardy we know that we would not yield an inch to the evil thing in order to save our own skins. Probably many peaceable citizens have felt this amid the roar of the guns as they had never done before. The Germans by this campaign of savagery have only stiffened our resolution and given us fresh valour for the final stages of the conflict.

SIR WILLIAM ROBERTSON made a strong and confident speech last Saturday. The occasion was the opening of the Manor House Orthopædic Hospital at Hampstead, which is designed to provide accommodation for 1,000 disabled sailors and soldiers who require special and protracted treatment. Referring to the first battle of Ypres as one of the most important battles of the war—if not the most important—because it completed the work which had been done at the Marne in defeating the effort of the Germans to crush and overrun France, he said that then our men fought under every disadvantage of numbers and equipment. Now the tables were turned. During 1917 alone we had taken from the Germans more prisoners and four times as many guns as we had lost to them during the whole of the war. While the enemy was suffering heavy losses, and his material resources were diminishing, our losses were lower than they had been in 1915 and 1916, when our armies were less efficient and our aircraft less equipped than they were now. In conclusion he said that the people of this country might be fully confident of the ultimate victory. But—and it was a big but—it was subject to the condition that the resources of the nation were utilized in an earnest manner for the purpose of the successful prosecution of the war alone. It should be a matter of conscience with every man and woman to see that that condition was being fulfilled.

THE revised scale of pay for men in the Navy and Army has been issued this week. It has been received with general approval, though it will add to the budget a sum of more than £50,000,000 in the first year. Its chief provisions consist in an increase in the soldiers' pay of 1*d.* per day for each full year of service since the outbreak of the war and relief from the present system of a compulsory allotment to dependents. "It is impossible," the Prime Minister says in words which will be received with universal applause, "to exaggerate the debt of gratitude which those at home owe to the men who have endured the unspeakable sufferings and hardships of modern warfare, many of them for three years, in defence of their country's liberty and honour. The Government feel sure that the nation would wish that anything which could be done to show to the men at the front their appreciation of their heroism and self-sacrifice should be done. Their prowess, their patience, their superb and untiring valour have not only renewed the glory of our race and name throughout the world, but have surpassed any achievement which the long annals of the British Army record."

* * *

IT is out of the question to pay a soldier a proper wage, for his service is one which has no market value. And there is one aspect of his duty for which he would be the first to renounce any claim to be paid at all. When the whole country is mobilised for purposes of resistance to an implacable foe the men who enlist are not fighting only for their country but also for their own hearths and homes, their mothers and wives, their sisters and children. It is not a matter of making a bargain with the State to do its risky work for it, but of fulfilling a duty which no man can refuse without degrading his manhood and exposing those who have a right to claim his protection to the most horrible dangers. Our early absorption in the problem of Belgium, and the prominence given to its restoration as a first condition of peace, has made many people rather blind to the fact that from the first this has been for us a war of defence, in which men have only kept the security of their own homes because they have been ready to die for them. For the fulfilment of duties of this intimate and personal kind there can be no question of pay, but only reverence and affection and undying gratitude on the part of those whom they love and protect.

We are delighted to see that at the General Conference of Unitarian and Other Christian Churches of the United States and Canada, held at Montreal last week, a motion was carried, by 236 votes to 9, that the war must be carried to a successful issue to stamp out militarism throughout the world. There is here another token of the complete union of hearts between our brethren in America and ourselves, and of their firm grasp of the vital issues of the conflict. In the course of the discussion Mr. Taft, the President of the League to Enforce Peace After the War, made the following memorable declaration :—

This war is now being fought by the Allies as a league to enforce peace. Unless they compel it by victory, they do not enforce it. They do not make the military autocracies of the world into nations fit for a World League unless they convince them by the lesson of defeat. He who proposes peace now either does not see the stake for which the Allies are fighting, or wishes the German military autocracy still to control the destinies of all of us, as to peace or war. Those who favour a permanent world peace must oppose with might and main proposals for peace at this juncture in the war whether made in Socialistic councils, in pro-German conferences, or by Pope Benedict. The Allies are fighting for a principle, the maintenance of which affects our future civilisation. The Allies cannot concede peace until they conquer it. When they do so, it must be permanent. Otherwise they will fail.

The Chairman of the Congregational Union, the Rev. Bernard J. Snell, spoke with unflinching resolution about the duties of war and peace in his presidential address on Wednesday. He laid special stress upon the duty to live by the same principles which have inspired us in the war. "It will be a barren victory unless we bring to our national problems those ideals for which the noblest of our youth have given their lives."

I do not forecast a new heaven and a new earth [he said], but assuredly, whether or no the war alters the map of Europe, it will alter the map of man's mind. If all men must enlist to serve the country in war, does peace end the obligation? Shall not men who have been willing to die have the right to live a full and happy human life? If the State rightly shares war profits, what hinders in peace? I prognosticate short shrift for profit made without regard to national ends. For those whose main motive has been to grow rich while their brethren bleed, I have no word. Not for such carrion crows have Britons died! We must set our faces resolutely against the coarse commercialism which uses men as means to wealth, instead of ends in themselves, and against those employments wherein some have more power over others than any man ought to have over his fellows. The great purpose of a nation's life is the welfare, character, and progress of its people. We are brothers all, equally valuable, because all unspeakably valuable.

SOME THOUGHTS ON PRAYER.

The correspondence on Prayer, which has occupied a good deal of our space during the past few weeks, has touched upon a matter of vital importance for religion. No one will pretend that a series of letters can do more than suggest methods of approach to a subject at once so lofty and so difficult, but the writers have succeeded in suggesting that temperament, intellectual training and subtle elements of personal experience must necessarily have a profound influence upon our conclusions. If there is any department of our religious life where conventionality is fatal, it is here, in these deep intimacies of the soul. Where there is any trace of falsehood, insincerity or the mere formality of the pious phrase, there can be no open way into the presence of God. When, however, the scruples of sincerity or the hesitations of the critical understanding are pushed so far as to rob the habit of prayer of its spontaneous simplicity or to inhibit it altogether, religion itself stands in jeopardy. More than anything else prayer is its vital nerve. If there is no God to whom men can pray, but only inflexible Power or impersonal Benevolence, the whole fabric of Christian thought and devotion will pass away, and no policy of adaptation can save it for our use.

For this reason we must observe a clear distinction between two aspects of the question. It is one thing to plead from the point of view of Christian Theism that many of the traditional forms of prayer need to be modified in order to bring them into harmony with our thought of God. It is quite another thing to attempt to eliminate prayer altogether from the noble activities of the human spirit, on the ground that it can make no difference in the world of reality, except in so far as it stimulates some obscure reflex action which begins and ends with ourselves. Underlying this position, when it is something more than the crude expression of popular scepticism, there is a philosophy of life and its meaning which, whatever its claims may be upon our serious attention, is something quite different from the system of Christian thought and practice in which we have been trained. In an article of this kind we cannot attempt to examine its credentials; we wish simply to call attention to one line of attack upon some of the central positions of faith, which is often fatal to the quiet confidence of the religious mind.

In religion as in many other subjects in which they are keenly interested men are fond of conducting an argument by a process of logical inference. They lay down some large general principle, and then proceed to deny the existence of anything which appears to contradict it. They assume a doctrine of God highly coloured by the ideas of uniformity and majestic power, and from this they deduce the impossibility of any of the tender personal relationships which are involved in Christian teaching about prayer. This is the method of rationalism, and it exhibits rationalism both in the disconcerting strength of its attack upon religion and in its final futility. For the facts of experience, which it has dismissed with an ironical smile into the limbo of obscurity, are continually coming back, not as ghosts but as lusty young warriors to contest the right of any rigid theory to put life in chains.

The type of argument which is often held to be valid in religious discussions would make terrible havoc of our human relationships. No one has ever been able to lay down immutable laws for friendship, or to infer by any process of logic how a mother's love must act upon the heart of her child. In this world of living relations, where soul plays upon soul and men under the strong impulses of love are continually giving themselves in answer to the mute appeals of human need, we do not desire the uniformity which would be the death of affection. Every impulse of unselfish love is a creative act and adds to the spiritual wealth of the world. It is in this same society of human souls that Christianity finds the field of its activity. Its task is not to explain the universe but to fashion a living network of relationships, human and divine. For it God and the soul of man are both alive, and its chief interest is in the relationships of confidence, of alienation, or of reconciling love which exist between the two. Whenever the man of logic tries to prove that the Divine Being is quite impersonal in his action and that prayer is both selfish and useless, there comes back the triumphant answer: "In the day when I cried he answered me and strengthened me with strength in my soul." The cry of Pascal "The heart has its reasons," is not the attempt of a weary thinker to find an escape in mere feeling from the gnawing doubt of his own mind. Amid the profundities of speculation, the heights and depths which even his piercing intellect could not understand, he threw himself back upon the world of divine reality revealed in Christian experience. He knew that where the ultimate things of life are concerned affection has its rights; as we also know in these days of trouble, when the ground rocks beneath our feet, that logic cannot annul the instinct of the soul to pray, or shake its confidence that God knows, and that God cares.

The only use which religion has for an abstract conception of the Deity, except that possibly its cold sublimity may exalt and purify the imagination, is this, that it may fill it with the rich content of experience. Before the idea of God as Power or Lawgiver or Judge, or as the indwelling Reason or Wisdom of the universe, can have any spiritual value for us in the stress of life it must be fused with this palpitating human reality. If this fusion is impossible, and our philosophic Deity seems to discourage the instincts and practices of devotion, as the survivals of our childishness, the wise man will begin to suspect the tyranny of logic and try to walk along the hallowed paths of experience with a firmer step. Our relationships with the divine may elude our forms of analysis and pass upward into regions beyond our understanding, but they are not at the mercy of a clever inference. It is more rational to suspect some flaw in the reasoning of the modern mind and the temporary fashions of its thought than to regard the devotional life of Christendom, which has blossomed in strength and beauty from the practice of prayer, as the product of a vast misconception. We are not speaking here of the various forms of doctrine and observance in which the desire to pray has sought for outlet or justification—often these bear upon them the marks of time and are liable to change—but of a relationship with God which has become an integral part of life itself. Once a man has rejoiced in its light and felt its quickening power, he cannot be argued out of belief in its existence. He knows that God speaks to his soul and that God answers his prayer.

With one other thought we must conclude. For ourselves, and we doubt not for many other men who are conscious of the need of effort and at the same time of their own moods of helplessness, the question "Why should a reasonable man pray?" has little interest at the present time. It sounds like the echo of a forgotten debate. For us the urgent question is this, "How shall we pray, so that our prayer may prevail?" To that we can find only one answer. Let us pray with the trust and simplicity which are the secret of power, and with the directness of purpose which makes it natural for us to bring all strong and noble desires into the presence of God. Let us pray for our own need of courage and steadfastness and charity, for all the blessings of divine guidance and protection upon those whom we love, the living and the dead, and for the triumphant victory of righteousness in this struggle of the nations to which duty has called us. Nothing that is mean or paltry in the eager passion of our hearts or the settled purposes of our lives can survive this searching test of lifting it up into the clear shining of the presence of God. There are some things which shrivel into silence as soon as we begin to pray, and in that revealing moment we know that we ought not even to wish that they may come to pass.

THE WORK OF THE UNITARIAN HISTORICAL SOCIETY.

To the Editor of THE INQUIRER.

SIR,—I read with great interest the review in your issue of September 8 of the 'Transactions of the Unitarian Historical Society.' With you, I heartily congratulate the Editor on his fine piece of work, and the various contributors for their valuable addition to the common stock of our knowledge. Without these "antiquarian" essays no real history is possible; with them the historian is possessed of much necessary data. My immediate object is to emphasise, however, your suggestion for the concurrent consideration of historical questions of the broader interests. You refer to "the contribution of the Unitarian movement to liberal theology and social reform, and the reaction of intellectual and political change upon the quality of its religious life and the range of its activities," as amongst the subjects which might be discussed with great advantage. I am quite sure that our well-equipped editor will not lose sight of this important aim. As a matter of fact, the first paper to be read before the Society was on 'Origins.' Mr. Burgess asked me to lead off. I suggested that the honour should be his, on all grounds: but his personal modesty and editorial functions forbade. Thus, in effect, my enlistment resulted in the lack of balance to which you refer. Moreover, the number of "antiquarians," to use your term, in itself very limited, is greater than the available supply of "historians" who are brave (or rash) enough to tackle, for example, such a thorny problem as 'The Presbyterian Myth' (so termed by the strenuous adversaries of the Presbyterian origin theory) or 'The Presbyterian Name and the Presbyterian Fact.' I fear I am not a historian, though I should much like to be able to justify some distant claim to the title. For years I have longed to welcome the appearance of a history which should effectually make good the prospectus suggested in your review. One thing I do know. The man who achieves such a task will deserve well, not only of his own religious body, but of the religious world in general. And no occasion can be more opportune than the present. The whole world is in the throes of a new birth: it would be simply disastrous if the religious throes resulted in a verdict of still-born. The primary requisite is the open and frank acknowledgment of Freedom. Freedom of religious thought is the necessary sine qua non. By this phrase is not indicated a mere reactionary attitude such as that vigorously maintained by an "atheistical" French Commissaire Militaire, with whom I had many animated conversations in the waits between trains, but the freedom and the wisdom to assimilate the ideas of the past, when valid, and to make truth ("find" truth others may prefer to say) for ourselves of the present. Once the churches admit this principle and practise it, religious sectarianism in its attitude of rigid aloofness will be no more. Men will adopt instead the better theory and practice of mutual aid. Then and then only will theology, in its most extended sense, become the Queen of the Sciences. All dogmatic absolutisms must vanish and no belated infallibility will dare to raise its incongruous head. I do not really think that the acknowledgment of this principle of Freedom will prove insuperable: for the curious experience out here is that it seems impossible to find officer or man who actually believes in the dogmas supposed to be held by his particular Church. Moreover, no French Commissaire Militaire that I have met and talked with, however staunch to his reputed Catholicism, refrains from denying his adherence to many of the ecclesiastical dogmas. One, a lawyer, discreetly retired from interchange of opinion on fundamental beliefs, and confined himself, in lawyer fashion, to the demonstration of the "necessity" for Unitarians or the National Conference to have a constitution. Eh bien! his Church had a constitution, and—"authority." I have met many of his kind in the homeland. With regard to our own Army I have discovered no real dogmatic believers. The general attitude is that implied in the moving letters printed in THE INQUIRER, under the well-known name of Tarrant. In my own old Labour N.C.O.'s Mess (a pretty rough one) matters bearing on religion were often discussed: but unfailingly, a look would be turned my way, with the remark "We are not talking of your religion, Corporal." Further, not a single officer or man has denied the advisability and propriety of the principles I have put forward. Freedom, Comprehension (in spirit if not in form), and Progress are the necessary passwords for all human marches towards the Divine. Here I revert to the Unitarian Historical Society. Haltingly, it may be: not always consciously, perhaps: not always avowedly, the congregations forming our National Conference have arrived. To-day they are the fortunate and happy possessors of avowed principles which are pregnant with human destinies, and they appreciate the obligation laid upon them to be worthy exponents of these momentous fundamentals. The value and import of such a development cannot be too highly appraised, especially, as I have already indicated, in these stormy times of world-transition. You can hardly wonder in the light of such a conviction, Sir, that your words have moved me: even if the upshot be only these rambling remarks. My conviction is stronger than ever that the printing press is our best instrument.

If I thought that the future of war would permit the possibility of any coherent thinking, I would ask you to allow me in a future issue to enlarge on some of the subjects which might serve for edification under the auspices of the U. H. S. But such a contingency seems remote, even though a good friend, a second lieutenant, gaily asked me, by letter, how my magnum opus was getting on. When I met him, by stroke of happy fortune, I asked him what were his powers of thought out here, extraneous to military matters. His candid reply was that he had no such powers! Nor have I: and so will confine myself to a few indications.

1. I would have a paper showing the development of the principles of Freedom, Comprehension and Progress. This would be most timely, and appeal to people who are practically to-day in the position of the forefathers of the olden time.

(a) Of course, the holders of the Presbyterian Myth theory would deny the historical value of such an appeal. They declare it is unhistorical. Then let the members of the U. H. S. thrash the matter out. Here, of course, congregational records will not aid us. There are none, or but few, for those years of repression and persecution. But the personal conclusions I have reached from a searching examination of pamphlets differ totally and diametrically from the non-Presbyterian theorists. In the first place there is no Presbyterian Myth, although some zealous scions of a worthy lineage have made some superfluous claims for their spiritual and actual ancestors. These claims in turn, and by way of reaction, have irritated a certain high authority who, above all, things adoring accuracy, has planked himself on the Independent side. There have been many encounters between those who uphold the influence of the Presbyterian theory and those who hold no theory at all, or cling to a distinctively Unitarian origin, for which, on any theory of continuity, there is no possible foundation. Unitarian teaching aided in the movement without doubt, but the personnel of such Unitarians counted for nothing in the matter of quantity. There were not enough of them, let us say, to propagate a single community of worshippers. Many object to the name Presbyterian, because the holders of the name were not, say, Scots Presbyterians. Some will admit their existence, if you please to call them National Churchmen. Truly, they pleaded for comprehension; but the Sheldons ousted them. But they were called Presbyterian; they called themselves Presbyterian; the name "Presbyterian" was a serviceable weapon of reproach in the mouths of Established scoffers, such as the wily L'Estrange. Many writers forget that, though in the disestablishment of the Anglican Church the presbyters desired to set up another despotism (yet nevertheless were strangely tolerant of those of the "Independent way"), a great many new things were learnt during the Commonwealth time. Ministers lived in peace, and conferred together. At the Restoration, the Presbyterian desired to be included in the National Church. To the Independent the vital issue was the self-sufficiency of his little congregation.

(b) Here emerge two more problems for the U. H. S. Which Nonconformist theory, the Presbyterian or the Independent, made for Comprehension and which for the evolution of theology? (I may say that personally I am on the matter of form a Separatist.) I am of opinion that the Presbyterian made for both. The comparative liberty of the Commonwealth had widened men's outlook. This larger mind naturally affected the pleaders for Comprehension more than it influenced (except by way of toleration) the members of the Independent congregations. The man who wished to be comprehended must himself be ready to comprehend others. The result of another thirty years' experience brings us to Matthew Henry's pithy remark, that they of the Chester congregation were for a bond of Love, and not for stringent and binding theological covenants. The actual passage will be found in 'Matthew Henry, his Chapel.' I am giving a paraphrase, possessing only a "war" memory.

(c) On the theological side I started my delving into Nonconformist history with the idea implanted, I doubt not by my "high authority," that the Independents were the radical party in theology: but I have been compelled to say that I have found no ground for the opinion. Naturally, until congregations were tolerated, and some sense of security obtained, the natural corollaries of principles would not be disclosed. And the noteworthy fact emerges that after the Revolution the Presbyterian, or National Churchman, or Comprehensionist proved to be the vehicle of theological evolution: aided by individual Independent writers of mark and vigour. The fruits of this evolution are discernible in the numerous secessions of the seventeenth century, when the Independent displayed an orthodox conservatism. Later on, overt Unitarianism appeared, and Progress became the order of the day; whilst "Congregationalism" issued a statement of theological belief which, by the way, is now relegated, I understand, to the back page of the Year-book. I may add, and it is interesting to note, that there were two competing schools of thought in Holland (where so many English Nonconformist ministers received their university education). Two manifestoes were published with the avowed object of aiding the divergent controversialists in England. The date, I believe, was a few years before the Revolution. One was of the liberal order, the other of a reactionary type. It will be well to understand that I have been speaking of general tendencies. The Baptist history and its development will provide a splendid field for the knowledge of Mr. Burgess, who has been an untiring student of Baptist origins and evolution. The Friends' history is better known.

2. Before coming out here I had determined to send round a request to the older congregations for indications of the stress laid upon the civic side of human life by their former members. In many by-ways and odd places I have discovered pertinent corroborations of well-known facts. It would be well if students of local history were to give us connected and detailed narratives. For Liverpool, covering the life of the Liverpool Domestic Mission, Sir Edward Russell, with his practised hand, has laid stress on the value and scope of the Unitarian influence upon civic and social life. Birmingham, Leeds, Bristol afford, likewise, ample field. Much information can also be gleaned from the older Unitarian periodicals.

3. On the side of efforts for the attainment of religious liberty the record of the worshippers in the older congregations stands supreme. All Nonconformists have done much: but the man of the liberal way in theology possessed a broader sympathy for all creeds, whether of the dogmatic or nebulous order. His brave work for the Roman Catholic was illustrated by the saying of O'Connell given in our columns the other day, to the editor of The Whig: "You have done more for us than any other set of people:" and that was said of Ireland. The time-honoured toast of "Civil and religious liberty—all the world over" was not devoid of vital significance. The men of old time, I doubt not, emptied their glasses; but the spirit of high ideals was ever renewed.

You will remark that I have had in view (1) the larger history of the development and significance of a liberal religious movement, as well as (2) the particular lines along which the U. H. S. can furnish choice material. A Presbyterian minister working for the Y.M.C.A. called in to my station the other day and read over my manuscript, so far as then written. To my surprise he assented even to the lack of dogmatism out here, saying there was material for many hours' talk on the subject-matter. Drysdale, the Presbyterian historian (official) was mentioned, and my friend narrated conversations he had had with Drysdale on the matter of trusts. I ventured to remark that Drysdale much disliked having to narrate the unwelcome departures from the conventional paths: and that though he did not wish to deny the parentage of the heretical Presbyterians, nevertheless the acknowledgment of the fact gave him pain. The Y.M.C.A. worker made no direct reply to the suggestion, but added that the United Free and the Presbyterian Church of England took the Bible as their standard, but reserved the right to interpret or criticise the Westminster Confession. Theoretically, this is the position of many of our Presbyterians of more than two hundred years ago. The mention of Mr. Drysdale serves to remind us of an outstanding fact. Histories of Nonconformity have been nearly all written from a reputed orthodox position. Heresies have been treated as mere side issues leading into vacancy or sterility. With a strong U. H. S. under an able editor, we may all be assured that the time is approaching when the history of liberal religious thought and action will come into its own. It constitutes a worthy theme: wherein is indicated the right and only course possible for all Churches that desire to live and make glad the hearts of willing men.—

WHY SHOULD A REASONABLE PERSON PRAY?

To the Editor of The Inquirer.

Sir,—If this correspondence had been headed "Why should a reasonable child cry?" it might have been more practical. Until prayer is a cry from the heart not to be suppressed, it is not real prayer, and all the reasoning about it on any other supposition, even by those "who are in the van of progressive religion," seems rather like "vanity, and a striving after wind." We are told that "it is derogatory to any worthy thought of God to imagine that the supply of our wants depends upon our asking or not asking for them"—for the supply of them evidently being meant. But why if asking is the condition of reception, as seeking is the condition of finding? This breaks no law, but rather fulfils one. It would be idle to ask God for what, if we are to have it at all, can only be obtained from ourselves, but then the difficulty is to correctly define what can only be thus obtained. For one "whose conception of prayer has been radically changed" the suggested substitutes for that discredited exercise seem strangely old-fashioned. It is rather a long time since music was used by the Church as an aid to devotion, and "seasons set apart for meditation" are not exactly a new thing in this changeful world. I am afraid we shall have to fall back upon prayer after all. Reasoning about it does not seem to dispose of it, even if, greatly daring, we call it by another name. Doubtless many prayers are foolish, but then have not we high authority for calling men "mostly fools," and even fools must pray.—Yours, &c.,

Clement E. Pike.

BOOKS AND REVIEWS.

HOME LIFE FOR GIRLS.

The Upbringing of Daughters. By Catherine Durning Whetham. London: Longmans, Green & Co. 5*s.* net.

This book covers a wide range of interest, but it is written from an intensely personal point of view, and it is this which gives it its value. There can be no science of the home where affection rules. The management of its complex human relationships is an exquisite art, and like all living art there is in it a large element of personality. Accordingly Mrs. Whetham's essays on the relation of a mother to her daughters interest us chiefly for their element of autobiography and the glimpses she gives us into the happy life of her own home

The wise mothers among her readers will not try to copy her methods, but they may learn much from her experience. The home she has in mind is evidently one with a fine standard of taste and ample means, but little that she suggests on the side of personal influence and human companionship will be found unsuitable by people who have to be very careful about money, provided they have the priceless wealth of a sensitive and well-trained mind. On one point only there is likely to be some marked difference of mental attitude. Parents who cannot endow their daughters will naturally be less diffident on the subject of professional training for women. There is an old-fashioned flavour in the opinion that in view of the differences between the nature and destiny of boys and girls, "it may be right to send boys to school for the best part of their young lives and to bring up girls chiefly within the home." But we are entirely in accord with the plea that amid the dazzling new opportunities which are opening out before them we must teach our girls to honour motherhood as their highest privilege and to guard the sanctities of home.

On the subject of money, about which there is a great deal of foolish secretiveness among middle-class people, Mrs. Whetham has some sensible things to say. She would get rid of the idea that it is vulgar to be quite open about the amount and sources of income or to discuss money matters quite frankly in the family circle. "It would be a great advantage in family life," she adds, "if the same openness which is desirable in money matters were to extend more often to the making of wills. It befits us all to remember that the one person a will cannot ultimately concern is the person who makes it, since he will be safely out of the way before it comes into action. A good deal of petty tyranny, of spite, of moral cowardice, of unfair treatment, of simulated interest and affection would be rendered of no avail if a will had to lie open for inspection during at least six months before it could be registered to take effect." She thinks that perfect openness of this kind would make people more willing in their old age "to hand over some of their accumulations to the generation below them, who are carrying the heavier burdens and coming across the greater opportunities and more pressing needs. Too often nowadays, with the increased longevity of modern life, the possession of money is divorced from the power of undertaking and executing and from the judgment of mature manhood."

The chapter on religion strikes us as the least satisfactory in the book. It skirts round the difficulties instead of grappling with them in a definite way. We regret that Mrs. Whetham has not taken her readers into her confidence about the methods which she has adopted with her own children. She would have helped them, and it is just where disagreements are most accentuated that an individual point of view, based upon personal experience, is needed; but there is nothing helpful in a sentence like the following, which brings us to the threshold of the fascinating problems of New Testament study and then lapses into silence: "The New Testament is a far more contentious volume [than the Old Testament] where convictions are deeply involved, and the results of criticism and research are far less generally acceptable. It is therefore not possible to discuss here with profit the various methods of bringing its contents before our young people."

We have no space to call attention to the many suggestive things which are to be found in Mrs. Whetham's pleasant and discursive writing about holidays and human intercourse and country life. The chapter on 'Books to Read' will appeal to all bookish people, though of course every one will be inclined to grumble that some of his own favourites have been omitted. But her taste in books is delightfully catholic, and the present reviewer has the happiness to share her attachment to such oddly assorted companions as Huxley's 'Physiography,' 'Dame Wiggins of Lee,' and Mrs. Barbauld's 'Hymns in Prose for Children.'

'The Sacrifice of Thankfulness' (Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark, 4*s.* 6*d.* net) is a volume of sermons by the late Professor Gwatkin of Cambridge, marked by the simplicity both in thought and diction which is the natural adornment of a great mind. It is enriched by a charming portrait of the author and a short memoir by Mr. T. R. Glover. The latter is rather disjointed and formless and leaves us with the regret that the materials have not been worked up into a finished literary portrait. It is as an historian of broad views and independent judgment that Professor Gwatkin will be remembered. His mind did not run in ecclesiastical grooves and he represented no party. The Oxford Movement has made more noise in the world than the tolerant scholarship of Cambridge, but through the influence of men like Gwatkin the Cambridge spirit has entered deeply into the lives of some of the ablest thinkers in the Church and Nonconformity. Its value consists in this, that it is an atmosphere rather than a body of doctrine. Sentences like the following were among his characteristic utterances: "We are not all bigots, or necessarily even churchmen": "Sound criticism is as truly a divine revelation as Scripture itself." The simple Christian piety which breathes through these sermons is all the more impressive, when we remember that they represent the mature convictions of a mind so deeply imbued with the virtues of balance and restraint.

Messrs. George Philip & Son have issued a handy 'Pocket-Atlas Guide to London' (price 1*s.* 6*d.* net). It contains a great deal of information in a convenient form and twenty-five sectional maps with a complete index. In size it is just the thing for quick reference at home or at the office, or it can be slipped into the pocket by the sightseer, who will find that it is the companion he needs amid the wilderness of London's streets.

Miscellaneous.

The Quest, Cornhill Magazine, The Hibbert Journal.

For the past three years the Joint War Committee of the Order of St. John and the British Red Cross Society has made an annual appeal to the Churches on the day set apart by the representatives of all the Churches as a day of special Intercession. The Joint War Committee intend to make a similar appeal on the next Intercession Day, on whatever date it is fixed. In previous years it has been arranged on the last Sunday in the old year or the first Sunday in the New Year. Clergymen and ministers of all denominations are earnestly requested, if at all possible, to reserve next Intercession Day for contributions to the Funds of the Joint War Committee, and thus to give their congregations an opportunity of contributing directly to the comfort of our wounded soldiers on the various battle-fronts.

WEEKLY NOTES.

I receive letters daily from the front telling me of the great use which the instruments we send are to the doctors. Among others I should like to quote the following:—

I. Yesterday I received the neat little case which you have been good enough to send me. It is a little treasure, so practically arranged, and the instruments of such good quality. I received it and your letter with the liveliest pleasure, and I feel quite powerless to thank you sufficiently. Three years of war have not exhausted England's generosity to those who are suffering for the restoration of justice and right. Your Fund was founded to save and aid such, and it is on their behalf that I try to express my profound gratitude.

II. I hasten to thank you sincerely for the splendid pocket instrument case which you have just sent me. It will be of the greatest service to me and I shall use it every day in discharging my duties. Nothing gives greater encouragement to those who are risking their lives every day than to see that there are people whose generosity has no limits, who are working with all their might to help those who are sacrificing themselves for their country. Assuredly those who have the greatest merit are not necessarily the soldiers who fight, but also those who help them to fight. We all know what the Belgian Hospital Fund has done and is doing daily for our medical service, and its name alone arouses a feeling of admiration and thankfulness to its generous promoters. I hope that no Belgian will ever forget what you have done for each of us.

I am already receiving urgent appeals for warm underclothing, cardigans, mufflers, mittens, and comforts generally, especially for the mutilated men, who are being trained for trades. These men cannot take violent exercise and suffer greatly from the cold. Rose Allen.

SPECIAL WANTS.

Pyjamas, shirts, socks, and all sorts of men's underclothing.
Mufflers, cardigans, slippers.
Clothing for women and children.
Games. jigsaw puzzles, old tennis balls.

The name and address of sender and list of contents should be enclosed in each parcel.

Contributions of money and clothing should be sent to Mrs. Bernard Allen, 14 Gainsborough Gardens, Hampstead, N.W.3.

A GIFT TO THE NATIONAL TRUST.

We learn with much pleasure that Kinver Edge, in the heart of the Midlands, has been presented to the National Trust by the members of the late Mr. Grosvenor Lee's family for the use of the public. The gift was handed over to the Trust on Saturday, September 29, by Mr. Oliver Lee. We are indebted to a correspondent of The Manchester Guardian for the following account of the proceedings :—

In perfect September weather on Saturday a large company assembled on the red sandstone outcrop of Kinver Edge, with its fair view of the Clent and Clee Hills, Malvern, the Wrekin, and the Cotswolds, to hand over to the National Trust its first important possession in the heart of the Midlands.

The gift comprises 200 acres of heather, gorse, bracken, and moorland that rise to the height of 500 ft. above sea level, and is made interesting by its remains of a Roman camp and a number of cave dwellings, probably inhabited by men of prehistoric times, and still inhabited to-day by "troglodyte" cottagers. The gift is a memorial to a public-spirited citizen of Birmingham, Thomas Grosvenor Lee, who in his lifetime took deep interest in all footpath and open-space questions, and was mainly instrumental in obtaining Rednal Hill, among the "Lickeys," as a public park for the city. The donors of this beautiful memorial to their father and mother are Mr. Oliver and Capt. Lee, Mrs. Wight, and Miss Lee. They were moved to make this tribute of their affection to their parents because from earliest days Kinver Edge had been their happiest holiday ground. There was not a single yard of this Kinver Edge that was not dear to the heart of Mr. Grosvenor Lee. He was never tired of rambling over it, and his passionate love of nature is very fitly thus memorialised.

A large company assembled to do honour to the occasion, amongst them Lord Dartmouth, Lord Cobham, and the Mayor of Stourbridge. Canon Rawnsley took the chair, and introduced Mr. Oliver Lee, who gave a short account of Kinver Edge, and the reason of their gift to the National Trust.

Canon Rawnsley, after paying his tribute to the character of the lover of nature who was here so worthily commemorated and to the public spirit that had dictated the gift, explained the aims and objects of the National Trust, and called upon all who in the near future would be thinking of the brave men of their city or county who had fallen for right against might to emulate the example here set, and to determine to remember that in no better way could patriotic lives be so well honoured as by dedicating to the enjoyment of the public such places of rest and health and inspiration for the workers of the future Britain that had been kept secure from the foe. He also urged the need of the people to take care of their heritage of natural beauty, and not to allow it to be disfigured by the thoughtless leaving of litter about.

Lord Dartmouth moved a resolution of welcome to the National Trust. The Mayor of Stourbridge and the Head Master of the Kinver Council School seconded it, and it was passed unanimously.

A vote of thanks was accorded to Canon Rawnsley for presiding, and the meeting dispersed to wander over the ground and enjoy their new acquisition.

A WAR GIFT FROM AMERICA.

The sum of £300 has just been sent to Hingham, in Norfolk, by the citizens of New Hingham, Massachusetts, for the relief of those who have suffered in the war. The money has come largely from Unitarian sources, and the moving spirit in regard to this and previous gifts is the Rev. Louis C. Cornish, who was the Unitarian minister at Hingham, Mass., until a few years ago, and is now secretary of the American Unitarian Association. The generous action of the citizens of New Hingham is recorded in the following paragraphs from the Eastern Daily Press of September 22 :—

Another tangible expression of the bond of sympathy which exists between Hingham, Norfolk, and Hingham, Massachusetts, U.S.A., is shortly to be presented in the form of a gift of £300, which the citizens of New Hingham across the seas have subscribed for the relief of those who have suffered in the war and their dependents. This pleasing duty has been entrusted to the Rev. Lawrence Redfern, of the Octagon Chapel, Norwich, who, when a student at Harvard University in 1913, visited New Hingham, and met a number of the residents.

The relationship which exists between the two townships has previously been stated in these columns, but it may not be out of place to again mention the salient features. In the second quarter of the seventeenth century about half the population of Hingham, Norfolk, crossed the Atlantic, and established New Hingham, an important chapter in its history commemorated by the erection of a memorial tower. Three gifts have been sent from the old Hingham Church to the daughter settlement—part of a stone font, an antique oak chair, and an ancient piece of carving. A few years ago Hingham also sent to its American namesake its ancient mounting block from the village green, which was formally presented by the then British Ambassador to the United States, Viscount Bryce. Somewhat later the American township presented a block of field granite to the Norfolk Hingham to replace the mounting stone on the village green. This was erected on a pedestal, and a memorial plate placed over it. Still more recently a bust of Abraham Lincoln has been sent to Hingham parish church by the descendants of Lincoln now living in America.

These gifts are an indication of a real community of interests between the mother and daughter towns. Last autumn the townsfolk of the American "village" felt that the time had come when more vital evidence should be given of the kinship and friendship between the two widely sundered centres. The daughter settlement felt that she ought to help her parent town in her distress, and an appeal was sent to every resident in the American town. This resulted in a collection of £300 for the alleviation of suffering, and for the help of those who are crippled by the war. This fund is to be administered by the Hingham Parish Council. Towards the end of October a town's meeting is to be held, at which the Rev. Lawrence Redfern will hand over the gift on behalf of the American donors. Needless to say, the residents of Hingham are delighted with the thoughtful sympathy and generosity of their American friends.

UNION FOR SOCIAL SERVICE.

The following letter has been sent by the Rev. H. H. Johnson, Secretary of the Union for Social Service of the Members of Unitarian, Free Christian and Kindred Churches, to the secretaries of the District Associations :—

Our Committee are eager that the District Associations should call together meetings for the consideration of our recently issued course on Social Questions, a copy of which I send you by separate packet. We have already arranged for such meetings in connection with the Liverpool and Northumberland Associations. We greatly hope that you will feel able to call together such a meeting for the consideration of the course and for the promotion of its study among your group of churches. The Interdenominational Conference of Social Service Unions is organising during the winter in our large centres conferences upon the 'Scheme of Christian Reconstruction' which appeared in our April quarterly. I enclose a copy, together with the Course. This Scheme also might well be considered and studied in all our churches. Copies of it can now be obtained in pamphlet form, with a preface by the Bishop of Oxford, of Miss Lucy Gardner, 92 St. George's Square, London, S.W.1. We should be prepared to send a speaker if you are able to arrange for a meeting.

The Autumnal Meetings of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association will be held in the East Lancashire district, with Padiham as a centre, from Saturday, October 27, to Monday, October 29. The deputation from the Association will consist of the President and several members of the Committee. Full details of the programme will be issued immediately.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Belfast.—At a gathering of members of the Mountpottinger Unitarian congregation in the schoolroom on Wednesday evening, September 26, a presentation was made to Mr. Edgar R. Jackson, Treasurer of the church, on the occasion of his marriage with Miss E. M. Buckley of Leeds, a member of Mill Hill Chapel. Miss Davidson, who made the presentation, extended a cordial welcome to Mrs. Edgar Jackson upon her entry into the Mountpottinger congregation, and the Rev. Matthew Watkins, the Rev. J. Kelly of Dunmurry, Mr. Thomas, Dr. Munn, and Mr. D. Young, jun., also spoke. A desk chair was presented later to Mr. Jackson on behalf of the Sunday scholars.

Birkenhead.—The first of a series of Religious Conferences arranged by the Liverpool District Missionary Association will be held at Bessborough Road Church, Birkenhead, on Saturday, October 20. A devotional service at 4 o'clock will be conducted by the Rev. J. C. Hirst (President of the Association), followed by tea, and at 6 o'clock Mr. William Hewitt, B.Sc., will preside over a Conference on 'Immortality,' when the speakers will be the Chairman, the Rev. Henry Gow, and the Rev. A. E. Parry.

Cambridge.—The Unitarian services which are held during term time in the Assembly Hall, Downing Street, will be resumed on the first Sunday of Michaelmas Term, October 14. For the first four Sundays of Term the preacher will be the Rev. W. H. Drummond, and on later Sundays the Rev. J. M. Connell of Lewes, the Rev. A. H. Biggs, M.A., L.L.M., of Ilford, the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie (Secretary of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association), the Rev. Basil Martin, M.A., of Finchley, and the Rev. C. Sharpe of Wood Green. With the consent of the Provincial Assembly of London and the South-Eastern Counties Mr. Drummond has accepted an invitation to take personal oversight of the services for the present, and will himself take four of the services every term. It is requested that the names and addresses of students connected with any of our churches who are coming into residence may be sent to him at 23 Cannon Place, Hampstead, London, N.W.3., or to the Hon. Secretary, Mr. W. L. Reale, 6 De Freville Avenue, Cambridge.

Harvest Festivals. — Further reports of Harvest Thanksgiving Services have been received from Chester (Matthew Henry's Chapel), Colne, Mottram, Dewsbury, Northiam, and Tenterden.

Huddersfield.—The Fitzwilliam Street Social Union has prepared an attractive programme for the autumn and winter season. The Union has played a great part in stimulating interest in intellectual and progressive movements in Huddersfield, and it has now 200 members on its roll. Some of the lectures will be given in the Town Hall (as, for instance, that by Lord Leverhulme on 'Industrial Problems of To-day and After,' November 28; Sir T. P. Whittaker, M.P., on 'Some Problems of Empire Federation,' February 20; and 'Some Changes in Higher Education,' by the Marquess of Crewe, March 6). Others will be given in the Temperance Hall, and the remainder in the Fitzwilliam Street Schoolroom. Among the lecturers who have not been mentioned already are Sir J. Compton Rickett, M.P., Lady Barlow, the Earl of Sandwich, Lord Headley, and Sir Robert Pearce, M.P. The Union has neither sectarian nor party bias, and its chief object is to promote frank and friendly discussion of vital subjects in regard to which it is of the greatest importance that people should exchange their opinions in an atmosphere of mutual understanding and goodwill.

Leeds: Hunslet.—After a ministry of four years the Rev. Frank Coleman has resigned on accepting the vacant pulpit at Burnley. His resignation, which will take effect at the end of the year, has been accepted with much regret.

Liverpool.—The syllabus of the Social Problem Circle in connection with Hope Street Church for the autumn session includes lectures by Mr. G. Lowes Dickinson, Mr. George G. Armstrong, Judge Henry Neil (Chicago), and Mr. Joseph Bibby, Editor of Bibby's Annual. Among those who have promised to lecture during the next session (January-March) are Miss Maude Royden, Mr. J. A. Hobson, and Mr. G. D. H. Cole.

Manchester District Sunday School Association.—The scheme of lectures for Sunday school teachers offered by the Unitarian Home Missionary College to Sunday schools, through the medium of the Manchester District Sunday School Association, is now complete, forty-one lecture fixtures having been made, and the lectures have already begun. The lecturer is the Warden of the College, the Rev. H. McLachlan, M.A., B.D., and the subjects and courses offered are: (1) 'The Use of the Bible in the Sunday Schools' (4 lectures); (2) 'Chapters from the History of Unitarianism in England' (4 lectures); (3) 'History as a Subject of Sunday School Teaching' (2 lectures); (4) 'The Formation of Teachers' Reference Libraries' (1 lecture). These lectures were offered to groups of schools and to Sunday School Unions in the Manchester District, the Liverpool district, the districts of Bury, Bolton, North-East Lancashire, North Cheshire, and Sheffield. In the Manchester district the schools are divided and grouped in connection with three convenient centres, viz.: Upper Brook Street, Pendleton, and Oldham Road, and the subjects chosen are Nos. 1 and 3 on the Bible, and History; the Bury district centres are Bank Street, Bury, Heywood, and Stand, No. 2 subject—'History of Unitarianism'; the North Cheshire centres are Stalybridge and Gee Cross (Hyde), No. 1 subject—'The Use of the Bible'; the Sheffield district centres, Upper Chapel and Mexboro' and Rotherham, No. 1 subject—'The Use of the Bible'; Liverpool district, Hope Street centre, subjects Nos. 1 and 3—on 'The Use of the Bible' and of 'History'; North and East Lancashire, Accrington, 'The Use of the Bible.' The lectures have been offered to about ninety-four schools, and most of these are sending teachers to the lecture centres arranged for them. The dates fixed range from September 22 to December 19. This experiment of close co-operation of the College with the Manchester District Sunday School Association for the assistance of our school teachers has begun well and is full of good promise for the future.

Mansfield.—The Rev. C. M. Wright has resigned his position at the Old Meeting House, having accepted a unanimous invitation to the Ancient Chapel of Toxteth, Liverpool. He hopes to commence his new duties in January.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

The address for our Belgian Hospital Fund, to which cheques and parcels of clothing should be sent, is Mrs. Bernard Allen, 14 Gainsborough Gardens, Hampstead, N.W.3.

THERE has been a good deal of windy talk about reprisals for air-raids, and it is stated that the Prime Minister has made a somewhat violent statement on the subject. There is, we fear, a small but noisy section of the public which is really anxious to adopt a policy of an eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth, not for military reasons, but because it will gratify the instinct of vengeance. We are not surprised that angry passions have been roused, and we have no intention of adopting any tone of superior virtue in circumstances of the most savage provocation. We have expressed our admiration of the courage and self-control of our people many times in these Notes, and we are in no mood to lecture them for faults of temper and judgment to which everybody is liable who knows what it is to smart with a sense of intolerable outrage. But having said this, we feel it right to state quite simply and plainly that we believe that any indulgence of the desire of vengeance for its own sake or any policy of frightfulness for the civilian population of Germany, just to pay them back, would be wrong in itself and destructive of our own self-respect.

OF course these remarks do not apply to the policy of raids into Germany for the achievement of a definitely military object. The destruction of communications and means of supply is the most deadly blow which we can inflict upon the armed forces of the enemy. Well organised raids may result in the maximum of injury with the minimum of bloodshed, and we welcome every indication that we are in a position to prosecute them with vigour without weakening our air service elsewhere.

WE have read General Smuts's speech on this subject with a good deal of misgiving. He referred to the very bitter temper which is growing up in the country, and pleaded that the Government can no longer resist the popular demand that we should apply to the enemy the bombing policy which he has applied to us. It is clear from the apologetic tone in which this announcement was made that it offends some deep-seated moral instinct. The following remarks give us a little reassurance, for they indicate that what he has in view is not a policy of indiscriminate terrorism, but the pursuit of important military objectives. "I look upon these developments of the art of war," he said, "as utterly bad and immoral, and, while I do not fear them, if as in the present case they are forced upon us, yet I should infinitely prefer that both sides could desist from such cruel practices. We shall do our best to avoid the German abominations, and in an air offensive against the military and industrial centres of the enemy we shall use every endeavour to spare as far as is humanly possible the innocent and the defenceless, who have always in the past enjoyed the protection of international law. But it is inevitable that in any extended aerial offensive into the enemy territory into which we have now been forced they shall to some extent also suffer, and I can only express my deepest regret at these developments which have been forced on us."

* * *

THE noble gift of Chequers Court to the nation, in order that it may serve as a country home for the Prime Minister, will cause the name of Sir Arthur Lee to be long and gratefully remembered. It is not only the intrinsic beauty of its situation and the quietude of a country-side still unspoilt by the inroads of modern wealth, which make it a suitable place of rest. The whole neighbourhood is one of inspiring political memories. Democrats may find some satisfaction in the thought that succeeding Prime Ministers will have Hampden and Cromwell, Milton and Burke, among the names with the first claim upon their local veneration. Even a reactionary Minister will hardly be able to resist the influence of these giants and protagonists of freedom.

A DETERMINED effort is being made in the United States to concentrate all the energies of the nation upon the task of the war. With the full approval of President Wilson a League for National Unity has been formed, representing religious, political and industrial organisations. In an address to the leaders of the movement on Monday the President discouraged all talk about peace at the present time. The war, he said, could only end when Germany is beaten and Germany's rule of autocracy and might is superseded by the ideals of democracy. He urged them to avoid being misled into byways of thought and the resultant scattering of the force of public opinion, and described the talk of an early peace before Germany is defeated as an evidence of "misdirected thought."

THE movement for the reform of the Divorce Laws is one in which religious people ought to take a serious and intelligent interest. Many of us refuse to consider the subject because it is unpleasant and in an indirect way it seems to cast a slur upon our ideal of what married life ought to be. There is also an element of strong ecclesiastical opposition, which has certainly been successful in arousing some emotional prejudice even among people who upon other matters would object to any controlling influence on the part of Canon Law over the law of the State. A serious agitation has been started in the country by the Divorce Law Reform Union, its immediate object being to mitigate the evil and misery which have arisen from separation orders by making permanent separation into a valid plea for divorce. A strong case has been made out for it on the ground of social expediency, and it is only fair to ask the religious objector to remember that permission to marry again is a very different thing from advising people to do so. The Catholic Church is at liberty to impose any discipline it likes upon its own members in these matters. When legal penalties are removed the opportunity for voluntary obedience begins. The difficulty for the ecclesiastical mind, when it is forced to abandon its reliance upon law and a long social tradition, is to find any verdict of the living conscience to which it can appeal.

The report of the Cinema Commission, which was appointed by the National Council of Public Morals, has just been issued. Its conclusions are practical and business-like, and do not suggest the existence of any serious moral abuses. In that respect they are distinctly reassuring. Various recommendations are made in the interest of children to prevent eye-strain, over-crowding and insufficient light. The Commissioners express themselves as strongly in favour of a State censorship, for the following reasons:—"For its own protection as well as for the ensuring of its continued suitability to the nation, the cinema should have the support and the official countenance of the State. We want to place it in a position of real dignity. We want it to be something more than a trade; in fact, we want it to be one of the assets of our national entertainment and recreation. We are anxious that the cinema should be beyond all suspicion in the mind of the average member of the public."

At a meeting of the Eastbrook Brotherhood, Bradford, last Sunday Sir Arthur Conan Doyle stated that the effect of the war upon his own mind, combined with the study of psychical phenomena, had been to destroy his materialism and to make religion a very real thing to him. Psychical phenomena, he contended, provided us with knowledge which must deeply modify our religious views and make religion a very real thing, no longer a matter of faith but of actual experience. This knowledge made it obvious that Christianity must change or perish. It has delayed the change overlong, until the Churches were half-empty, women its chief supporters, and both the learned classes and the poorest were largely alienated from it. If there was no Fall of Man—and all the evidence was that from the beginning Man had been on the ascent—what became of a large part of Christian philosophy? As for the death of Christ, it was no uncommon thing for a man to lay down his life for others. Our boys were doing it every day in France. Every religion had its martyr, and the death of Christ, beautiful as it was in the Gospel narrative, seemed to assume undue importance. Far too much stress, in his opinion, had been laid on the death of Christ and too little on his life.

THE FRUIT OF PEACE.

A challenge to clear thinking when we are in danger of losing our way among vague generalities is one of the gifts which we expect to receive at the hands of Dr. Jacks. The gift may be good without being exactly pleasant, for there are moods when we like to take our ease in Zion, or in other words to avoid testing our ideals by bringing them into sharp contact with facts. That is the weakness of a great deal of religious idealism and of our devotion to social utopias. Almost we persuade ourselves that if we could abolish war the kingdom of heaven would be at hand. This conclusion may be agreeable to our feelings; but one thing is certain, for most of us it does not rest upon carefully sifted thought.

It is this emotional charm, with its strange hypnotic effect upon thought, which has given such vogue to the phrase that this is a war to end war. It is comparatively easy to attribute most of our woes to militarism and to accept the programme of a League of Nations as their certain remedy, until we try to frame an intelligible picture in our minds of the disappearance of greed and lust and hardness of heart from the life of modern London, just because men have beaten their swords into ploughshares and the Kaiser is no more. It is to this complacent mood that Dr. Jacks addresses himself in the striking article on 'The War-Made Empires and the Martial Races of the Western World' in the current number of The Hibbert Journal. He is of course no apologist for war, and the last thing he wishes to do is to dash our eager hopes of peace; but seeing as he does with his acute powers of social analysis the immense difference which universal peace would make to human life, both corporate and individual, he wishes to provoke us to searching thought upon the subject, lest we should be guilty of drifting into changes, which involve a radical transformation of Western civilisation, with minds wholly unprepared. "On every ground, political, economic, psychological and moral," he writes, "the abolition of war stands for one of the greatest changes in human life that could be undertaken, or even imagined. Broadly speaking, nothing would be left as it was. If we abolish war we pull out the linch-pin of empire, we alter the basis of all national groupings, we give a new goal to industrial endeavour, we deny a field of exercise to one of the most active among the acquired characteristics of mankind. Changes of this magnitude may be necessary in a world which has lost its way. But it cannot be wise to incur them blindly."

It is not our purpose to do more than call attention to the grave importance of this point of view at the present time. The article in the compactness of its structure defies analysis, and we have no intention of trying to reduce the contents of 18 pages into a few lines for the sake of the indolent reader. We may venture, however, upon a few collateral reflections of our own. Sympathising as we do with the combined boldness and caution of Dr. Jacks's position, we think he has shown a sound instinct for the realities of the situation in issuing this sharp challenge at a time when talk and speculation about peace are in the air. Naturally there is a good deal of weariness of the war in our hearts, and many of us shrink almost instinctively from facing the truth that the next six months may cost us more than any which have gone before in their drain upon all our vital resources. We are tempted to cast about for some way of escape, or to snatch at the gift of peace without paying this bitter price. But we know that this is only possible in an unreal world where sentiment gilds the surface of ugly facts, or on the basis of a deliberate compromise with things which we hate and despise. We might value such a peace from the strictly personal point of view because it would give us a sense of relief from intolerable strain, and satisfy the vague idealism which has infected our minds; but it has in it no hope for the world.

If we are going to introduce the love of peace into the structure of human society, and give men a deep horror of war which will last long after the vivid personal memories of the present hour have passed away, we must be careful that it is the right kind of peace. There must be in it no taint of meanness or disloyalty or compromise with wrong. It must spring, not out of our weariness and disgust, not even primarily out of our intense hatred of war, but from our faith in things which are nobler, more heroic and more exacting in their demands upon our disciplined obedience than the highest virtues of the soldier. Such a peace is not a means of escape from hardship into pleasant paths of ease and security. There is about it both the sternness and the joy of a new vision of God's purpose for the world, a purpose in which we have our own difficult part to play.

The peace at which we snatch because we are tired and disillusioned can never do more than purchase a short breathing-space in the tumult of war. Hasty, ill-conceived work of this kind is not the real task of the peace-maker at all, and it can have little influence in modifying either individual desires or the policy of States. Just in proportion as we realise the possibilities of peace as a new principle of moral harmony and co-operative endeavour in the life of nations, the more definite our refusal must be to accept any counterfeit in its place or to spoil its influence by our impatience. The changes which may follow upon the abolition of war in the whole organisation of human society must be for us chiefly matters of speculation and prophecy. We may give some initial impetus to currents of thought and endeavour, which in some far-off day will alter the face of the world; but the task itself in its growth and completion must be left to the slow weaving of the centuries. In spite of all our positive statements no one can tell whether this is a war to end war or not. Our part is simply so to think and act that it may be so, first of all by pressing forward to a crowning victory, and then by throwing all the energies which are released from the instant tasks of war into mental fight and the social responsibilities of peace. Here is work which all wise men will acknowledge is harder and more baffling than anything which the human race has attempted hitherto.

THOUGHTS ON PRAYER.

To the Editor of THE INQUIRER.

SIR,—I have been following with much interest the discussion on "Prayer" in the last few weeks' INQUIRERS, and this week I should like to thank Mr. Pike for his excellent little commonsense "summing up" of the case, and you yourself for your interesting article. All along it has seemed to me that some of your correspondents have strangely missed the point. As Mr. Pike says, "a prayer which does not rise from the heart spontaneously is no prayer." Surely half a mother's joy would vanish if her little one never asked her for anything (realising that she would provide "all things needful.") Even foolish requests—and ones that are impossible to grant—are dear to the father and mother. Can we not think that our Heavenly Father likes to have His "children" bring their wants to Him? And not many grown up people, I should imagine, pray for the material gift, or change in the order of things, which some of your correspondents quote as the chief burden of prayer, but for the spirit in which to meet, endure, resist—or make the best use of — these material things. I think there is no need for me to labour the point that such spiritual answers to prayers are constantly—may I not say, where the prayer has been real invariably—granted. In fact, as you so clearly and truly put it, things wrong to ask in prayer soon "shrivel into silence as we pray," or to use Hartley Coleridge's beautiful words at the close of his Sonnet on Prayer:—

Whate'er is good to wish, ask that of Heaven,
Tho' it be what thou canst not hope to see:
Pray to be perfect, tho' material leaven
Forbid the spirit so on earth to be:
But if for any wish thou dar'st not pray,
Then pray to God to cast that wish away.

Yours, &c., M. WOLFF.

PICTURES FOR FEEBLE-MINDED CHILDREN.

To the Editor of THE INQUIRER.

SIR,—You kindly allowed me, some time ago, to appeal to your readers for toys for our children, of whom there are at present 262. Owing to the prior claims of the Belgian children, the response, though welcome, was small. I shall be grateful if you will permit me to make known another want. The children occupy between 30 and 40 rooms. These are fairly well supplied with pictures, but there is not a single religious picture among them. We would like very much to have a few large framed religious pictures, preferably coloured, and such as would appeal to children. Possibly some of your readers may have pictures of the kind which they have relegated to the spare room or to an attic, but which they would be willing to send to us. Unframed pictures suitable for the Sunday school would also be acceptable.—Yours, &c.,

WEEKLY NOTES.

EXTRACT from a letter from an English nurse at a hospital for amputation cases: "The weather has turned bitterly cold and stormy, and the poor men who come to the surgery each morning are frozen, with often only a cotton shirt. They seem to have no warm things in the store room, and when they are maimed and paralysed they feel the cold fearfully in their wounds. I do so hope I shall be able to get up my Christmas tree, as they have never had a fête, and that you will be able to spare me something from the Belgian Hospital Fund for it. Forgive my troubling you again, but I do want the things now it has turned cold. Some packs of cards would be very acceptable, if I might have some. The evenings are so long."

Three bales of warm shirts, socks, stump covers and various small comforts, are already on the way, and I hope the nurse will receive them soon now. I am sending off a few packs of cards and various small things by post at once. But I want a great many mufflers, mittens, cardigans, or anything of that sort, so that I can send them before the real winter weather sets in. In the present state of our Funds, we cannot help with the Christmas tree, but if any one cares to send me little gifts for it, I will gladly forward them. There are 2,000 men there! ROSE ALLEN.

SPECIAL WANTS.

Pyjamas, shirts, socks, and all sorts of men's underclothing.
Mufflers, cardigans, slippers.
Clothing for women and children.
Games, jigsaw puzzles, old tennis balls.

The name and address of sender and list of contents should be enclosed in each parcel.

Contributions of money and clothing should be sent to Mrs. Bernard Allen, 14 Gainsborough Gardens, Hampstead, N.W.3.

DR. JACKS AT THE CITY TEMPLE.

DR. JACKS was not favoured by the weather when he preached at the City Temple on Thursday week. It was a very wet morning, and shortly before the service began there were only a few worshippers scattered through the huge building, which looked somewhat cheerless and sombre, the bright hues of the Union Jack and the Stars and Stripes against a background of purple cloth at the back of the pulpit being all the more conspicuous by reason of the general lack of colour. When the hour of noon struck, however, and the service began, the number had been considerably augmented, and it was really remarkable to see how many people—principally men, and almost all of these, of course, past middle age—had mustered, in spite of the pouring rain. The service on Thursday morning is quite simple, with only one lesson and two hymns, a solo being also rendered by a member of the choir.

The prayer, "for our country and for all who are in sorrow and anxiety by reason of the war," was a fitting prelude to the address, which, although it could not have been described as a "war-sermon," dealt with the conditions created by the war which are calling forth so many expressions of hope and idealism at the present time. Taking the words "Charity never faileth" for a text, Dr. Jacks showed how utterly inadequate all our schemes of reconstruction and our plans for social reform, for political activities on newer and broader lines, and for the revival of religion would be, if the spirit which underlay Paul's wonderful utterance did not permeate our hearts and give power to our efforts. The war had caused us all to think more intensely and earnestly than ever before about everything in heaven and in earth, and it had also brought more fellowship and sympathy into our lives. They could trace a new spirit of toleration among the thinkers, a new disposition to help rather than hinder one another in the quest for the light which all so sorely needed. There was also an immense output of good ideas for the improvement of the world in all quarters. Plans, programmes, schemes, were pouring into the press from the platform and the pulpit, and these indicated that everything was, in future, to be better arranged. The question, however, that occurred to the mind was this: What would come of all this eager thinking? How many of these good ideas would take root and bear fruit in due season? If the world could reform itself to half the extent that had been outlined, that would be a great step towards the Kingdom of God. But would this happen? What would the world have to show hereafter as the practical proof of this immense intellectual activity which the war had stimulated? His own answer to this question was that nothing comparable to what ought to come of it all would result from it unless the "charity that never faileth" was at the back of it. Good ideas did not work themselves out automatically or by virtue of some magic power which truth possessed. It was too often thought that they did, but this was a disastrous delusion. If good ideas worked themselves out automatically the present war would never have taken place. The truth which might have prevented it had been in the world for 2,000 years at the very least, and had been familiar all over Europe for many centuries. If time availed, he could tell them of a hundred great ideas which had come to little or nothing, not because they were not true, for they were, but because they lacked the power which would give them effect. Everything came back at last to the question of power, and this was what Paul was driving at in the chapter they had read. He told them that good ideas, even if they were proclaimed with the tongue of men and of angels, even if they were assisted by the gift of prophecy, and attested by dramatic acts of self-immolation like giving one's body to be burned, were as sounding brass and tinkling cymbals unless rooted in the source of power. There was nothing in the whole Bible which came home more closely to modern men and women than this, for we had pinned our faith to good ideas too much while neglecting the means of putting them into effect.

Now, the source of power was Charity, Dr. Jacks continued, and that word he would himself translate as the spirit of good-fellowship. It meant loyalty not only to your country but to your neighbour. It meant taking a generous view of your neighbour's merit instead of a mean and censorious view; trusting your neighbour to play fair instead of thinking every man you meet is a rogue; standing to your neighbour in such an attitude that each can take pleasure in the existence of the other. When that kind of charity was active and became the temper of a whole community, there was the power that made good ideas effective, that enabled men to pull through by enabling them to pull together. Bad fellowship was another name for social mistrust, and they would never get any machinery for imposing peace, or reforming mankind, or improving relations between different sections of the community unless mutual loyalty, confidence, and respect existed among the individuals and classes concerned. Democracy itself was an affair of charity at bottom—an "affair of the heart," and its aim was just to establish the spirit of good fellowship between man and man, and make that spirit effective everywhere. Much could be done by the spoken and written word, but that alone would not suffice. Something more than propaganda was required in order to bring charity into the world. In the sphere of our control there were forces at work which were steadily pressing on towards the closer fellowship of the human race, and even in the midst of this awful struggle they might see these forces fulfilling themselves. The outstanding fact of the war was that in every belligerent country and in every neutral country the human heart was in hot rebellion against the whole business. In spite of all the sacrifices that were being made there never was a time in the history of the world when war was so bitterly hated as at the present moment, never a time when men were so ardently longing for the hour to strike when good fellowship might again become the law of life. The war did not reflect human nature; human nature abhorred it, just as the prodigal abhorred the situation into which his conduct had brought him. This loathing was the biggest truth about human nature which the war had revealed, and it was the thing which was going to determine the future more than anything else. It was in this way that God came into human life—with power, and that power they could all feel at work at the present time. There never was more loyalty and mutual trust and charity than there was in the world to-day, if men would open their hearts to let it come in. And nothing but this spirit of fellowship would save us. The motto with which the war was started in Germany, "world dominion or downfall," must be changed into "good will or downfall." Civilisation was at the parting of the ways. It must either choose good-will, or perish.

THE PROVINCIAL ASSEMBLY OF LONDON AND THE SOUTH EASTERN COUNTIES.

ANNUAL MEETING AT FINCHLEY.

The twenty-ninth annual meeting of the Assembly was held on Tuesday, October 9, at the Unitarian Church, Granville Road, Finchley. At 3 o'clock the Business Meeting took place, the President, Mr. E. R. Fyson, in the chair. The minutes and the roll call were taken as read, and the Secretary, the Rev. Gordon Cooper, presented the Annual Report, which it had been decided not to print owing to the necessity for strict economy.

Annual Report.

The committee records once more a year of quiet and patient work. Several pulpits have been filled, with every prospect that the settlement in each case will have fruitful results. The congregations of Guildford and Godalming have been united under the ministry of the Rev. Priestley Prime, and it is hoped that this experiment, which is being watched with great interest, will help to maintain the good work done by the late Rev. H. Clarke, formerly minister of Mead Row Chapel, Godalming, and also draw together a new congregation at Guildford. At Newbury another experiment has been tried. The pulpit having become vacant on the resignation of the Rev. R. Newell, who has removed to Pudsey, the suggestion was made that a student-ministry should be formed in connection with Manchester College, Oxford. The idea commended itself warmly both to the congregation and to Dr. Jacks, and the pulpit was supplied from January to June by students. Mr. V. A. Demant, the late Senior Student, who completed his College course at Midsummer, has now been appointed minister.

A more convenient room has been found at Tunbridge Wells for the meetings of the congregation there, and through the kindness of the Rev. S. Burrows, who has assumed responsibility for the services, this has been suitably furnished and decorated. The Rev. A. H. Dolphin is now minister of the Lewisham congregation in succession to the Rev. W. C. C. Pope, who has removed to Croydon after completing twenty years at Lewisham; the Rev. F. Cottier has been appointed to the pulpit at Chatham, rendered vacant by the resignation of Dr. Hitchcock, and the Rev. H. Maguire begins his ministry at Billingshurst this month. To all the ministers who have recently settled in the province the committee offers a hearty welcome.

Reference is made with great regret to the death of the following members of the Assembly, who in their several ways have rendered it such valuable help: the Rev. Thomas Elliot, for many years one of the best known of our lay preachers, and for a short period minister at Southend; the Rev. Hubert Clarke, who, as minister of the Godalming congregation, did such excellent work and was so greatly beloved; Mr. Walter Baily, who acted as Treasurer to the Assembly in its early days, and held the office for many years; and Mr. E. Wilkes Smith, another lay preacher, who took an active interest in the life and work of the churches. The Minister of the Assembly has recently been invited by the British and Foreign Unitarian Association to assume the oversight of the services at Cambridge for the coming year, and, the Committee having agreed to this request, Mr. Drummond will preach there on four Sundays in each term during the coming year, and arrange for the supply of the pulpit on the other Sundays. Owing to the absence of several lay preachers on war service the Minister has had unusual difficulty in making suitable arrangements for the supply of the pulpits for which the committee is responsible. More work has fallen on the older members of the Lay Preachers Union. The committee desires to thank them most heartily for their loyal and faithful services under the trying conditions which have prevailed throughout the past year. The Report closes with an appeal for further support in order that the activities of the Assembly may be maintained. The balance due to the Treasurer has risen from £1 18*s.* 6*d.* to £21 6*s.* during the year. This is due partly to the great increase in travelling expenses over the wide area covered by the Assembly.

The financial statement was presented by the Treasurer, Mr. E. Worthington, who appealed for renewed support.

The President, in moving the adoption of the Reports, extended a cordial welcome to the representatives of kindred associations who were present, and touched upon some of the items in the Committee's Report which gave some idea of what the Assembly had been able to accomplish during the past year. There was always, he said, a constant stream of work and influence going out from the Assembly through their Minister, and it was their constant effort to live up to their ideal of being a bond of union between the weak and the strong churches, rendering help to the smaller churches scattered throughout the province which carry on their work under great difficulties. He sympathised very much with them in their endeavour to keep the flag of liberal Christianity flying in these anxious times, and had great admiration for the faithful few who gathered together every Sunday for worship. If the work of the Assembly was worth doing, as it was, it was worth doing well, with all the energy and ability and resources they could command. They did not always quite deserve success, and when he visited churches sometimes where there was some lack of business methods, or some slackness in attending to little things, which were indications of the kind of life in the church, then he felt that those places wanted rousing up. What was needed was what orthodox friends would call a "rebaptism of the Holy Spirit," which might be interpreted as a more vital realisation of the great ideals for which they stood. There were tens of thousands of people in this country who had given up going to church altogether because they had lost the old faith of their childhood and had nothing to put in its place. It was part of their work to bring these people back into religious life and fellowship. They were better equipped for this than other churches, they had a magnificent literature which was not half as well known as it might be to the man in the street, and he considered it was their bounden duty to spread their living, rational faith among the people to-day. An urgent need was felt for closer co-operation among the Churches of Christ, and they ought to play their part in making known the underlying bond of union which would bring them together. The barriers were not so high as they were. In the presence of human sorrow and suffering the different denominations were discovering that they were all seeking the same thing and serving the same Master.

Dr. Hargrove seconded the motion. Judging by their numbers and the money they raised, he said, they were practically nowhere, in comparison with some of the greater religious organisations; but they represented one of the grandest causes in the world. At the present time religion was passing through the fire and being tested as it had never been tested before, and they were being tested with the rest. He maintained that they were standing the test. From all he could hear and read it seemed clear that what was really appealing most to the soldiers was what we commonly called Unitarianism. They knew nothing about the name, but they grasped the simple faith in God the Father.

The Rev. W. H. Drummond, Minister of the Assembly, following the practice adopted last year, presented no formal report, but gave a short address in which he laid special stress upon the growth of friendly relations between himself and members of the scattered churches in the province which he regarded as one of the most fruitful results of his work. In some parts of the province much anxiety had been caused by the fact that they had been more exposed than many other places to the attentions of the enemy, and this had naturally increased their difficulties. There had also been special difficulty owing to the fact that their brightest and most earnest young Lay Preachers were away in the Army, or engaged on some special war work, and they had been obliged to call upon the older men oftener than was always quite convenient to them. They owed a great deal to the latter for the way in which they had responded, undertaking long journeys under conditions which, as those who travelled much on Sundays knew, were often very tiring. Owing to their faithful help, so far as he knew there had not been a single service in the province since the war began for which a preacher had not been found. Of the religious work resulting from the gathering together Sunday by Sunday of the small congregations dotted all over the province, many of them with noble traditions though they might be few in number, it was impossible to speak. To help the work which they did was to help the national life at the present time in the best possible way.

The officers were re-appointed and the committee elected, and the following were elected to serve on the Advisory Committee—the Revs. J. Wood, J. Harwood and F. K. Freeston, and Mr. Montgomery, K.C. Mr. Worthington expressed the cordial appreciation of the committee for the great courtesy, tact, sympathy and kindliness with which Dr. Blake Odgers, who has retired from the committee, had carried out his duties for the long period during which he had held office.

Conference on Prayer.

The Rev. Lawrence Clare, who opened the Conference, said the subject was one of great importance because prayer was the central act of religion, the very life of the soul. It had been described as the breathing of the soul, and it was indeed that without which the soul could not live any more than the body could exist without fresh air. In another sense it might be regarded as the giving to God of the opportunity to deal with the soul, for God did not force his spiritual gifts upon us; they were dependent upon our receptivity. Prayer partly determined the direction of the flow of spiritual power and grace, and, as the supreme act of religion, skill should be exercised in it. The methods of prayer which obtained so largely, especially in Nonconformist churches, were very defective, and they did not take the subject seriously enough. Nor were they all certain of its method of working; but if there was one thing certain in the universe it was that prayer offered for the right things, and in the right way, never failed of its result. The question for them was, not "Why should a reasonable man pray?" which, as had been said in The Inquirer, "sounded like the echo of a forgotten debate," but "How shall we pray, so that our prayer may prevail?" The speaker went on to say that prayer varied according to a man's conception of God. For some, God was something outside themselves; others conceived of Him as the Dweller in the Innermost, and felt that by searching in their own soul they discovered that something or someone that was inseparable from God. They would find that their prayers would gain immensely in living force if they took the latter view, rather than groping amongst the stars for a cosmic power unrelated to themselves. God was manifest within us, and yet distinct from us, and it was necessary to listen to His voice in stillness and silence in addition to speaking to Him of our needs. Probably the greatest loss which they as a community had sustained was the neglect of the practice of meditation, for of all the forms of prayer this was infinitely the most powerful, because it gave the prayer some kind of content and made preparation for it. History proved that meditation had incredible power in moulding the lives of men so that they became to God "what a man's own hand is to a man." Things temporal were not, the speaker thought, wholly outside the sphere of prayer, but in temporal matters we really did not know what it was that we asked. There seemed to be a kind of grossness about the best prayers for material things, and even in regard to petitioning for immunity from evil or adversity the better way was to pray that we might have enough strength of soul to meet our trials, and be given the strange and wonderful power to turn them to glory. The deeper prayer of Christ was, not that the cup might pass from him, but rather "Thy will, not mine, be done."

The highest form of Christian prayer, Mr. Clare said in conclusion, was the desire for God Himself. No created things, however beautiful or grand, could satisfy the soul that sought to get behind everything to God. "Thou hast made us for ourselves and we cannot rest until we have found our rest in Thee." It was this that controlled and directed prayer, giving it the right orientation. Possessing it, we should naturally pray with fervour and confidence, turning from the things that are external, from all unstable conduct, and giving precedence to the spiritual things of God which had become the soul's desire.

Mrs. Travers Herford, in a moving address which brought the thoughts of those present back to the sorrowful needs of our time, pleaded that less reticence should be observed in speaking of such vital matters to young people, who are often allowed to go out into the world of temptation without one word to tell them what the power of prayer had meant to their forefathers. If prayer had been a common practice in the home, the familiar words would often come back in the midst of the day's toil and stress, and be of incalculable benefit. People had not always time to read much, and little capacity to put their deepest needs into words; but the prayer in the heart could be uttered in phrases that rose frequently to memory at any moment, and it might be that those far away were thinking of the same words, and that their prayers and ours would meet and mingle as they ascended to God.

The Rev. Basil Martin pointed out that, after all, prayer was petition, and that Jesus had taught us to seek and find—to ask in order that our request might be granted, and even, as one parable showed, to be importunate in our praying. The point was that there were things which it was impossible for us to have in the nature of things until we desired them, and that, as Holman Hunt tried to show in his picture, 'The Light of the World,' even Christ himself cannot enter the door of the heart until it is opened from the inside.

The Rev. J. M. Connell followed with a short address in which the idea of man's co-operation with God to make more fruitful the harvest of the spirit, as it made more productive the fields of grain, was beautifully brought out.

Mr. Ronald Jones pleaded that prayer was an irresistible instinct which people followed without being able to give logical reasons for it. All our wishes are desires in the heart, and if we felt that we could properly desire them, then we could and ought to put them into our prayers.

At the close of the Conference tea was served in the schoolroom, by the kind invitation of the Finchley congregation, who were cordially thanked for their hospitality.

A religious service was held at 7 o'clock, conducted by the Rev. J. H. Weatherall, who preached on 'The Regeneration of Religion.'

SOUTH-EAST WALES UNITARIAN SOCIETY.

The quarterly meeting of the above Society was held in the Glanrhondda Unitarian Chapel, Pentre, on Monday, October 1, at 2.30 p.m. In the unavoidable absence of the President the chair was taken by Mr. Gomer Ll. Thomas, J.P. The Executive Committee's report, presented to the meeting, contained a record of useful work done during the year. An item worthy of record in the re-opening of the chapel at Cwmbach for religious services. The chapel has been closed for some years, but in the spring of this year a small committee appointed by the Society met a few friends belonging to the Cwmbach Chapel, and after careful deliberation it was resolved to re-open the chapel for fortnightly Sunday evening services. Most of the ministers of the other churches affiliated with the Society offered their services in turn, and as a result services have been held for nearly six months, and the attendances have been very gratifying. Further arrangements are being made to continue the services through the coming winter. The Executive Committee, with the valued co-operation of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, have also been enabled to secure the services of Miss E. R. Lee, B.A., to take pastoral charge of the church at Pentre for the coming winter. Miss Lee began her ministry early in September, and the outlook is very promising.

A Religious Service was held in the chapel at 4.30 P.M. The Rev. W. Priestley Phillips (Bridgend) conducted the devotional part of the service, and the sermon was preached by the Rev. W. Tudor Jones (Bristol), his subject being 'Theory and Practice in Life and Religion.' After tea a public meeting was held to give a welcome to Miss Lee on taking oversight of the church at Pentre. Mr. Gomer Ll. Thomas again presided, and the proceedings began with the singing of a hymn. Mr. George Payne gave the welcome on behalf of the church. He gave a brief historical survey of the history of the church, and in closing assured Miss Lee of the hearty co-operation of its members. The Rev. E. R. Dennis, speaking on behalf of the ministers, extended a hearty welcome to the new minister, and said he felt sure that they would gladly welcome into their fellowship a lady minister, who would bring into her ministry better than men could the finer sensibilities of religion and life. Miss Lee was evidently moved as she acknowledged the warm welcome given to her.

Mr. W. Sutherland (Newport) spoke on 'A Layman's Duty to his Church,' and dealt, in a very effective way, with the value and need of co-operation in religious as in other work. Dr. Tudor Jones also addressed the meeting, which was closed by singing a hymn and the pronouncing of the benediction. Representatives were present from most of the affiliated churches and the whole series of meetings were most encouraging and stimulating.

MINISTERS' PENSION AND INSURANCE FUND.

A MEETING of the Board of Managers was held in London on Tuesday, the 9th inst. The Rev. Dr. Carpenter (chairman) presided. Two new Beneficiaries were elected. One Policy has to be re-assigned after payment of another premium, to a minister who has joined another denomination, and in another case the Policy for which special help had been given was reported as having matured. A war bonus of 10 per cent on the proportion payable by the Fund towards the Policies of Beneficiaries will be paid as previously. In view of the lamented death of Mr. Howard Chatfeild Clarke, who has acted as Treasurer from the foundation of the Fund, the following resolution was passed by a silent standing vote:—"The Board of Managers gratefully commemorate the unwearied service rendered by Mr. Howard Chatfeild Clarke, the late Treasurer of the Ministers' Pension and Insurance Fund ever since its foundation. His good judgment, his eminent business ability, his punctual discharge of all claims, his kindness and courtesy to his colleagues, and his sympathy with those for whose aid the Fund was established, made him an ideal administrator of those benefits; and the loss of his genial presence and wise guidance will long be deeply felt." To his sorrowing family the Managers have tendered, through their Chairman, an assurance of profound sympathy with them in their grievous bereavement. His brother, Sir Edgar Chatfeild Clarke, kindly offered to act as Treasurer pro tem., and the Managers with gratitude appointed him to that office pending more definite arrangements. The Board received with pleasure the intimation from one of our congregations that it intended to pay for its minister his proportion of premium for Pension Insurance, and it is hoped that this will be an inducement to other congregations to follow this good example.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Bolton.—The first of a series of fortnightly Conferences on the 'Practice of Religion' will be held in the Men's Room, at Bank Street School, on Wednesday, October 17, when Mr. J. B. Gass, J.P., will take the chair, and the Rev. J. C. Flower will explain in detail the object of the Conferences, and deal generally with 'Brotherhood as a Social and Religious Principle.' On October 31 Mr. I. Singer of Bradford will speak on 'The Theocracy of Jesus'; on Thursday, November 15, Mr. John Battle of Bolton on 'Brotherhood and Industry'; Wednesday, November 28, Mr. Alfred Pilling, J.P., on 'Brotherhood and Politics'; Wednesday, December 12, Mrs. Blincoe of Bolton on 'Women and Brotherhood.' The Conferences are specially designed for the members of the church, with a view to deepening the sense of comradeship in a great and difficult task, but those outside the immediate circle of the congregation who care to attend will be welcome.

Hale.—The Rev. Joseph Wain of Scarborough has accepted a cordial and unanimous invitation from the congregation of Hale Chapel, Altrincham, to become their minister, and will commence his duties there at the New Year.

Harvest Festivals.—Reports of Harvest Thanksgiving Services have been received this week from Bridgend, Cosely, Nantwich, and Nottage.

Hull.—On Sunday, September 30, the sermon at the morning service in Park Street Unitarian Church was preached by Mr. Fred Maddison, who took as his subject 'Religion and the War.' Speaking as a layman, without any pretensions to theological knowledge, he said that, first of all, this dreadful war raised no new problem. Magnitude did not affect it. One innocent infant suffering pain came into the same category as the killing of thousands. In each case God permitted it. The existence of evil in a world ruled by the Diety had baffled thinkers in all ages. The next point was that this war and all wars were man-made, exactly as all our sins were due to ourselves. No sane man blamed God if a man got drunk. We had the terrible gift of choice of good and evil—that made the responsibility of life. Too often had the churches added to the difficulties of earnest, thinking men by attributing the war to God's methods of punishing people for their sins.

Leeds: Holbeck.—The Holbeck Unitarian Chapel, Leeds, has lost a devoted member and supporter by the death of Mr. James Tempest at a nursing home on Thursday, September 27. Forty-five years ago he joined the Sunday School, and under the ministry of the Rev. Robert Wilkinson early associated himself with various activities, and revealed those characteristics which marked his loyalty and zeal, and won the respect of all who knew him. He took an active part in the united effort which resulted in the building of the present church and Sunday school premises, and saw the Domestic Mission become an independent and flourishing congregation. As scholar, teacher, and active supporter he shared with others the responsible duties, filled important offices as member of the Church Committee, and for several years until his decease was the respected Chairman. In commercial circles he was known as a leading member of the firm of Bentley & Tempest, cloth manufacturers, Armley Mills, and was generally esteemed for his integrity and character. His religious associations, however, always occupied a foremost place with him, and while generously supporting Holbeck Chapel and the local and district associations and unions, he was also Treasurer of the New Wortley Adult Sunday School. On Sunday evening, September 30, a Memorial Service was held at Holbeck Chapel, when the Rev. A. Cobden Smith spoke of the record of faithful service that would long enable them to cherish the example of Mr. James Tempest. The funeral took place on Monday, October 1, at Hill Top Cemetery, Armley, in the presence of a large gathering, and was conducted by the Revs. A. Cobden Smith and W. R. Shanks. The deepest sympathy has been widely shown to the widow and daughters in the great loss they have sustained.

Leytonstone.—Sunday last, October 7, was a red letter day for the Leytonstone congregation. As the outcome of the services which have been held under the auspices of the London District Society for five years a new independent church has been formed, called the Leytonstone Free Church. The first service was held on Sunday, the preacher being Mr. H. G. Chancellor, M.P. There was a good attendance in spite of prevailing adverse conditions, and Mr. Chancellor took for his text "God in His Temple" (2 Chron. vi. 18). The first rule of the new church states "that no member shall be asked to subscribe to any formal creed. While the majority accept and endeavour to follow the spirit of the founder of Christianity, membership shall be open to all who have a desire to live a practical religious life and to work in an unsectarian spirit of harmony and sympathy with all who seek the moral and spiritual betterment of the world." The Rev. J. Arthur Pearson has been asked to accept the Hon. Presidency of the new church, and the following executive officers have been elected: Chairman of Committee, Mr. J. W. Peterken; Treasurer, Dr. Sand; Hon. Secretaries, Miss M. B. Burtt and Mr. A. Stephen Noel; Steward, Mr. Walter Scott; Accompanist, Mrs. Peterken; Sunday School Secretary, Miss Dorice Peterken. It is proposed to continue to hold services at 6.30 P.M., except on the first Sunday in the month when a morning service at 11 will be held instead. The Sunday school, which was begun in April last, is making most satisfactory progress. Its weekly service is held on Sunday mornings from 11 to 12.

London: Kilburn.—We regret to announce the death of Mr. E. G. Locke, aged 83, an old and much respected member of the Quex Road Church, and one of its founders, as the result of an accident in which he was struck by a taxi-cab on Saturday, September 29. He was one of the old guard, and took part in many a struggle for right and truth and freedom. Much sympathy is felt for the members of the family.

London: Stamford Street Chapel.—The Rev. H. W. Stephenson, B.A., of Loughborough, has accepted a cordial invitation to Stamford Street Chapel and Blackfriars Mission.

MARRIAGE.

WELBY—FIELD.—On September 26, at Essex Church, Notting Hill Gate, W., by the Rev. Dr. Hargrove, late of Leeds, Herbert C. Welby, R.E., youngest son of the late Rev. C. H. Wellbeloved of Southport, Lancs., to Olive Mary Angel Field, eldest daughter of the late John Kingsford Field, Lambeth, London, and Mrs. Edwin R. Walker, Southport.

DEATHS.

DIXON.—On September 30, at 5 Queen's Terrace, Withernsea, East Yorks, Arnold Elphinstone Dixon, of Whitley Bay, Northumberland, husband of Alice M. Dixon, and elder son of the late Rev. J. M. Dixon, and of Mrs. Dixon of 46 Marlborough Avenue, Hull, and formerly of Dewsbury.

HOMER.—On October 2, at her home, Pedmore, Stourbridge, Jessie, wife of John Homer, and second daughter of the late George Atkins of Leicester.

PASSMORE.—On the 4th inst., suddenly, at Salisbury, Mabel Annie Passmore (recently of Deva Cottage, Alum Chine Road, Bournemouth), daughter of the late Frederick Eddy Passmore.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

The address for our Belgian Hospital Fund, to which cheques and parcels of clothing should be sent, is Mrs. Bernard Allen, 14 Gainsborough Gardens, Hampstead, N.W.3.

THE supporters of our Belgian Hospital Fund have never failed us yet, when we have asked for their help. We are confident that it is only necessary to call attention to what Mrs. Allen says in her Notes to-day for all cause of anxiety to be removed. The Belgian Army is holding its part of the line. It is exposed to continual bombardment, and the claims of the sick and wounded never cease. We have become accustomed to the situation, but the bitterness of exile does not grow any less for these men, and they are in continual need of the hospital equipment and the personal comforts which we can supply.

MRS. ALLEN mentions the need of money for the maintenance of the Maternity Home in Calais. This is a branch of our work which touches a chord of tender sympathy in many hearts, and we are pledged to support it as long as it is required and money is entrusted to us for the purpose. Many war charities, which were started with great enthusiasm, have had a short career and already are almost forgotten; but, through the generosity of our friends and Mrs. Allen's unflagging personal interest in the work, the Belgian Hospital Fund has gone steadily on its way, meeting fresh needs as they arise, and never forgetting that terrible suffering exists and requires our help, even when it has ceased to be novel and exciting. So we want it to be to the end. Nothing else could be worthy of ourselves or of the cause which it has been our privilege to serve.

* * *

THE extraordinary position which has arisen between ourselves and Holland, owing to her refusal to prohibit the conveyance through her territory of German sand and gravel which is being used for military purposes in Belgium, is a fresh illustration of the truth that the way of the neutral is hard. In a contest like the present neutrality may be defended by appeals to prudence or fear, but it can never be a noble attitude; for it is a refusal on grounds of policy to take sides, not in a political dispute, but in questions of principle which go down to the roots of civilisation. For Holland herself the victory of Germany would mean a permanent weakening of her independence, while the victory of the Allies would give her security. This must be quite plain to a large number of her citizens who are not blinded by motives of temporary commercial convenience. If the way of neutrals is hard, let them at least remember how much harder is the way of those who are fighting the battles of freedom for them.

SIR ARTHUR YAPP has undertaken a great publicity campaign on behalf of economy in the use of food. It is absolutely necessary that everybody in the country should realise that there is a real shortage of food in the country. This is not due primarily to the submarine campaign or the difficulties of transport. Millions of men have been withdrawn from agriculture and other profitable forms of industry, and the consequence is that there is too little food in the world for us all to eat and be full. Accordingly as good citizens of the world we must put ourselves on short rations, realising that none of us can consume more than our share without inflicting real privation upon somebody else. With care and proper organisation we need not be anxious about the minimum needful for health and strength, but anything beyond that is a crime against the public welfare and a base betrayal of our cause.

THE difficulty for most people is to know what their own share of the common stock really is, and it is here that Sir Arthur Yapp's publicity campaign, based upon a scientifically graded scheme of rationing, promises to be of use. He intends to establish a league or committee of national safety, the objects of which he described to a representative of The Times a few days ago. "It seems to me [he said] that we want to bring home to the people that our national safety and the Allied cause generally depend upon the extent to which we economise in food consumption, and very shortly I am going to call for 10,000 members to found a league. If the response to the call is what I expect, it will be followed by a second call for 100,000 members, and eventually I hope the league will be a million strong. The only way in which the campaign can be made effective, in my judgment, is by making it a national thing and getting everybody in the country who has any sense of responsibility actually to become workers in the campaign. When we get our first members of the league we shall ask them to do everything they possibly can to educate others. They will pledge themselves to live within the scale of rations laid down and to avoid waste, and by example and effort they will, I hope, enlist others to do the same thing."

WE have laid stress so often upon the need of cultivating a friendship with France based upon real knowledge of her social life and intellectual aims, that we hail with great cordiality the foundation, under distinguished auspices, of an Anglo-French Society. At the inaugural meeting on Monday Lord Burnham said that it sometimes struck him that in our daily discussion of the war problem and the peace problem we dwelt too much on the bitterness of our hatred of the brutal foe, and too little on the depth and sincerity of our national affection towards our tried and trusted Allies, and, above all, of France. We could say but little of the future of Eastern Europe, but we could say that Western Europe depended for its vitality and its happiness upon the undying friendship of the two nations who had lighted and safeguarded the path of civil liberty. Both had stood for the rights of men and the rule of justice. As Mirabeau said, to unite the glory of France to the glory of England is the best thing that could happen. In the past their friendship had been too formal and too intermittent. There had been in France for centuries short periods of ecstatic Anglomania, followed by long periods of Anglophobia. But we did not want Anglomania: we wanted "Anglo-Frenchism," the unity and concord of kindred spirits and common sympathies. All this is excellent, and the best comment on it is the remark of Mr. Gosse that the amazing thing was that the society had not been started before. "I venture to suggest," Mr. Gosse added, "that the society, now so happily formed, might take as its central aim a cultivation of the chivalry of the intelligence."

The proposed War Memorial of organised Labour is nobly conceived. At a joint meeting of the Parliamentary Committee of the Trade Union Congress and the National Executive of the Labour Party, held on Tuesday, the following resolution was carried:—

> In order to commemorate the heroic deeds and unselfish devotion of those members of the British trade unions and other Labour organisations who fell in action or were incapacitated by wounds or impaired in health as the result of service in the forces or munitions work in the great struggle for freedom and peace, we strongly recommend the trade union and Labour movement to mark its appreciation of these services and sacrifices by instituting a permanent memorial by securing a suitable site in London and the erection of a memorial of freedom and peace, to be known as the National Labour Institute, which shall be the headquarters of the Trade Union Congress and the National Labour Party, and shall have accommodation for all the requirements of these two bodies, with office accommodation, to be let to trade unions and other Labour organisations, a conference hall, committee rooms, reference library, and hotel accommodation for trade union and other Labour delegates to London on Labour business.
> Further, that a part of the memorial be the foundation of scholarships and other educational assistance, and where necessary boarding school or University charges, for the children of members of trade union and Labour organisations who have fallen or been maimed in connection with the war.

Dr. Clifford remains an optimist and a fighter at 81. We have his own assurance that the Russian Revolution and the entry of America into the war have given a greater brightness to his birthday outlook. "I believe," he said to a Daily News visitor on Tuesday, "that both will help to lead the world to the right peace. But that is not yet. It is a remarkable fact that even my pacifist correspondents hold that there is nothing now left for us but to go forward with the war. Two years—even one year—ago their attitude was very different, but they seem to feel to-day that a durable peace can only be won by the triumph of the Allied arms."

REPRISALS.

The question of reprisals has once again become a matter which has to be faced by the conscience of the country. There have been several pronouncements upon the subject recently by persons in authority, but they have been expressed in language of such studied vagueness, that no one is quite certain what they really mean. That we intend to do our best to penetrate into the interior of Germany with our aircraft is certain. Whether these expeditions are to be directed with deliberate purpose against the defenceless civilian population or to be confined to important military objectives, is a question about which we lack precise information. It is possible to interpret the speeches of General Smuts and Lord Derby, and the answer of Mr. Bonar Law in the House of Commons on Tuesday, as intended to throw a sop to popular clamour without committing the Government to a policy of terrorism of doubtful military value. But it is unsatisfactory that on a matter of this kind, which causes deep disquiet to the Christian conscience, we should be left in the dark. The Prime Minister would rally all the best elements in the country to his support if he made a ringing appeal to our instincts of chivalry, and announced in unequivocal language that our cause has no use for the venom of malevolence and angry spite.

We do not pretend that the question as it stands is free from grave difficulties. The kind of war which Germany has planned is one of peoples as much as of armies. We are all forced to be combatants. Neutrality is dead, and no man can preserve the most elementary virtues of good citizenship without being drawn into the rank of the fighters. This applies to the whole population except those who are still too young to think and to serve, to women as well as to men. If this has given a new horror to war, there is a sense in which it has touched it with sublimity. For it is no longer a vulgar contest of kings for personal honour or scraps of territory; it is a struggle for the civilisation of the world, a titanic conflict between principles of good and evil, in which there may be ignoble compromises but never any lasting reconciliation. In a situation of this kind many of the traditional customs of war must necessarily disappear. Women, who have joined up as the comrades and helpers of men, have taken their lives in their hands, and children innocent of all danger laugh and play close to the munition factories which the enemy is anxious to destroy. Is there any room left for our common distinction between soldiers and civilians? Have we any right to be angry when the Germans bomb our open towns and involve our women and children in a common ruin?

All this must be admitted, and yet nothing that has happened can justify us in using deliberate cruelty in order to weaken resistance. The fact that savage methods are used against ourselves does not justify us in trying to remove the question of our own adoption of them from the control of moral judgment. The instant any man begins to clamour for retaliation or enters deliberately upon a contest in brutality he makes his own character less capable of serving noble ends. His professions of unwillingness, and the sincere belief that he is only doing it in order to bring the enemy to reason, will not counteract the influence of the subtle poison which he has taken into his heart. And all the time he may be defeating his own aims by provoking the enemy to new forms of recklessness. The statement that the only way to protect our women and children is to spread pain and death among the helpless civilians of Germany has been repeated so often that many people think it must be true, and they justify reprisals on that ground. We believe, on the contrary, that such a policy would only arouse a wild clamour in Germany to make the bombing expeditions against us more incessant and vindictive. None of us proposes to copy Germany in her use of incendiarism and poison. We did not try to cure the horrors of the Wittenberg camp by exposing the German prisoners in our hands to slow torture or the infection of some loathsome disease. When we are dealing with soldiers we know that methods of this kind do not pay. There cruelty only breeds cruelty. Why then should we imagine that a policy of bombing in order to spread devastation and death among helpless people is likely to ease the situation and bring Germany to her senses?

It is only fair to distinguish arguments which are based upon a belief in the utility of reprisals, deeply mistaken and morally dangerous as we believe them to be, from appeals to the raw appetite of vengeance. Our great city populations have borne the burden of the war with a patience and a quiet heroism which are beyond praise, but excitement and overstrain expose them to sudden gusts of emotion. Recent events in London have certainly aroused a good deal of stormy feeling, and a section of the Press has been quick to seize upon it for the sake of clamour and sensation.

It does not mean that the average Londoner is losing his tolerance and his easy good-nature. We are not changed in our relations to one another, but where the enemy is concerned the feeling is distinctly harder, and in some quarters the passion of vengeance is creeping in, though it is hardly recognised for the ugly and desolating thing it is. It is a moral situation, which requires consummate sympathy and skill if it is to be handled rightly. A campaign of scolding by virtuous people would be worse than useless. If the Christian conscience is to speak with a persuasive voice it must avoid all ardent rhetoric, and show that, while it maintains an unshaken loyalty to the principles of right feeling and right action, it can enter into the suffering and anxiety of tortured hearts and share their blazing anger against intolerable wrong. There is need of warning. There is certainly need of guidance. Above all there is need of a constant insistence upon the spiritual issues of right and wrong, of justice and freedom, which can fortify our hearts in the day of battle and guard them from the fears that weaken and the passions that enslave. If we look upon a policy of reprisals with strong misgiving and feel it right to speak a plain word of disapproval, let us be careful that no suspicion can rest upon us of indifference or double-mindedness in the task to which we have set our hands. To good men the passion of revenge must always be hateful, but now we have this additional reason for hating it, that it would weaken our moral power for victory.

REPRISALS FOR AIR-RAIDS.

To the Editor of THE INQUIRER.

SIR,—I wish to associate myself with the number of your readers who are grateful to you for the way in which you have risen to the demands of a great occasion. I hear on many hands of the warm appreciation in which your editorials dealing with the war are held, and I am glad to use this opportunity of joining in these tributes to the fine moral and spiritual tone of your inspiring words. Patriotism so painted becomes a religion, branching out into an enthusiasm of humanity embracing the cause of righteousness in this wide world. I have, accordingly, welcomed the condemnation of the threatened policy of reprisals in your last week's issue. To reply to the German air-raids on civilians, conducted without any military purpose, in like kind is to meet barbarism by barbarism, and crime by crime, copying the very murders in cold blood of helpless and defenceless women and children that we have found no language strong enough to condemn. The Lord deliver us from such shame! No longer could we look the world in the face and hold up our heads as the champions of right against might. Our lips would be dumb in reprobation of deeds that we had made our own. No! Never mind how great the provocation, or how legitimate our righteous anger, do not let us adopt the methods of barbarism that call it so justly forth. Let us remember, in the midst of our suffering from such cruel wrong, to do nothing in this life and death struggle against the powers of darkness to besmirch the white flower of the righteousness in whose cause we fight.—Yours, &c.,

H. ENFIELD DOWSON.

Gee Cross, October 16, 1917.

To the Editor of THE INQUIRER.

SIR,—The question of reprisals is a very momentous one. It involves answering two questions: Is it necessary from the military point of view, and is it right? Looking at it from the point of view of supposed military value we laymen want to be assured that it would be useful in defeating Germany and in saving our own women and children. Does any one suppose that by killing some women and children in German towns we shall prevent the continuance of air-raid outrages on London? I think it may be confidently asserted that killing German women and children will not save our women and children. Will it bring the war to an end any sooner? We are all resolved that the German outrages in London shall not lessen our courage and determination. No doubt they frighten some, but assuredly they will not bring us to our knees and make us sue for peace at any price. They do not appreciably lessen our military efficiency, and they make many of us more determined than ever to defeat a foe who uses such execrable methods of wanton destruction. The effect of killing German women and children would have the same results. It would exasperate and embitter feeling; it would tend to prolong the war. There is no evidence whatever that it would frighten the Germans into submission.

The only argument I can see on behalf of killing German women and children is that it would comfort the panic-striken populace in London. We should find a savage delight and satisfaction in thinking that the Germans were suffering as much as we. There is a certain depression which comes over people when they are hit and cannot hit back again. There is a certain exhilaration in revenge. But we are here passing from military to moral considerations. There cannot be much military value in rejoicing over the slaughter of German women and children, and on the other hand it is a profoundly immoral and unmanly sentiment. The more fierce and indignant we feel, and rightly feel, about these German methods of barbarism and the absurdity of their claim that they are only trying to destroy military stores, the more we ought to shrink from adopting these methods. They are a lasting disgrace to any nation. They deserve the condemnation of every civilised people. Our sense of their extreme iniquity is a strange reason for doing the same.

If these methods were of vital military value, as in the case of gas, if they were likely to affect the issue of the war, then I admit that we should have a very difficult problem to solve—we should be torn asunder by the duty of defeating Germany and by a hatred of the method which we must use in doing it. But there is no such problem. There is not a particle of evidence that it will make any real difference to the issue of the war or that it will make any difference to the bombing attacks on London whether we kill German women and children or not. Of course we must go on attacking from the air behind the German lines; we must bomb railway stations and munition dumps; we must attack such places as Essen if we can. This is the kind of thing we have been doing and may well do with greater force. But the present proposal goes far beyond this. It is a definite step in a new direction. We are said to be intending to attack open towns and to do exactly what the Germans are doing here. We shall not aim at women and children but we shall certainly hit them. We shall be as brutal as the Germans and as hypocritical in our excuses. We may be thankful that there is no real military reason for the commission of so great a crime.—Yours, &c.

HENRY GOW.

Hampstead.
October 17, 1917.

To the Editor of THE INQUIRER.

SIR,—In your remarks on reprisals for air-raids on civilian populations, you entirely omit the consideration which moves most of us to advocate a trial of the policy. The consideration is simply the protection of our own women and children. The good fortune which has so far guided the German bombs so that they have fallen on the places where they could do the minimum of damage, may at any time desert us; and, if we do nothing, a fearful toll of our defenceless ones may soon be taken. We are given to suppose that the object of the Germans in doing this diabolical thing is threefold, viz., to cheer their own people (and, against our will, we have to believe that their own people have been cheered by the news); to depress our people's spirits; and to necessitate our diverting men and munitions and machines from the battle front to the defence of home towns and villages. Reprisals if made on open towns (and only if made on open towns, for the others, we may assume, are already defended) would cause the Germans to divert from the fighting lines machines and men and munitions of which now they stand in greater need than we; or, if the High Command decided not so to divert these, then the depression and discontent in Germany would aggravate to the point of danger the unrest of the people, which even now, we must believe, is causing serious anxiety to the rulers. Placed by our action in this dilemma—unable to defend all their towns and villages satisfactorily, and afraid to do nothing, or, what would be under the circumstances worse, nothing adequate, the war lords would decide that air-raids did not pay them. To no other consideration do they give attention. They would give attention to this, and, if our Government were to announce that for every raid on a civilian population a similar population in Germany should be attacked, then, I believe, we should only need to make the threat good once. The raids would cease. If it be argued that this would not be the result and that a policy of reprisals would not, eventually, save lives, I would answer that such an argument at least lifts the question out of the group of those which conscience can decide. And when the pros and cons are ranged by the intellect without fear and without favour, the case for reprisals is now overwhelming. Let not those who live in comparative safety too readily give a decision which may condemn to death crowds of the East End poor.—Yours, &c.,

WAR TO END WAR.

To the Editor of The Inquirer.

Sir,—I am one who has read carefully Dr. Jacks's "stern truths." But if after the war we are to work hard and save enormous wealth to be spent on another great conflict, to produce and invent new machines of destruction during times of peace for mutual destruction, then one cannot see how any forms of civilisation can be preserved. Probably a strong new labour group may arise, composed largely of men and women. One cannot accept the idea that these people will tamely consent to toil long and hard for the landowner and capitalist, to lay up the proceeds for another inevitable mutual destruction. Better far to pull "the linch-pin" out altogether. But on this the Doctor expresses "no opinion whatever." Perhaps Viscount Grey can help us. "Unless mankind learns from this war to avoid war, the struggle will have been in vain. If the world cannot organise against war, if war must go on, then the nations can protect themselves henceforth only by using whatever destructive agencies they can invent, till the resources and inventions of science end by destroying the Humanity they were meant to serve." The Countess of Warwick seems to think so considering the tone of her article in The Hibbert Journal. As for G. F. Bridge, he plainly adopts the "dreadful medicine" theory of Treitschke, the Prussian. Such arguments simply adopt the usual biological position, which the Allies have always seemed to condemn in the case of Germany. Surely the late Prof. Huxley in his essay 'Evolution and Ethics' came to another conclusion. As for reconciling these views with any form of Christianity, that has been done in the past with perfect ease, and no doubt will be done in the future. One may ask if Dr. Jacks has any opinion at all on the statement of Mr. Asquith: "Public right means first and foremost, the clearing the ground by the definite repudiation of militarism as the governing factor in the relation of States, and of the future of the European world." But we are not to think of the future, biological necessity will be the same as in the past, and humanity is the sport of some iron fate and necessity. "All men are Ghosts."——

Yours, &c., E. Hill.

[We think that our correspondent has missed the purpose of Dr. Jacks's article. It is a challenge to us to think out the far-reaching implications of universal peace and its probable effect upon the structure of human society, instead of simply taking it for granted that when war is abolished all will be well.—Ed. of Inq.]

BOOKS AND REVIEWS.

THE LETTERS OF A FRENCH SOLDIER.

Letters of a Soldier. With an Introduction by A. Clutton-Brock and a Preface by André Chevrillon. London: Constable & Co. 4*s.* 6*d.* net.

Amid the crowd of war books, crammed with fighting and adventure, this small volume, which contains the intimate confessions of a finely tempered spirit, must not be overlooked. It occupies a place apart, both on account of its intrinsic beauty and distinction, and also because it gives us what many people in this country so sorely lack, a revelation of the French mind on the spiritual side. It is composed of a series of letters by a young French soldier to his mother, written day by day from September, 1914, to April 6, 1915. Then there is silence, for since that day the author has been missing. The relationship portrayed is one of clinging and passionate affection. Between this son and his mother there are no secrets. He tries to put what is most intimate in his experience into words for her. Before the war he had dedicated his life to art, and all through the rough business of fighting he is an artist to the finger tips, sensitive to the changing moods of nature, haunted by the presence of beauty in surroundings which to most men are only sordid and ugly. "Never," he confesses, "has the majesty of the night brought me so much consolation as during this accumulation of trials. Venus, sparkling, is a friend to me."

But the deepest interest of these letters is to be found in the picture they give of the growth of a soul, as it rises through the discipline of stern obedience to a noble unselfishness and a clearer faith in spiritual things. Many men will echo his confession of patriotism, who could not find the words to express it: "I used to love France with sincere love, which was more than a little dilettante; I loved her as an artist, proud to live in the most beautiful of lands; in fact, I loved her rather as a picture might love its frame. It needed this horror to make me know how filial and profound are the ties which bind me to my country." Of his acceptance of duty and his religious faith a few short sayings may serve as illustrations. "Know that it would be shameful to think for one instant of holding back when the race demands the sacrifice. My only part is to carry an undefiled conscience as far as my feet may lead."—"To him who can read life, present events have broken all habits of thought, but they allow him more glimpses than ever before of eternal beauty and order."—"Let us eat and drink to all that is eternal, for to-morrow we die to all that is of earth. We acquire an increase of love in that moment when we renounce our mean and anxious hopes."—"We have need of courage, or rather, we have need of something difficult to obtain, which is neither patience nor overconfidence, but a certain belief in the order of things, the power to be able to say of every trial that it is well."—"At a time like this nothing can speak of individual hope, only of great general certainties."—"We are in the hands of God. Never, never, have we so needed the wisdom of confidence. Death prevails, but it does not reign." The last words he wrote, on the day when he disappeared on the field of battle, were these, "Whatever comes to pass, life has had its beauty." We have said nothing of the introductions which Mr. Clutton-Brock and M. André Chevrillon have written, because, apart from a few personal facts about the author, they are needless. In presence of a human document so simple, moving and passionate, the heart of the reader may be trusted to supply its own commentary.

DR. WILLIAMS'S TRUST.

A Short Account of the Charity and Library established under the Will of the late Rev. Daniel Williams, D.D. Written and published under the direction of the Trustees.

We may congratulate ourselves that the nucleus of this admirable volume appeared in our columns on the occasion of the bicentenary of the death of Dr. Williams last year. The articles have been revised and expanded, and a considerable amount of new material has been added, including a preface by Dr. P. H. Wicksteed, a list of the printed catalogues, lists of the trustees and officers, and a number of illustrations. Probably very few people who borrow books from the Library have any idea of the varied activities of the Trust in aiding scholars, providing for the necessities of poor ministers and their widows, and supporting religious and educational work in Wales. A certain sum is allocated every year to pay the stipend of a Protestant missionary to Irish Roman Catholics, who must preach to them in the Irish tongue. This quaint provision in the founder's will recalls the fact that he was at one time domestic chaplain to the Countess of Meath and subsequently one of the ministers of Wood Street congregation, Dublin, from 1667 to 1687; but the time has certainly come when permission might be sought to use the money for some object more in accord with the present needs of Ireland. In other respects the policy pursued by the trustees has been one of liberty and enlightenment, and in no direction has this been more conspicuous than in the development of the Library during the last fifty years. It is now one of the most important institutions of the kind in the country. We are not aware of any other library which provides the scholar with the book he needs for use in his own study free of all cost except the modest charge for carriage. At the present time 22,000 volumes are borrowed annually. The chapters dealing with the growth and contents of the Library are admirable; the one on the Catalogue with its wide range of technical knowledge is particularly good. The benefactions of books have been numerous and important, but there is no record of any pecuniary bequests. Some additions to the endowment, which might be devoted to the increase and better equipment of the Library, would enable the Trustees to adopt a policy of expansion. Among other things a larger and more convenient reading-room, where the fine series of portraits could be hung in a good light, is much needed. There will never be any desire to rival the John Rylands Library as a paradise of the bibliophile, but with more adequate means at its disposal the Library in Gordon Square might aspire to render services of equal magnitude and worth to the cause of sound learning. The endowment of a library is one of the best uses to which superfluous wealth can be devoted. It only remains to congratulate the present librarian, the Rev. R. T. Herford, and the assistant-librarian, Mr. Stephen K. Jones, upon the high level of interest of this bicentenary volume.

We have received a second and enlarged edition of 'A Book of Jewish Thoughts for Jewish Sailors and Soldiers' selected and arranged by the Chief Rabbi. It is an excellent selection from ancient and modern authors, which will appeal to the religious and patriotic feelings of many who do not belong to the Jewish community. Here are two of its fine sayings: "In a free state it is not the Christian that rules the Jew, neither is it the Jew that rules the Christian; it is Justice that rules." "Loyalty to the flag for which the sun once stood still can only deepen our devotion to the flag on which the sun never sets." (London, Eyre & Spottiswoode, Ltd.)

WEEKLY NOTES.

I want again to urge the need of warm clothing for the mutilated and amputated men of the Belgian army, of whom I wrote last week. There is no class of men who deserve more from us and who are less able to help themselves. They are under instruction for a new trade, but it is a lengthy business, and they have no friends or families in a position to send them the warm extras that their sad state requires.

I receive numerous letters from doctors at the front, all very much cheered by the splendid advances of our army in Flanders, and hoping it will soon relieve the pressure on their front and enable the Belgian army, too, to press forward. Meanwhile the daily and nightly bombardments continue, and one doctor writes that the Red Cross satchell we sent him over a year ago, and which has been of such great use to him, has been torn to shreds by a shell falling on his dressing station in the trenches. Fortunately the doctor and his patients escaped unhurt.

A still more serious effect of a recent enemy bombardment has been the fatal havoc wrought at one of the large Belgian hospitals which has been our special care. Bombs fell and killed one doctor and ten patients, besides injuring others. All the private effects of the staff were destroyed, and many doctors and nurses found themselves bereft of all their worldly goods.

These incidents are sufficient to show that our help is still needed. I have been obliged to refuse several requests this autumn from lack of funds. I have prepared an illustrated leaflet giving an account of our Fund, and I should be deeply grateful if friends would apply for copies and send them out to their friends who do not know about this work. The need of funds is very urgent. At the present moment we shall be unable even to pay the cost of the upkeep of the Maternity Home unless our resources are increased, and I cannot bear to think that we should fail our brave Allies in this winter which we all hope will be their last in exile. Rose Allen.

SPECIAL WANTS.

Pyjamas, shirts, socks, and all sorts of men's underclothing.
Mufflers, cardigans, slippers.
Clothing for women and children.
Games, jigsaw puzzles, old tennis balls.

The name and address of sender and list of contents should be enclosed in each parcel.

Contributions of money and clothing should be sent to Mrs. Bernard Allen, 14 Gainsborough Gardens, Hampstead, N.W.3.

TOYS FOR BELGIAN CHILDREN.

As announced in The Inquirer of September 29, we are again making an appeal for toys for the Belgian children in the "Colonies Scolaires" in France. I have received a few gifts so far, and am hoping to receive many more, so that I may be able to send toys to several of the Colonies. I should like to send them off as soon as possible, so that the children may get them by Christmas time. Parcels, or gifts of money, should be sent to Mrs. W. H. Drummond, 23, Cannon Place, Hampstead, N.W.3.

THE EASTERN UNION OF UNITARIAN AND OTHER FREE CHRISTIAN CHURCHES.

ANNUAL ASSEMBLY.

The Annual Assembly of the Eastern Union was held at the Octagon Chapel, Norwich, on Thursday, October 11. Luncheon was served in the Martineau Hall at 1 o'clock and was followed by the Annual Business Meeting at 2.30 p.m., at which Councillor A. M. Stevens, of Norwich, occupied the chair. At the opening of the meeting, the Chairman made sympathetic reference to the loss which the Union had recently sustained by the death of its President, Mr. J. D. Wright, which took place at the end of September. Mr. Wright had always taken the greatest interest in the work of the Union, and had been one of the most regular attendants at its meetings. He had rendered great service as a lay-preacher, and during the past two years had made himself entirely responsible for the maintenance of the Sunday services at Great Yarmouth and Filby. The Union, as a whole, and especially the church at Yarmouth, had to record this loss with very deep regret. A resolution of sympathy was carried in silence, all the members standing.

A hearty welcome was offered to the Rev. W. C. Bowie, who attended as the representative of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association. Letters of greeting and good wishes were sent by the Rev. James Harwood on behalf of the National Conference, and by Miss Tagart on behalf of the Postal Mission.

The annual report was presented by the Rev. Lawrence Redfern, of Norwich, and the financial statement by Mr. R. Hamblin, of Ipswich. The report showed that of the ten churches in the Union, five had settled ministers or regular ministerial supplies, four were maintained by voluntary lay help, and one was still closed. The thanks of the committee were due to the laymen who had rendered invaluable help during the past year. Reference was also made in the report to two ministerial changes, one of which had already taken place and another was pending. After a long and faithful ministry of fourteen years, the Rev. A. E. Rump had retired from the church at Hapton owing to failing health. Mr. Rump's farewell service had been conducted the previous Sunday by the Rev. Lawrence Redfern. The good wishes of all friends of the Union went with him in his retirement. The second ministerial change affected the Octagon Chapel, Norwich. The Rev. Lawrence Redfern had received and accepted an invitation to the ministry of the Ullet Road Church, Liverpool, in succession to the Rev. J. Collins Odgers, and would be leaving Norwich in the early spring. This would also necessitate the appointment of a new secretary to the Union in due course. The report concluded with an appeal for a most loyal support of the Union in the difficult task of promoting fellowship amongst churches which were widely scattered. If it was not their privilege, as it was the joy and privilege of some other Unions, to go forward on pioneer enterprises and the breaking up of new ground, they must not forget that it was useful and necessary work, especially in these times, to strengthen and consolidate the ground already won.

Miss S. S. Dowson, the local secretary to the Postal Mission, forwarded an interesting report of the year's work. Among the correspondents there had been a number of soldiers on active service. The election of officers for the ensuing year then took place, and it was unanimously resolved to invite Mr. R. Hamblin, of Ipswich, to become President. Mr. Hamblin has been one of the staunchest supporters of the Union for many years.

At the close of the business proceedings a most interesting and inspiring address was given by the Rev. W. C. Bowie. Mr. Bowie outlined the work of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association as shown in the eighty-eight items on the Agenda paper of the previous day's meeting at Essex Hall. The effect of this part of Mr. Bowie's speech was to make all who were present feel that, in spite of the isolation of individual churches, they were really linked up with a much larger movement than was often imagined. Referring to the effect of the war on religion, Mr. Bowie maintained that the present struggle had not wrecked Christian ideals, which had never really been tried. The Church was an essential part of life, and what was more, our particular type of church was necessary. All of us must feel that we were doing our particular piece of work for the redemption of the world which no one else was doing, and this feeling should inspire a strong feeling of loyalty.

A hearty vote of thanks was accorded Mr. Bowie for his presence and his address. Thanks were also expressed to the members of the Octagon Chapel for their hospitality, and to Councillor A. M. Stevens for presiding.

Tea was served in the Hall at 5 p.m., after which there was a religious service conducted by the Rev. Lawrence Redfern, the preacher being the Rev. J. W. Saunders, of Ipswich. Mr. Saunders took his text from the book of the prophet Isaiah: "In all their afflictions He was afflicted." It was almost impossible, said the preacher, to understand quite how much those words meant to us in these times, that God is immeasurably near to us in everything that can possibly happen to us in our human life. The love of God meant not merely that God was sorry in a detached way for the sufferings of His children, but was so bound to them that their sorrow and suffering were His very own.

SUSTENTATION FUND.

A meeting of the Managers of the Sustentation Fund was held at Essex Hall, London, on Tuesday, October 9, and there were present: The Rev. C. J. Street, President, in the chair, the Revs. Dr. J. E. Carpenter, W. Copeland Bowie, F. K. Freeston, J. Harwood, W. G. Tarrant, and Messrs. W. Byng Kenrick, Oliver Lee, G. J. Notcutt, P. M. Oliver, P. Preston, Ion Pritchard, Mr. R. P. Jones, Hon. Treasurer, and the Rev. W. H. Drummond, acting Hon. Secretary.

A letter was received from Mr. J. T. Perry, of Nottingham, resigning his place on the Board owing to his professional engagements. The resignation was accepted with great regret, and it was resolved unanimously to invite Miss Clephan, of Leicester, to fill the vacant place on the Board.

Grants were voted towards the ministry at Birmingham, Newhall Hill; Burnley; London, Stamford Street Chapel and Blackfriars Mission; Manchester, Pendleton; and Mexborough.

The question of a special Christmas grant to the beneficiaries of the Fund was considered, and a report was presented by the Chairman of a conference which had been held the previous day between a Committee of the Managers and representatives of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association. It was resolved that a grant of £5 be made to all beneficiaries, including ministers in Ireland, and that an additional grant of £5 be made to all beneficiaries whose earned income does not exceed £200 per annum. The officers were empowered to co-operate with the British and Foreign Unitarian Association and to expend a sum not exceeding £250 in order to provide a Christmas grant for ministers who are not in receipt of a grant from the Sustentation Fund or from the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, and whose earned income does not exceed £200.

A motion was passed instructing the Trustees to invest £1,400 in New National War Bonds (ten years period), and such additional funds as may become available before the end of the year.

TREATMENT OF CONSCIENTIOUS OBJECTORS.

The Executive Committee of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, at its meeting held Wednesday, October 10, 1917, on the motion of the President, the Rev. Dr. J. Estlin Carpenter, seconded by Mr. R. Mortimer Montgomery, K.C., Chairman of the Civil Rights Committee, adopted the following Resolution:—

"Desiring as we do to help by every means in our power towards uniting all English speaking people in a determination to carry the war to a completely successful conclusion, and to put an end to the conception that amongst nations Might is Right, we find ourselves compelled to utter a stern protest against the continued disregard of the Statutory provisions passed by Parliament with the intention of protecting those who conscientiously object to take any part in the organisation of military force.

"Tortures and cruelties illegally permitted, as well as grievous and indeed appalling punishments inflicted within the letter of the law, are besmirching the good name of democracy and the cause of humanity, and are calculated to disturb the minds of many who believe wholeheartedly in the justice, nay, the sanctity, of the cause of the Allies. There are cases of men who have been cruelly done to death; and (apart from cases of men the genuineness of whose professions may be open to doubt) terrible punishments are still being borne by about one thousand of young fellow citizens whose sole crime is that they fanatically believe that to submit themselves to military authority in any form is to commit a grievous sin against right conduct.

"Profoundly as we disagree with their point of view, though some fourteen of them, we are told, belong to our own household of religious faith, we stand for Civil and Religious Liberty, and are all firm believers in the right and duty of private judgment in matters of conscience, and our sense of agreement with the aims of our Government and our fellow citizens is deeply disturbed by this lack of humanity towards men who, however unwise, are nevertheless moral enthusiasts.

"The infliction of repeated sentences of imprisonment for what is in truth a single offence is entirely opposed to the spirit and probably even to the letter of English law, yet in a number of cases the sentence of two years' imprisonment with hard labour has been passed for a second time, and the Army Council has now ordered that no part of these sentences shall be remitted.

"We cannot believe that the infliction of these cruel sentences is other than evil, or that it can be excused or condoned because the object desired by those who inflict them is a good one. The treatment accorded to these 'conscientious objectors' appears to us to stand in the same moral category as the brutalities of the military despotism which it is the purpose of the Allies to overthrow, and we call upon His Majesty's Government to take immediate and effective steps to put an end to the present state of affairs, and in this matter to restore the good name and the harmony of our people."

THE THEOLOGY OF MR. WELLS.

At a conference arranged by the Christian Evidence Society held at Kingsway Hall on Thursday, October 11, at 3 p.m., at which the Archdeacon of Middlesex presided, the Very Rev. Hastings Rushdall, Dean of Carlisle, opened the discussion on Mr. Wells's book, 'God, the Invisible King.' He said that the book was a remarkable sign of the times as indicating the increased interest in ultimate problems. It was a mistake to treat it as of no importance on the ground that it might not appeal to the professional philosopher or theologian. It would have thousands of readers who would not sit down to a more carefully thought out work on the subject. He acknowledged its genuinely religious tone and its high literary quality. He sympathised also with its opposition to popular ideas about the omnipotence of God, but he found three main difficulties in Mr. Wells's theology.

1. According to him, God was the Creator or common "ground" of the universe. Mr. Wells distinguished between the "Veiled Being," of whom we knew nothing, and the God of religious experience who had a beginning in time, although, apparently, he would have no end. Yet this God also was one who could hear and answer prayer, who was in conflict with evil, who could "strive" and "attempt." Presumably, he sometimes succeeded. This must mean that to some extent he could modify the course of events if only through his influence on human wills. But, since this God had nothing to do with nature and its laws, any influence which he exercised upon the world reduced itself to a series of strictly miraculous interferences. Such dualism as that of Mr. Wells reduced the world to a chaos instead of a cosmos.

2. Mr. Wells recognised the analogy between his idea and the position of the earlier and less orthodox Christian theologian, who treated the Son or Logos as having a beginning in time, and made this a distinct mind from the Father—a "second" and inferior God. But they at least recognised a sublime resemblance of character between the Father and the Son; the Son was a revelation of the Father. It was unreasonable to suggest that though God ultimately proceeds from the "Veiled Being," His nature and character throw no light on the character of the "Veiled Being." When we knew that "the Veiled Being" had produced such a being as Mr. Wells's God we knew a great deal about Him. Such a position reminded the speaker of Mr. Bradley's famous remark that Herbert Spencer had told us more about the unknowable than the rashest theologian had ever ventured to tell us about God.

3. Mr. Wells gave us no reason for believing in such a deity. If the arguments used by philosophers were of any value at all, they pointed to a God who was the creative cause or "ground" of the world. Such arguments could be used by Mr. Wells. Mr. Wells appealed frankly to "intuition," yet most of those who believed themselves to have an intuition of God gave a very different account of Him from Mr. Wells. The speaker concluded by contending that the Arianism which Mr. Wells was inclined to patronise was a less philosophical position than the post-Nicean theology which he ridiculed. Athanasius at least began the recall of the Christian theology to a genuine monotheism from the duelism or polytheism into which it was lapsing. He also expressed surprise that a writer who found no difficulty in the hypothesis of a finite but deathless Spirit should treat the doctrine of human immortality as unworthy of serious consideration.

The Committee of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, at their meeting on October 10, resolved, in view of the increased cost in railway fares and the restrictions on travelling, to postpone until some later date the meeting of the Council usually held in the third week in October. The Autumnal Meetings of the Association, as will be seen from the advertisement, will this year be held in East Lancashire, October 27-29. The minister and congregation at Padiham are preparing an exceedingly cordial welcome for the President of the Association and the other representatives.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Acton.—The fourteenth session of the Acton Literary Society was opened on Tuesday, October 9, when a paper on Thoreau was read by the Secretary, Mr. J. A. Wilkes. There was a good attendance, including six new members. The Society extends a cordial welcome to all friends who live in the district, and the Secretary, 63 Shalimar Gardens, Acton, W., will be happy to send a programme to any one interested.

Bournemouth. — The following resolution passed in reverent silence at the close of morning service last Sunday, records a grievous loss. Lieut.-Col. S. G. Smith was engaged in business as a house and estate agent in the town, and had been for twenty years one of the wardens of the West Hill Road congregation. He was 51 years of age, and it seems from the cables received that he passed away from heart failure during the night of October 7-8, at Basra. A memorial service is to be held in the church on Sunday evening: "The members of the congregation of the Bournemouth Unitarian Church, gathered for the first time for Sunday morning worship after the news reached them of the death of Lieut.-Col. Smith, on service with his regiment in Mesopotamia, unite in an expression of profound sorrow at the loss of one who was for many years an earnest member of the congregation, and served it faithfully in the office of warden. They remember thankfully, and with a tribute of honour, his generous nature, his integrity of character, and the high capacity and energy which he threw into the work both of his profession and of the military service to which he was so keenly devoted. He left his home at the call of duty three years ago, and his fellow-members in the church had been recently rejoicing with him in the promotion, richly deserved, which came to him in India. Now they feel that, as truly as if he had fallen on the field of battle, he has given his life for his country. To his widow and daughter, and to his parents, they offer an expression of the truest sympathy in their great sorrow, but also in the deep conviction, which must be theirs, that such a sacrifice, faithfully made, cannot be in vain, and that his life has been given in a great and noble cause."

Cambridge.—The first service for Michaelmas Term was held in the Assembly Room, Downing Street, on October 14, conducted by the Rev. W. H. Drummond. It is requested that the names and addresses of students or others likely to be interested in the services may be sent to Mr. Drummond at 23 Cannon Place, Hampstead, N.W.3., or to the Hon. Secretary, Mr. W. L. Beale, 6 De Freville Avenue, Cambridge.

Harvest Festivals.—Harvest Thanksgiving Services have been held at Cairncastle, Nottingham and Dundee (Free Religious Movement).

Huddersfield.—Lord Headley delivered an address to the members of the Fitzwilliam Street Social Union on October 10, his subject being 'Transport Reform and its Relation to Capital and Labour.' The Rev. R. A. Dickson (President) presided. An interesting discussion followed, and a vote of thanks to Lord Headley was passed on the motion of the Chairman, seconded by Mr. O. Balmforth.

Manchester District Sunday School Association.—At a Conference of delegates of Sunday Schools and Associations held at Great Hucklow on September 19, 20, and 21, a resolution was carried approving the proposal to establish a Convalescent Home, to be called "The Florence Nightingale Home," at Great Hucklow, for men, "as a memorial to those of our religious community who have fallen in the war, as well as for the benefit of those who served in the forces, and for the permanent use of our schools and congregation." It is suggested that the proposed Home shall be for the exclusive use of the men (and youths over 14 years of age) of our group of Sunday schools and congregations, with preferential admission: (a) to men who have served in the Forces; (b) to certified convalescents; all guests to be capable of looking after their personal wants; and this, together with other proposals for the management of the Home, &c., was embodied in several further resolutions which were also carried. The Conference adjourned till November 23, and in the meantime it is earnestly desired that the resolutions may be brought before all the associations and unions at the earliest possible date, and that the result of their deliberations be forwarded immediately to the Rev. Charles Peach, 9 East Meade, Chorlton-cum-Hardy, Manchester. A sum of £10,000 will be required for the purchase of a site, erection and furnishing of the Home, &c., of which not less than £5,000 will be reserved as an endowment fund.

Plymouth.—On Wednesday, October 10, a tea and entertainment was given in the schoolroom to a party of wounded soldiers. The programme was arranged by Mrs. Chase, and some of the guests assisted by singing and reciting. It was a bright and happy gathering.

South Cheshire and District Association.—The Autumnal Meeting was held in the Old Presbyterian (Unitarian) Chapel, Nantwich, on Wednesday, October 10. All the churches in the Association were represented except Newcastle. At the Business Meeting, the President, Miss S. A. Simpson, being in the chair, Shrewsbury was agreed on for the Annual Meeting, and reference was made to the loss which the Whitchurch and Shrewsbury congregations had sustained by the deaths of Mr. Groom and Mr. Ridgway. Votes of sympathy were passed expressing sympathy with Mrs. Groom and Mrs. Ridgway in their bereavement. At the Conference which followed an interesting paper on 'Prayer and the World's Needs' was read by the Rev. A. J. Lee, A.T.S., the Congregational minister of Nantwich. The Rev. Dr. Griffiths, the Rev. A. E. O'Connor, Mr. J. Watson, and Mr. R. Mansell took part in the discussion. At the tea table votes of thanks were passed to the preacher for the day, to the Nantwich friends for their hospitality, and to the Rev. A. J. Lee for his paper. The Rev. A. E. O'Connor conducted the evening service and took for the subject of his address 'Religion.'

Women's League.—A devotional meeting of the League was held in University Hall, Gordon Square, on Friday, October 12. The Rev. Margaret B. Crook conducted a short service most impressively, and gave a fine address, bringing a fresh point of view to the uplifting of League ideals. Owing to the bad weather the attendance was small, but those who were able to make the effort to be present felt amply rewarded. The musical arrangements were in the hands of Mrs. Oram, and were admirably carried out.

Stalybridge.—Through the generosity of his congregation at Stalybridge the Rev. John Ellis is set free for a second time for service with the Y.M.C.A. in France. He left London on Tuesday, October 16, and expects to be sent to a position at once on the new Flanders front.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

The address for our Belgian Hospital Fund, to which cheques and parcels of clothing should be sent, is Mrs. Bernard Allen, 14 Gainsborough Gardens, Hampstead, N.W.3.

ON Monday the Prime Minister spoke at a meeting in the Albert Hall to inaugurate the new War Savings Campaign. Apart from his strong appeal for economy in personal expenditure as the primary duty of the patriot and his warnings against the temptations of artificial prosperity, the most striking passage of the speech dealt with the prospects of peace. He did not attempt to predict when the end of the war would come. No man in his senses, he declared, would prolong it one hour if there were an opportunity for a real and lasting peace. He had been scouring the horizon anxiously, and he saw no terms in sight which would lead to an enduring peace. The only terms which would be possible now would be terms which would end in an armed truce. "I will say," he added, making his meaning more precise, "an arming truce, ending in a more frightful struggle."

"THIS war," Mr. Lloyd George continued, "is terrible beyond all wars; but, terrible as it is in itself, it is still more terrible in the possibilities which it has revealed of new horrors on land, sea, and in the air. I ask those who are pressing—should there be any—for a premature peace, to reflect for a moment what might happen if we made an unsatisfactory settlement. All the best scientific brains in all lands, stimulated by national rivalries, national hatred, national hopes, devoting their energies for ten, twenty, thirty years to magnify the destructive power of those horrible agents whose power had only just been disclosed to the belligerents within the last few months. You must settle this once and for all."

The Westminster Gazette has called attention to some remarks by Capt. Persius on the subject of disarmament which have appeared in the Berliner Tageblatt. It is interesting to find that this popular military critic is a convert to the idea of an enduring peace, which can only be secured by abolishing the competition in armaments. "Security in the future," he writes, "will not be obtained by the effete motto, 'Si vis pacem, para bellum.' The old worn-out paths must be abandoned. Every nation must unanimously bring pressure to bear on its Government, which will ensure the latter acting in such a way as to guarantee, when peace is once made, the future impossibility of civilised nations being again involved in war."

* * *

ALL this is significant of the conversion to nobler ways of thinking which is beginning to manifest itself in certain sections of German thought, as the hope of a dazzling victory disappears below the horizon. We have no means of telling whether it is likely to have any effect in high political circles in the near future, and Capt. Persius has to confess that "up to now the German Government has not been too well disposed to the idea of a limitation of armaments." "It will not be an easy matter," he adds, "to persuade mankind that we are sincerely anxious for abiding law and order in Europe. The reception of our Note to the Pope in the enemy and the neutral press teaches us what suspicion and distrust we shall have to meet." These words reveal with startling candour the real crux of the position. Germany is a moral bankrupt. She has forfeited the respect of the world. No one can trust her anywhere about anything until her whole character has been changed in the fires of suffering and defeat.

WE are glad to see that officers in the army are showing a good deal of disapproval of the new policy of stripes and chevrons for men on active service. They regard it as lacking in good taste and foreign to the traditions of the British Army. They also point out that these "distinctions" are bound to be invidious. Apparently they will not be bestowed upon all who have shown a splendid willingness to serve, but are to be confined to the men who have had the luck to be sent into a war zone. Thus, the conscript of 1917 is to receive a badge of honour when he goes to France which is denied to men who threw up everything in order to serve their country in August, 1914, and yet have seen no fighting because they were needed elsewhere. Badges of honour of this kind seem hardly consistent with the true brotherhood of arms.

WE record to-day with a deep sense of personal loss the death of two ministers, whose work we have often had occasion to honour. Both of them were men of marked individuality, who found in liberal Nonconformity just the atmosphere they needed for the exercise of their special gifts. Mr. Lloyd Jones had the traditions of Manchester College in his blood; Mr. Tavener came from a life of hard toil and skilled craftsmanship into the service of religious ideals; but it was in the same spirit of freedom that they moved along the path of Christian duty, unhampered by the influences which tend to mould strongly marked personal qualities into a clerical type. It is one of the glories of the ministry, whose records of noble living and faithful service they have helped to enrich, that it has never sought to limit the liberty of prophesying or to curb the spirit of bold adventure. It gave to these two men the right kind of opportunity. Nowhere else could they have found it quite so natural in every thought and gesture just to be themselves.

WE are so much accustomed to the voice of the clever pessimist, who never has a good word to say for English education, that it is quite refreshing to find Mr. Fisher declaring that in his opinion our secondary schools for girls are easily the best in the world. This striking statement occurred in the course of an address at the prize distribution at the North London School for Girls last week. Mr. Fisher went on to praise the habit of reading, especially if boys and girls are given the opportunity of thinking reading at their own sweet will. There was no art, he said, which was more valuable in after life than that of leisurely, meditative reading for pleasure. There were books and text-books; his advise was "Read books." He remembered when he was at Oxford he had a pupil who was the son of a small farmer. He said to that boy, "Do you get any encouragement at home?" The answer was, "Not much; for if father sees a book he says it is Socialism, and he throws it into the fire." He was often under the temptation to throw text-books into the fire. He thought text-books were one of our great dangers. His advice was "Read books, the great human books, the long books, the interesting books, the books which are not specially made to enable young people to pass examinations, because those books really do the young people good." He was not afraid to invite them to read really good books over and over again, and often to learn passages which struck them as peculiarly beautiful or peculiarly impressive.

We wish to call the earnest attention of parents, ministers and teachers among our readers to a small book which has come recently into our hands. 'Staying the Plague,' by Mr. N. Bishop Harman, F.R.C.S. (Methuen & Co., 1*s.* net), deals with the difficult subject of sexual disease and the need of combating it by adequate knowledge and especially by the proper training of the young. It is written with the skill of a great physician and the wisdom of a Christian man. Mr. Harman is insistent that the subject must be dealt with, but he gives no encouragement to pessimism and the tendency which has been rife in some quarters to indulge in morbid exaggeration. "The facts of the plague," he says, "are bad enough to call for speedy remedy. To make them out to be worse than they are is to destroy belief in the truth of the warning."

We believe that we shall be doing a public service by giving prominence to the following excellent advice on the subject of air-raids, which is contained in a leaflet issued by the Hampstead Council of Social Welfare.

A WORD TO MOTHERS.

Uphold the courage of those around you with your own. Women in France go on with their work with the shells bursting around them.

If there is a raid you have the honour of fighting in a battle against the enemy. Play your part in preserving order and discipline.

Do not say a word about the raid to the children. Do not talk about the raids when the children are near by. Little pitchers have long ears.

Do not attend to any raid rumours until the police warn all to take cover. Know where your children are, and gather them indoors.

Get your children to bed and asleep as early as possible every night, within closed doors and away from windows.

Think of some near neighbour lonely, old, or suffering from heart or nerves, who may come to you for comfort.

Nearer to you than the nearest neighbour is the Great Companion. Nothing can separate us from the Power of His Love.

CIVILIAN VIRTUES.

What we wrote about Reprisals last week was addressed primarily to the conscience of the individual. We want to warn those whom our words can reach against the moral dangers of revenge, at a time when a certain amount of popular clamour has been worked up by a section of the press. Hot blood, which spends itself in the rhetoric of violence and sweeps away all moral distinctions as irrelevant, is of no use to a good cause. The call for reprisals on the part of a good many people is not a demand for a vigorous military offensive, but a wild plunge into the morass of vengeance where men flounder helplessly in the attempt to make their own evil passions serve the sublime ends of victory. But that being so our first business is not with the Government but with ourselves. The churches and the clergy soon lose their way when they try to instruct Cabinet Ministers about their duties. Theirs is the harder task of keeping the moral atmosphere, in which Cabinet Ministers and all other citizens live and move and have their being, free from the baser passions of war.

The Government needs our support in everything which it undertakes. Our moral capital is as precious to it as our cash, and this moral capital must be made available for the public service first of all by a spirit of generous trust in competent leadership, and then by seeing to it that there is in our own lives the disciplined strength which can meet the sudden calls of duty or danger without flinching. In present circumstances this question of trust is of supreme importance, and it requires gifts of imagination which we often fail to use in our discussions of public affairs. As soon as we pierce through the veils of journalistic prejudice and party spirit, which do so much to obscure the intrinsic nobility of the statesman's calling, we realise that these men who hold the issues of war and peace in their hands on our behalf are like ourselves, only bigger both in mind and character. They are as sensitive to the nobility of national ideals, and they see as we do, only with the clearer vision which comes with wider knowledge, what this struggle involves for the moral future of the world. Is it likely that they will lose their heads and plunge us into a policy of frightfulness, striking wildly back without definite military ends in view, in the belief that they can crush the heart of Germany by killing her women and children? We have only to ask the question in order to dismiss such a nightmare from our minds. It has no point of contact with good English manners or sound English morals.

The need of the moment is not to send virtuous resolutions to the Government but to strike at the cause of this clamour, which we believe is noisy out of all proportion to its strength and in no way represents the real heart of the people. It is the product of anger and of fear. Men and women find it hard to keep themselves in hand when they are exposed to new and terrible experiences, but they must simply force themselves to do so and cease talking about their nerves, or they will forfeit their self-respect. To that instinct of self-respect we can appeal. We need to cultivate sang-froid in the face of danger, like the old lady who said to M. Emile Cammaerts the other day, "Oui, Monsieur, cette guerre, c'est bien ennuyeux." The war is very tiresome, that is all, even in a stricken village at the front. Can any of us begin to talk of our nerves or plan methods of escape, when we remember the women and children of France and Belgium with their calm indifference to personal risks and their bitter contempt for the brutalities of the enemy? Let us rather feel some glow of secret pride if we too are permitted to be partakers in our own flesh of the sufferings of this time. It is only our small share in the price of the world's redemption from wrong.

But there is something nobler even than these fine instincts of self-respect, and as we practise it we shall cease to fear for ourselves. In a heart surrendered to the claims of human service there is no room for the desolating passion of hatred and revenge, and personal anxieties almost disappear. We have seen this transfiguration of human character in the nurses, who are exposed to the horror and danger of war without being combatants. In her 'Text Book of War Nursing,'* where the humblest details seem to be illumined with heavenly courage, Miss Thurston describes the alarming event of a severe air-raid or bombardment close to a hospital. "It may occur suddenly without any previous warning, and often happens in the middle of the night when most people are sleeping. It is startling even for those who have experienced it several times to be wakened up by the loud reports of bombs falling, anti-aircraft guns rattling shrapnel, houses crashing down, and the cries of the wounded, the surrounding darkness making everything infinitely more difficult to cope with." But this is only the prelude to a description of all the duties which must be performed instantly, concluding with the words: "Sisters should never forget to reassure the other patients in the ward if shells or bombs are dropping near; they are often very much frightened, especially the helpless cases."

* 'A Textbook of War N rsing.' By Violetta Thurston. London, G. P. Putnam's Sons, 3*s.* 6*d.* net.

It is this message of reassurance that we can give to one another. It is the ministry which those who are weaker or more fearful than ourselves have a right to demand at our hands. We can be so fully occupied with putting courage into their lives that we have no time to tremble for our own. Even the desire to escape from danger will disappear as we realise that the duty is laid upon us to reassure our own household and neighbourhood and to save them from panic. This spirit of recklessness about our own interests, because something bigger has claimed us, is one of the lessons of the war, a divine lesson out of the heart of darkness. The pleasant things of life have lost none of their sweetness, and human affections tug at our heart-strings as they have seldom done before, but we have been taught this sublime lesson—we may remember it quietly night and morning or we may repeat it to ourselves amid the shattering noise of the guns—"It does not matter if I am killed, so long as the country is saved, and the cause triumphs."

REPRISALS.

To the Editor of THE INQUIRER.

SIR,—On reading the correspondence which has taken place recently in your columns on the subject of air-raids and reprisals, I cannot help feeling that there exists a grave misapprehension on the part of many people as to the real object of the Germans in raiding London and other places in England. It seems to be taken for granted that the main, if not the sole object in these raids is to kill women and children. As a result of a year's experience in the trenches in France I learnt that however brutal the Germans may be in their methods of warfare, there is invariably a sound military reason in their tactics. I feel, therefore, that we are wrong to suppose that they are going to undergo the grave risks and heavy costs of air-raids on London simply and solely to kill women and children, while ignoring all the places of great military importance in the neighbourhood. I do not doubt that when they fail to reach their objectives, as probably frequently occurs, they drop their bombs indiscriminately, hoping to cause as much material damage of any kind as possible. In most cases, however, it seems to me far more reasonable to suppose the real objective was a place of military importance. As to the question of reprisals, surely it were better to trust to the good sense and chivalry of our Higher Command and Air Services, rather than to indulge in protests against methods which there are no very definite grounds for supposing they are about to employ? It must be remembered that if we do confine air-raids solely to such places as Essen, there is no means of guaranteeing that women and children will not be killed, and it merely tends to confuse the issue to start an outcry against killing German women and children when this is the case. Were we to ignore entirely places of military importance and confine ourselves purely to bombing non-military towns in Germany, we might have legitimate cause for protesting on other than simply humanitarian grounds, but so far this has not been the case, nor I think is it likely to be so, unless our Higher Command subordinates common sense and sound military tactics to an hysterical popular outcry.—Yours, &c.,

D. J. CAPPER,
late Royal Sussex Regt.

Hampstead, October 22, 1917.

To the Editor of THE INQUIRER.

SIR,—"C'est magnifique, mais ce n'est pas la guerre" is a natural exclamation on reading certain letters in this week's INQUIRER. But unfortunately, we are at war, and anyone who fails to take full account of this fact must inevitably miss the mark. Strictly speaking, all war consists of reprisals, whether by means of a gun, bayonet, gas, submarine, bomb, starvation, or what not. None, therefore, but the extreme pacifists, who say that war, under all circumstances, is wicked, need consistently object to reprisals, as such. Civilised war (which sounds like a contradiction in terms) is governed by rules and conventions. War with the Huns is not civilised, because they ignore such rules and conventions. And yet we have to deal somehow with them and to defeat them, if the world is to be worth living in. All of us who are moral idealists must share the laudable desire to come out of this terrific struggle, as the saying is, "with clean hands," which, however, is a relative term, depending on circumstances. (In an academic discussion, in which fine distinctions more or less rightly find a place, it might be argued that there is no difference in principle and not much in point of cruelty, between suddenly killing a part of the people of a place by bombs, and slowly killing the whole of them by starvation. Yet we hear of no protests against the latter.) There is a danger of thinking so much about the cleanness that we may come out without hands at all—with all our men killed or maimed, with our women exposed to the savage lust and hate of conquering hordes.

In face of such a possible danger what is our best security? I submit that wisdom lies in choosing the best men we can find as our leaders, and then giving them all the support and confidence in our power to "get on with the war" in light of the knowledge which they alone can possess. Every condemnation and protest, whether made by the Soviet in Russia or by correspondents in THE INQUIRER is pro tanto a cause of weakness and distraction to the Allies, of encouragement to the enemy. We all see that quite clearly when "the boot is on the other foot," and our newspapers are able to see or invent the least sign of dissatisfaction in Germany. And, therefore, I, for one, shrink from the responsibility, when such mighty issues are at stake, of deciding whether any particular form of reprisal is, or is not, justifiable. For the time, at least, that must be settled by those who alone have sufficient knowledge. But just as in the crisis of a great storm at sea it is the duty of all on board not to worry the man on the bridge, so I contend that the highest patriotism is shown in leaving our leaders to concentrate on the tremendous problems entrusted to them without trying to induce them to do this or that according to our conscientious, but necessarily ill-informed judgment. The importance of this consideration is vastly increased as we remember that, even when our own Government has made up its own mind, it has to work in harmony with the other scattered Allies (who have suffered from the war far more poignantly than we have yet done), whereas the enemy is practically directed by a single will, which operates within interior lines.—

Yours, &c., JAMES HARWOOD.

October 22, 1917.

To the Editor of THE INQUIRER.

SIR,—The only admissible consideration in favour of reprisals on open towns seems to me to be the one mentioned by Mr. Golland, that it might compel the German High Command to divert machines, men and munitions from their present work to that of defence throughout Germany. But surely even this can be effected without any need for us to go deliberately to attack the civil population. It is regrettable enough to know that even with the greatest care on the part of our airmen it is impossible to eliminate all risk of hurting civilians during a raid. We must, though unwillingly, be inflicting death and injury upon many Belgian civilians in our efforts to drive the enemy out of their country. But to go with the deliberate intention to kill defenceless civilians, even in war-intoxicated Germany, would be to degrade our own moral consciousness, and I feel sure would be futile as well from a practical point of view. Let us not descend to the low level of our enemies. Lord Macaulay in his 'Essay on the Elder Pitt' uses an illustration from Dante which would apply admirably to the present subject by indicating the moral dangers involved in a resort to German methods. Let me quote the paragraph: "Dante tells us that he saw, in Maleboge, a strange encounter between a human form and a serpent. The enemies, after cruel wounds inflicted, stood for a time glaring on each other. A great cloud surrounded them, and then a wonderful metamorphosis began. Each creature was transfigured into the likeness of its antagonist. The serpent's tail divided itself into two legs; the man's legs intertwined themselves into a tail. The body of the serpent put forth arms; the arms of the man shrank into his body. At length the serpent stood up a man, and spake; the man sank down a serpent and glided hissing away. Something like this was the transformation which, during the reign of George I., befell the two English parties. Each gradually took the shape and colour of its foe, till at length the Tory rose up erect the zealot of freedom and the Whig crawled and licked the dust at the feet of power."

If a similar process of change were completed in the present conflict as here described, a victory for the Entente would mean the success and perpetuation of Prussianism, instead of the defeat and eradication of what we are supposed to be fighting against. Let us not try to win the war by losing our soul. If we do make that attempt I believe we shall lose both, for we shall then have to fight without the sustaining power of a high spiritual ideal.—Yours, &c.,

J. W. PETERKEN.

MEMORIAL NOTICES.

THE REV. T. LLOYD JONES.

It is with deep regret that we have to announce that the Rev. T. Lloyd Jones, of Liverpool, died of pneumonia on Thursday, the 18th inst. after only a week's illness. The news will be received by all his friends with a keen sense of personal loss. There was no one quite like him. With his short and well-knit frame, his quick movements, his indomitable energy, and the completeness of his devotion to his work he was a man apart. He had a gift for winning recruits to the service of the poor and for making rich men feel that the lavish support of his schemes was a debt of honour. No one ever suspected him of personal ambition or selfish aims. First and last and all the time it was the Mission for which he cared. It satisfied his pride and his deep sense of religion, and through the ceaseless toil of more than 30 years it made him perfectly happy.

It is difficult to realise that there were years before he came to Liverpool, except for those who can recall the bright companionship of his college days and his short ministry at Hale. He was born at Felinfach in the Vale of Aeron, on May 17, 1847. After two years at the Presbyterian College, Carmarthen, he studied for the ministry at Manchester New College, London, 1871-77, and the following year settled at Hale. On January 1, 1883, he began his long and memorable ministry at the Liverpool Domestic Mission to the Poor. For nine years he laboured in the old and inconvenient buildings in Beaufort Street, where the congregation and Sunday school had long outgrown the space. In 1892 the splendid pile of new buildings in Mill Street, consisting of chapel, large halls, class rooms and every kind of convenience for institutional work on an extensive scale, were opened. A further addition was made in 1913-14 when a gymnasium and new class rooms were built. Of all the work which found its centre in this hive of religious and social activity he was the energetic leader, though he would have been the first to acknowledge how much was due to the quiet and patient zeal of his friend and assistant-missionary, Mr. Anderton, and to the varied gifts of his large band of helpers. But the institutional side of the Mission never distracted his mind from the more personal aspects of his work. He was an unwearied visitor in a vast area of squalid homes and a staunch friend to his people, always brimming over with cheerfulness and infectious energy and shrewd mother-wit. Few ministers in Liverpool in recent years can have left such a complete record of work well done, or scattered blessings with so lavish a hand.

In 1905 Mr. Jones married Miss Gertrude Oxton, of Liverpool. All his friends who rejoiced with him when at length he found the true partner of his life will desire to express to her their deep sympathy in her sorrow.

The funeral took place last Saturday, when a service was held at the Mission conducted by the Rev. J. Collins Odgers, before the cremation at Anfield. It was a significant and deeply moving sight. With the great throng of the poor, among whom he had moved as a familiar friend for so many years, there mingled many of Liverpool's most notable citizens. All sense of distinction was lost under the spell of a common sorrow and of deep gratitude for a noble servant of God. On Sunday afternoon the Chapel was filled with children, when the Rev. Lawrence Scott spoke to them of the friend whom they had lost. In the evening a memorial service was conducted by Mr. Anderton, and Mr. Harold Armstrong added a few words of affectionate tribute on behalf of the committee of the Mission.

We have received the following tribute from Mr. F. Robinson, one of the oldest workers at the Mission :—

"As one of five workers in the Domestic Mission who have been with Mr. Lloyd Jones since the first year of his ministry there, my first word is one of deep gratitude for the privilege of his friendship and help. In the making of friends, the drawing together of helpers in his life work, and the encouragement of patient continuance in it Mr. Jones had a wonderful gift. The Mission was his life, and its needs came upon him with compelling power, calling forth every energy of which he was capable and meeting with a response in financial and moral support that has always been regarded with pardonable pride. The cause was a sacred one to him and nothing could be too good for its service ; his own comfort, preferences, and even needs were subordinated to its interests, and cause and man became identical.

"During a period covering 34 years I have never known a harsh judgment, an unkind word, or an impatient look to come from him, and this in the face of such frequent provocation and personal difficulties as did and must occur in an institution whose atmosphere was freedom and kindliness, which was used by people of every possible disposition. His Christian optimism has been the support of thousands and his love the saving power of many more. Children were devoted to him and would strive to catch his glance in street and court. Workers received from him that freedom and confidence which he by training and experience valued so highly. He lived to see sectarian animosities much softened, and recently rejoiced upon being asked to preside over an interdenominational temperance meeting. His friends saw in this a testimony to the respect and affection in which he was held. For the last twelve years his work has been greatly helped and strengthened by the co-operation of Mrs. Lloyd Jones who has spared no efforts to add to the valuable influence of the Mission."

THE REV. LUCKING TAVENER.

The death of the Rev. Lucking Tavener, which took place suddenly at Aberdeen on Saturday, October 20, will be deeply regretted by a large circle of friends. He had been unwell recently, and he knew that he was in danger of a breakdown in health if he continued his work in Aberdeen for any length of time ; but in writing two days before his death he said that he was feeling much better, and had been able to preach on the two previous Sundays.

Mr. Tavener was a student at the Rev. C. H. Spurgeon's College from 1879 to 1881. He did not, however, take up the active work of the ministry until 1894, when he became minister of the Brotherhood Church at Walthamstow, where he continued for three years. In 1897, having meanwhile joined the Unitarian body, he was appointed minister at Stepney Green Chapel, London, where he remained until 1900. He afterwards settled at Ipswich (1901-8), Lydgate (1908-11) ; and, on the resignation of the Rev. Alex. Webster in 1911, at Aberdeen.

The granite city was the scene of Mr. Tavener's happiest and most successful ministry ; and he was greatly assisted by his second wife, whose death was a serious loss to him in every way. A few weeks ago, when the Secretary of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association visited Aberdeen, Mr. Tavener spoke in the warmest terms of the appreciation with which his services had been received by the members of the congregation ; and he was particularly gratified by the way in which the School Board and other public bodies in Aberdeen had welcomed the addresses and lectures which he had from time to time delivered on 'Lessons from the Painters.' He was only saddened by the thought that, acting under medical advice, he would have to surrender work in which he took such pleasure.

Mr. Tavener had enjoyed the friendship of Mr. G. F. Watts, and the great painter had profoundly influenced him, and had given an impetus to his ambition to devote care and thought to the ethical and religious teaching which might be derived from the study of great pictures. In connection with the Art Gallery in Aberdeen and by his lectures and visits regularly made to a large number of schools, Mr. Tavener became widely known to the citizens and the children. It is delightful to learn how well he succeeded in overcoming drawbacks imposed by physical defects, and prejudices which his position as a Unitarian minister might be expected to arouse in a city like Aberdeen.

In the preface to 'Lessons from the Painters,' published by the Sunday School Association in 1913, he says that during thirty years of ministry, including pulpit, platform, and class room, he had found the use of works of art most valuable. Mr. Tavener took delight in wielding the brush himself, especially when he was on holiday ; and now that he has gone his personal friends will treasure his sketches : they will remind them of a man who was diligent in promoting the love of truth and the love of goodness by encouraging and stimulating the love of beauty.

LIEUT.-COLONEL JESSE PILCHER, V.D., J.P.

It is some years now since Col. Pilcher withdrew from the public life of Manchester and the activities of our churches. To a long life of more than threescore years and ten there was added a lingering hour of failing powers, and now he has passed to where there is abiding day. Few names will recall quite so fine an emotion as that of Col. Pilcher, while still fewer will be found penetrating so widely through all the varied human strata of a great commercial community. For he lived a full and strenuous life. There was hardly a field of public service in which he was not at one time a familiar figure. To an important commercial career, he added a distinguished record as Colonel of Volunteers, in addition to which he was for many years President of a Parliamentary Divisional Association, while many educational and philanthropic institutions relied on him for counsel and support. But throughout the course of his career, it was to the religious fellowship of his birth that he gave his first thought and most unwearied personal service. His name is honoured alike in the records of the Lower Moseley Street schools, the Manchester District Sunday School Association, the Cross Street Chapel and the Unitarian Home Missionary College. All these he served at different times and in various ways up to the full limit of his powers, carrying through all this varied activity with the singular grace and harmony of a character essentially simple and sincere.

It was, perhaps, as Chairman of the Unitarian Home Missionary College that Col. Pilcher was most widely known in our group of churches. He joined the Committee of the College so long ago as 1873, serving under the chairmanship of the late Mr. Harry Rawson, whose office, and surely whose mantle also, passed to him in 1889, for the personal and abiding interest which Mr. Rawson always took in the students of the College was preserved and carried forward by Col. Pilcher. While he brought to the service of the College great administrative qualities he also brought into the lives of the students a confident sense of sympathy and friendship. The twenty-four years of Col. Pilcher's chairmanship marked a period of transition in the life of the College, and to him fell the task of safeguarding the old missionary traditions of the College while guiding it into the fuller academic life which changing times demanded, and the establishment of the Manchester University made possible. In these tasks Col. Pilcher was happy in the close friendship which marked his relations with the distinguished Principal of the College, the Rev. Alex. Gordon, and it was this happy association also which gave the great impetus to the Jubilee Memorial movement of the College. That movement gave the College a home fitting its new dignity as a constituent college in the Faculty of Theology at the Manchester University, and at the same time added very considerably to its invested funds. In all the protracted labours of that undertaking Col. Pilcher was the leading spirit.

A fine portrait of Col. Pilcher, painted by T. C. Dugdale, and presented to the College by the old students, now hangs on the walls at Summerville, but his living memorial is in the hearts of a strangely varied and large company—commercial magnates, volunteer veterans, ministers and Sunday school workers—men and women who perhaps have little else in common save this that in Col. Pilcher they had known a man who had touched their lives to finer issues.

WEEKLY NOTES.

The response to our appeal last week has been prompt and generous, and I am deeply grateful to all those who have again so kindly come forward to help us. At the same time I would urge all our friends to help us to maintain our subscription lists during the coming winter months. Every penny goes direct to meet an ascertained need, and no effort is spared to make the money go as far as possible. I am sure if people realised what our help means to the men in hospital, the women in the Maternity Home, and the children in the orphanages, they would be willing to make even further sacrifices to ensure that the work should go on.

I was very glad of the opportunity of making our needs known to our Bristol friends at a very successful meeting at Lewin's Mead Domestic Mission last week. I hope to have further opportunities of visiting other towns during this autumn. The illustrated leaflet is ready, and I shall be glad to send copies to any one who will make use of them. Rose Allen.

SPECIAL WANTS.

Pyjamas, shirts, socks, and all sorts of men's underclothing.
Mufflers, cardigans, slippers.
Clothing for women and children.
Games, jigsaw puzzles, old tennis balls.

The name and address of sender and list of contents should be enclosed in each parcel.

Contributions of money and clothing should be sent to Mrs. Bernard Allen, 14 Gainsborough Gardens, Hampstead, N.W.3.

A SCHOOL FOR MINISTERS AT OXFORD.

As a consequence of the war colleges for the training of ministers have not many students. Voluntary service and the Military Service Act have prevented. Manchester College is not an exception. Here was the College with all its magnificent possibilities, the professorial staff with its unique qualifications for "freely imparting theological knowledge," and not a handful of students. To Principal Jacks the happy thought occurred whether, under the exceptional circumstances of the time, instead of confining its work to the usual curriculum of the terms, the College could not be useful in a wider field and helpful to a larger number than that of its immediate students. At the end of June there was in The Inquirer a letter from the Principal offering in the name of the College to all ministers on the Roll of the National Conference, and irrespective of age, a special course of study in the religious and ethical conditions of the time as affected by the war ; the Committee had decided to suspend the usual work of the College and substitute this course, which would last for a month and be repeated in a second month ; would provide free board and residence at the College, and travel expenses where necessary. "Blessed be the College Committee," say those who have been able to avail themselves of its invitation to a month so helpful, so refreshing, so inspiring.

The first week of the first month is at an end. There are some twelve ministers in residence so far, from Cumberland and Hampshire, Yorkshire, Lancashire and Cheshire, Gloucestershire, South Wales and Ireland. These, with the students, and three or four from outside, make a party of about twenty at lectures, with a largely increased number, but a number not so large as it should be, at those lectures which are public and given in the fine Arlosh Hall. To some the month in College is an affectionate return to Alma Mater, others visit for the first time and rejoice in its beauty. It is necessary for some to return home for week-ends to minister in their own churches and do various work as may be, but the majority are happily able to remain for an unbroken month and have the inspiration of the Sunday service in the Chapel, a Mecca—shrine for our worship (would that all our buildings had such worshipful atmosphere, that unworshipful manners therein might be impossible), and to make acquaintance with the Principal's liturgy, which is so rich an addition to the service.

We are not overburdened with lectures. Enough and a feast. There is ample time for further study in the library or in our rooms ; time for walks to Iffley and elsewhere along the river banks ; and to visit the other colleges, with their many messages from the past, in spite of their unwonted war aspect. Two evenings a week there are discussions ; one on "reprisals," with the result that a resolution opposed to the bombing of open towns was sent to the Prime Minister. These discussions, arranged by the Rev. Joseph Wood, who is with us as a venerable and honoured Father in God, are not the least helpful or fruitful hours of the "Course." Very various opinions are expressed with equal earnestness and power, and the give and take of ministerial comradeship is delightful.

The lectures are not given by the professorial staff only. Other leading thinkers of the day also lecture, and their lectures are open to the public. This week we had three lectures of the greatest interest and authority by the Master of Balliol on 'Educational Reconstruction,' on 'Industrial Reconstruction'—one wished that every member of the Government might hear and digest it—and on 'A Realisable Social Ideal,' a companion utterance to that of Principal Jacks in Whitweek, requiring good manners (including I. Cor. xiii) during the period of reconstruction, if anything is to be accomplished with success. Through the great wisdom of these lectures there ran a thread of humour that charmed, like the intriguing thread of gold that lights up embroidery. Next week we are to have three lectures on 'Spiritual Reconstruction,' by Dr. Schiller. In the following week the Dean of St. Paul's will be the lecturer, and on the last week of the month the Principal adds to his other lectures three lectures on 'The State, Visible and Invisible.'

The Principal's other lectures are on 'The Idea of God.' Most of us have had opportunity to hear Dr. Jacks preach or speak in various connections, before. But most of us hear an academic lecture for the first time. We, especially those of us who have the merest smattering of philosophy, delight in a brilliant power to make the most abstruse propositions clear by the graphicness with which they are expounded. Two lectures by the Rev. D. C. Simpson, the first of courses on 'The Ideal State in the Terminology of the Old Testament' and on 'Judaism and Hellenism' and the first of the Rev. H. Gow's lectures on 'Nationality in the Light of the New Testament,' given early in the week, your correspondent was unfortunately not able to hear, but we had also the first of a series of lectures by Mr. Gow on 'Hellenism and Christianity.' It was an illuminating lecture, and from the point of view of the minister's preaching work, nothing in the week was more helpful.

"This time here is simply a God-send to me," said one of us, more than most immersed in work amid poverty and sickness, and C.O.S. and Poor Law work, and prison-visiting, and shut out from the intellectual and spiritual influence, and the intercourse with kindred, which the College gives. I have not asked, but I think that not one of us from very varied fields of work but would say the same.

BRITISH AND FOREIGN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

The Executive Committee of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association met at Essex Hall on October 10, Dr. Carpenter in the chair. There was a long agenda of business, including various reports of sub-committees and visits of delegates to meetings of District Societies. As there will be no meeting of the Council in October, a brief report of a few of the matters dealt with is made.

The vacancy in the office of Treasurer, owing to the lamented death of Mr. Howard Chatfeild Clarke, will not be filled until the annual meeting next Whitsuntide. Meanwhile, Mr. G. W. Brown, an active member of the Finance Sub-Committee, has consented to act as Treasurer. It is desired that all cheques should be made payable to the order of the Association. A further legacy of £400, less duty, had been received from the Executors of the late Mr. Robert Nixon, and the money was invested in National War Bonds. The receipts for July, August, and September were £1,908; the payments £2,342.

Reports of visits of the Secretary to Aberdeen, Dundee, Perth, Kirkcaldy, Stenhousemuir, and Glasgow were submitted, and various suggestions made by the Scottish Unitarian Association were considered. The Rev. E. T. Russell had delivered addresses at a large number of open-air meetings in various towns and seaside resorts, when the attendances varied from sixty to four hundred. Grants were voted towards the cost of heating apparatus at Ross Street, Glasgow, and Kirkcaldy. A rearrangement of the pulpit supplies at Perth, Stenhousemuir, and Kirkcaldy was made. A series of lectures expository of Unitarian Christianity will be delivered at Dunfermline. Dr. Carpenter will spend ten days in Scotland in April, 1918, preaching and lecturing in the chief towns.

In the Publications Department it was announced that the new Chant Book, edited by the Rev. V. D. Davis, was all in type; that the first volume of Dr. Drummond's 'The Way of Life,' dealing with the parables of Jesus, was nearly ready; that the volume of essays by the Rev. W. H. Drummond, 'The Soul of the Nation,' would be published about the end of October; that Dr. Mellone had agreed to prepare a volume dealing with present-day problems in New Testament teaching; that a new handbook dealing with the 'Ethics and Theology of the Old Testament,' by the Rev. A. W. Fox, was in the press. A tract by Dr. C. W. Eliot, 'A Free and Open Christian Church,' and one by Dr. W. C. Gannett, 'O ye of Little Faith,' had been issued for general circulation at the present time of national crisis. Grants of books were made to three Congregational ministers, two Methodists, one Presbyterian, and one Evangelist.

In the Home Mission Department the Rev. T. P. Spedding gave an interesting and encouraging report of the work he is doing at Moss Side, Manchester. The Secretary reported visits to Merthyr, Pentre, and Carlisle; conferences with the Committees of District Societies at Aberdare, Ringwood, Newcastle-on-Tyne, and Manchester. The Rev. W. G. Tarrant related his experiences and gave a summary of the suggestions considered in detail at conferences with the Southern Unitarian Association, the Northumberland and Durham Association, and the Manchester District Association. Mr. Ronald P. Jones told of his visits to Hull, Nottingham, Derby, and Newark; he had visited and reported upon thirty-three churches since the beginning of the war. The Rev. W. H. Drummond had undertaken the charge of the services at Cambridge, and would himself preach there on four successive Sundays. Grants for various purposes were made to South Shields, Pentre, Carmarthen, Manchester (Oldham Road). Towards the cost of a scheme of missionary work devised by the Manchester District Association, the East Cheshire Union, and the North and East Lancashire Unitarian Mission, a grant of £120 was voted. The scheme provides for a series of conferences, meetings, and special services, extending over two months; it will include not only the large number of churches which can be easily grouped together, but also the more scattered and isolated churches in the area covered by the three societies named.

Arrangements had been made for Dr. Carpenter, the President of the Association, to preach at churches in different parts of the country. While attending the Autumnal Meetings in East Lancashire, he would preach on October 28 at Blackburn in the morning, and Padiham in the evening; November 18 at Exeter; December 2 at Wakefield; December 16 at Norwich; December 30 at Northampton; January 13 at Liverpool and Southport.

The question of a war bonus to ministers, payable about the middle of December, 1917, was considered; and it was resolved that the Committee of the Association join with the Managers of the Sustentation Fund in providing a war bonus of £10 to each of our ministers in charge of a congregation whose earned income from all sources, including grants, did not exceed £200. A special appeal will be made in connection with the Association Sunday Collections on November 18 for increased contributions, so that the necessary money may, if possible, be raised without entrenching to any considerable extent upon the ordinary funds of the Association.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Astley.—A Memorial Service was held on Sunday for Lieut. H. G. Holt, B.A., M.C., of the Flying Corps, who was killed on October 6, in France. The service was conducted by the Rev. Peter Holt who, addressing a large congregation, alluded to Lieut. Holt's bright and happy temperament, which caused him to be loved by all who knew him. He was always ready to go where he conceived the path of duty to be, and in study, teaching, or taking the services on Sunday at various chapels he was always desirous of being useful. His example was an encouragement to a greater earnestness of purpose and charity towards all.

Billingshurst.—On Friday evening the 19th inst. a very successful meeting was held to welcome the new minister, the Rev. H. Maguire, B.Sc., and his family to Billingshurst. A tea provided by the ladies of the congregation was served in the Library, after which a short religious service was conducted by the Rev. W. H. Drummond. This was followed by a public meeting, Mr. E. R. Fyson, the President of the Provincial Assembly, being in the chair. After the opening remarks by the Chairman, Mr. H. J. Marten gave the "welcome" on behalf of the congregation. Speeches by the Revs. W. H. Drummond, N. J. Hawthorn Jones, and J. J. Marten, of Horsham, and Mr. C. Wadey of the Congregational Church, Billingshurst, followed. The Rev. H. Maguire suitably responded. There was a large attendance, a goodly number of friends from Horsham being present. Proceedings terminated with a vote of thanks to the Chairman and the Rev. W. H. Drummond, also to the ladies for the tea. Then a hymn was sung and the benediction pronounced by the new minister.

Bournemouth.—A Memorial Service was held on Sunday evening in the Bournemouth Unitarian Church for the late Lieut.-Col. S. G. Smith, who had been for twenty years a member and office-bearer in the Church. The service was attended by the mayor and military representatives, and there was a large congregation. To the Scripture lessons were added passages from Wordsworth's 'Character of the Happy Warrior.' The Rev. V. D. Davis, who conducted the service, took for the text of his sermon Deuteronomy, xxxiii. 27: "The eternal God is thy dwelling-place and underneath are the everlasting arms." They would honour the memory of their friend, he said, if they faced their loss with resolute heart, and dwelt rather on the things that remained, and thankfully commemorated the character and achievements of a faithful life. Sidney George Smith was a man whose personality impressed itself vividly upon his friends. There was in him the wholesome power of a vigorous, capable and generous manhood. With him duty was a very real thing, and with it went a full measure of brotherly kindness. So they knew him in the fellowship of their religious life, into which he was drawn as a young man. He stood fearlessly for its simple confession of faith and earnest purpose in well doing. As a responsible member of the Church Committee and as warden he served the interests of the congregation with the same capacity and demand for thoroughness as marked him in all his undertakings, and frankly and gladly he made his contribution to the circle of its friendship; and as they knew him there, he was known in wider circles throughout the town with a very even record of confidence and respect, and, in many ways, of grateful admiration. There was no double-dealing between his religion and his daily life. He had nothing to fear from any scrutiny of his work as a business man, and in that other great interest, in his military service, extending over twenty-eight years, his was a record of true patriotism and genuine devotion. After the Benediction, the 'Dead March' in Saul was played, and four buglers of the 4th Hants Battalion sounded the 'Last Post.'

Dudley.—The Rev. E. Glyn Evans, R.A.M.C., minister of the Old Meeting House Congregation, Dudley, who served with a Field Ambulance as stretcher bearer in the battle of the Somme, was some weeks ago summoned to appear before an Army Medical Board, and as a result of the examination and medical decision he has been discharged from the Army and awarded the Silver War Badge for services rendered. His discharge papers are inscribed "No longer physically fit for War Service."

Ilford.—Two week-day devotional services of exceptional interest have recently been held. One was limited to young people who have been added to the member-roll of the Church during the ministry of the Rev. A. H. Biggs. This took place on a Friday evening, and was carried out entirely by the members themselves. The lessons were read by Miss Dorothy Coote and Miss Olive Hoskins. Mr. Braithwaite offered prayer; Miss Dorothy Syer (Gold Medallist M.A.M.) sang a sacred solo; Mr. J. Kinsman, jun., was at the organ; and the sermon was preached by Miss Marjory Fyson, B.A. The discourse dealt with the responsibility of young people for the influence which they inevitably exert, either consciously or unconsciously, upon those around them. It was a call to cheerfulness, to kindliness, and to self-control.—The other service was held last Saturday afternoon under the auspices of the Women's League, and was for young women. Miss Grace Mitchell conducted the service, and gave an inspiring address upon the need for personal religion and the charge that is laid upon us to act in accordance with the promptings of the voice of God in the soul. Miss H. Brooke Herford followed with an instructive summary of the history of Unitarianism, emphasising the necessity of holding fast to the faith and freedom which were won for us by the heroism and sufferings of our predecessors. Miss Brenda Fyson, L.R.A.M., presided at the harmonium.

Hale.—At the close of evening service at Hale Chapel on Sunday last, Mr. Robert Wolff moved, and Mr. Albert Nicholson seconded, the following resolution, which was adopted by the Congregation, all standing: "That the Hale Congregation have heard with the deepest sorrow of the death of their former Minister, the Rev. T. Lloyd Jones. Though it is nearly forty years since Mr. Jones on leaving college took charge of this Congregation, the memory of his personality and devoted work is still cherished by his old friends and neighbours, who have been proud to hear from time to time of the remarkably successful missionary work of their former minister. The Congregation beg to assure Mrs. Lloyd Jones of their profound sympathy with her in her bereavement." The Rev. James Harwood, an old fellow student of Mr. Jones, who happened to be taking the services at Hale, paid a tribute to his memory, and alluded to his unchanging affection for his old Congregation at Hale.

Leicester.—The 51st anniversary of the Free Christian Church was celebrated on Sunday, October 7, when the services were conducted by Dr. J. E. Carpenter. On the preceding Saturday a social gathering was held in the schoolroom, when addresses of welcome were given by the President, Mr. W. F. Price, and the minister, the Rev. S. Spencer. Dr. Carpenter gave a short address in reply.

Liverpool.—The Rev. J. Collins Odgers has accepted the invitation of the Council to take charge of the congregation of Ullet Road Church until the Rev. L. Redfern is able to take up his residence in Liverpool in the early spring, and will resume his work next Sunday. The congregation are much indebted to Mr. Odgers for so kindly undertaking the work during the winter months.

London, Hampstead.—The opening meeting of the Congregational Society connected with Rosslyn Hill Chapel was held on Thursday, October 18. In the course of the evening, Mr. Gow gave his annual address, and touched briefly upon some of the activities of the congregation and the personal losses during the past year. He then spoke on the subject of Reprisals and deprecated strongly any policy of bombing open towns by night from the air. An interesting discussion followed in which several members of the congregation took part.

London: Stoke Newington.—The small chapel on the Green has long been noted for the excellence of its work among the young, and it numbers several veterans in Sunday School work among its members. The Sunday School Anniversary will be held on Sunday, the 28th inst., when Lieut.-Col. Bullock will preach in the morning, and Dr. Lionel Tayler at the evening service.

Manchester: Blackley.—A most successful Sale of Work was held on Saturday, October 13. It was opened by Mr. E. Whitehead, of Failsworth, and in the unavoidable absence of Mr. S. E. Gilbert Crumpsall, the minister occupied the chair. The Sale realised £96.

Oxford.—At a meeting of ministers held in Manchester College on Wednesday, October 17, the following resolution was carried by fourteen votes to one :—"That the bombing of open towns by way of reprisals is to be condemned."

Sheffield: Attercliffe.—The Liberal cause and Unitarianism in Attercliffe has suffered loss in the death of Mr. James Paterson Ross, at the age of 62, on October 18. Mr. Ross, who had been in failing health for several weeks, was an Aberdonian. He settled in Sheffield some forty-five years ago, and had been in the firm of Vickers, Ltd., during the whole of that time, having for several years filled a position of responsibility, and being awarded a long service medal by the late Mr. Thomas Vickers on the occasion of King Edward's coronation. In his early days he was an enthusiastic member of the Hallamshire Rifles. Mr. Ross leaves a widow and one son, the latter invalided from France. Mr. J. P. Ross was closely associated with the Attercliffe Unitarian Church from its earliest days. He was the first treasurer of the Church, showing a practical interest in all its activities, and served on the committee for many years, helping greatly by his shrewd common sense. He was a man of quiet disposition, but possessing strong religious convictions. Mr. Ross has left behind him a good record of faithful service, and the memory of his character will always be an inspiration. He was a life long abstainer and all progressive causes found in him a keen supporter. The funeral service was held on Saturday, Oct. 20, at Tinsley Park Cemetery, and conducted by the Revs. C. J. Street and J. W. Lee. A large number of members of the congregation, together with many fellow workmen, gathered round the grave side. A Memorial Service will be held on Sunday, October 28.

Harvest Festivals.—A report has been received of the Harvest Thanksgiving Service at Downpatrick.

Temperance Sunday will be observed on November 11 in Churches and Schools throughout the land, and it is to be hoped that the fullest use will be made of the opportunity thus afforded for speaking publicly on this important subject. The National Unitarian Temperance Association will gladly send a supply of pamphlets for distribution if a postcard is dispatched to the Hon. Secretary, Mr. E. F. Cowlin, 19 Northwood Road, Forest Hill, London, S.E.23, stating the number required.

BIRTH.

Philipson.—At the Manse, Downpatrick, on October 22, to Rev. and Mrs. Ralph Philipson, the gift of a daughter.

MARRIAGE.

Shanks—Wrigley.—On October 17, at Stockport, by the Revs. William Fielding and W. R. Shanks, M.S., Sergt. Norman Fraser, younger son of Rev. W. R. and Mrs. Shanks, Bradford, to Dora Elisa, only daughter of Mr. and Mrs. James Wrigley, Heaton Moor, Stockport.

DEATHS.

Carpenter.—On October 16, at his residence at Brookside, Ilkley, Thomas Alfred, youngest son of the late Dr. W. B. Carpenter, C.B., F.R.S., in the 64th year of his age.

Lloyd-Jones.—On October 18, at 16 Marmion Road, Liverpool, Thomas, the beloved husband of Gertrude Lloyd-Jones.

Pilcher.—On October 17, at his residence, The Beeches, Seymour Grove, Old Trafford, Manchester, Lieut.-Col. Pilcher, J.P., aged 80 years.

Richardson.—Killed in action October 9, Basil James Richardson, 2nd Lieut. West Yorks Regiment, the second son of William Richardson, Linfield, Headingley.

Tavener.—On October 20, suddenly, at Aberdeen, the Rev. Lucking Tavener, in his 56th year.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

The address for our Belgian Hospital Fund, to which cheques and parcels of clothing should be sent, is Mrs. Bernard Allen, 14 Gainsborough Gardens, Hampstead, N.W.3.

IN moving the thanks of the House of Commons to the men of the Navy and Army on Monday evening the Prime Minister had a great opportunity which he used worthily. The heart of the whole nation throbbed behind his words. The speech contained many passages which will linger in the memory, like the moving tribute to the men of the merchant service and the striking passage which described the cavalry of the clouds: "High above the squalor and the mud, so high in the firmament that they are not visible from earth, they fight out the eternal issues of right and wrong." But it touched the tenderest chords of emotion in the words at the close: "This great Empire, through this House, enters each home of the heroic dead, grasps the bereaved by the hand, and says:—The Empire owes you gratitude for your share of the sacrifice as well as for theirs, partakes in your pride for their valour and in your grief for their loss."

THE news from Italy, like all the swift vicissitudes of war, came upon us at first with a feeling of anxiety and keen disappointment, but this has been succeeded by strong and resolute sympathy and the confident hope that misfortune will be turned to glorious gain. We all want the Italian people to know what their country and their national inheritance mean to us, and that for us as for them it is intolerable that the Austrians should once again set foot on their soil. Many of our readers will remember how in former days men and women of our own churches honoured and served Garibaldi, while others among them gave to Mazzini some of the consolations of friendship during his long exile.

THE first report of the Select Committee on National Expenditure, which has just been issued, is a document of first-rate importance. There has been a growing disquiet in the public mind about the lavish rate of expenditure and the demand for more and more money on every side. Efficiency and economy usually go hand in hand, and there will be a widespread feeling of relief that there is at last some prospect of an effective check upon the spending departments. This is a matter of grave importance to those of us who are engaged upon religious and philanthropic work. The vast network of charitable effort in the country depends upon the margin which can be spared after the normal cost of living has been met. It is this margin which is seriously threatened. If it is to be saved there must be firm control at the Treasury as well as careful private economies. It is not a question of withholding anything that is necessary for the war, but of spending public money properly.

THE letter in which Sir John Simon has explained to his constituents his reasons for joining the army puts some of the moral issues of the hour in such a plain and persuasive form that we are tempted to transfer a few sentences from it to our own columns.

> In spite of all that has been accomplished by the Allies [he writes], and of the certainty which Sir Douglas Haig's strategy gives us that the enemy is being overthrown, I cannot bring myself to believe in the possibility of negotiating an immediate and satisfactory peace. The peace we want is a peace which will prevent a war like this ever happening again. To be content with less than this is to make all our sacrifices of no avail; to demand more than this is to forget the object for which we went to war and the ideal which has inspired us. Some good and sincere men and women have persuaded themselves that the basis for negotiating such an immediate peace already presents itself, but I cannot agree with them, and to talk of peace when as yet the condition upon which secure peace depends has not been fulfilled only blunts the edge of our resolve. As soon as that condition does arise it will require just as much courage to insist on peace as it now does to carry on war....I can imagine only one crime which is to be compared to the crime of permitting the war to go on for an unnecessary hour, and that is the crime of slackening in our purpose, after all the sacrifices we have made, before a real opportunity of securing it has arisen.

THE movement to secure self-government in the Church of England and remove it as far as possible from the jurisdiction of Parliament has aroused a lively controversy and produced a sharp cleavage of opinion even upon the bench of bishops. Possibly it may be said that it is a purely domestic question with which other people have no right to meddle, but that is not the case so long as the Church of England claims in some special way to represent national Christianity and retains her hold upon the historic buildings in which we all claim a share. Certainly Liberal Nonconformists must look upon any movement for tightening the bonds of uniformity with grave suspicion. It is contrary to the noble ideal of comprehension which they and men of the Broad Church School hold in common.

THE movement to which we refer seems to draw its strength from two motives of very unequal value. The Church feels itself sorely hampered through the lack of democratic assemblies with some power of direction and control. It is reaching forward towards some more adequate expression of corporate faith and desire. But mingling with this in some quarters is the insidious belief that the Church needs to become more narrow and uniform in order to be effective. As soon as a man begins to cultivate intensity of life at the expense of the breadth and richness of his Christian sympathies he has entered upon the downward path which leads to rancour, intolerance, and all uncharitableness. The desire to be narrow in the interests of purity of life and doctrine has existed in all ages of the Church, and it is easy for it to enlist a certain type of hard logic and the passion for efficiency in its service. But all the time the man of broad sympathies with his intellectual tolerance and his gentler habit of speech is a better exponent of the mind of Christ and the grace of heaven.

It will be a matter of genuine regret to people who delight in historical celebrations that the four hundredth anniversary of Luther's great act in nailing his Theses to the church door in Wittenberg finds us in a mood of silence. In recent times the life of Luther has lost some of its romance. The incidents of his career and the qualities of his character have been subjected to an analysis almost cruel in its detachment. It is useless to try to conceal the coarse elements in his nature or the lack of sound leadership which involved the German Reformation in the toils of statecraft at a most critical moment. But in spite of all he was one of the great liberators of the human spirit, though he was no saint. The scene of defiance at Worms remains as a supreme revelation of untamed moral power, and the letter to his little son Hans still speaks to us of the depth and tenderness of his heart.

The autumnal meetings of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, which have just been held with Padiham as a centre, have been marked by a spirit of deep religious earnestness. The group of churches in that district, with their bold democratic sympathies, and a spiritual fervour which they owe to their Methodist ancestry, is particularly interesting at the present time. The problem of effecting a fusion between liberal theology and the vital interests of democracy is for us almost more pressing than any other, but there to a large extent it has been solved. At one of the meetings the chairman of the Padiham congregation, himself we are glad to know a worker at the loom, proclaimed himself an out-and-out democrat, but then he went on to make the significant remark that he was convinced that democracy without religion would become a mob and not a movement.

The Westminster Gazette has a genius for discovering an apt 'Thought of the Day'; but on Wednesday it surpassed itself when it lighted upon this quotation from Mr. Mackail's most companionable volume, 'Select Epigrams from the Greek Anthology' as a motto for All Saints' Day:—'These men having set a crown of imperishable glory on their own land were folded in the dark cloud of death; yet being dead they have not died, since from on high their excellence raises them gloriously out of the House of Hades."

BEATI MORTUI.

We too would say our Gloria in Excelsis for the brave men, the living and the dead, who have saved the country and all the fairest interests of civilisation from irretrievable disaster. By a happy coincidence Parliament set aside a day in this week of Christian commemoration for its solemn act of public gratitude. We are less emotional than some other nations, and we cling fast to the privacy of feeling as inseparable from good manners. We have no day on which we deck the graves of our dead with flowers, and even our affection for one another is often restrained and severely practical. Other people think us cold on this account and lacking in some of the finer elements of imagination, little suspecting how the fire glows beneath the surface and adds strength to the dutifulness of daily life. But there are moments when these barriers of reserve are thrown down by a surging tide of emotion, and even the sense of lonely individuality is lost, in a common experience of danger and deliverance, in which sorrow and exultant pride are strangely mingled.

Of the living, the vast army of strong men and eager-hearted boys, it is not easy to speak, for in their gallant demeanour and their carelessness about themselves they seem almost resentful of praise. If there is any credit it belongs in their eyes to the other fellows and not to themselves, to the companions who went over the top and never came back, to the maimed and the blind who carry already the fiery cross of their martyrdom stamped upon their bodies. We respect their wishes and we know that they are right, for this adventure of theirs is at once too simple and too splendid for common words of gratitude. But what we cannot say with our lips we can express in our lives, as we learn in every thought and act to be more worthy to live in daily companionship with men for whom all earthly interests are of less moment than the cause which they serve.

But about the dead our lips are unsealed. We think of them as they lie under the little wooden crosses in the cemeteries in France and elsewhere. They were the men we knew; they shared our home life; they lived in the same street; they worked with us in the same office. We never knew that there was anything remarkable about them. They were common human clay just like ourselves. And yet hidden in their hearts there was a capacity for heroism beyond anything we have known before, and when we speak of them now it is in the mystical language of religious faith as we remember their share in the greatest sacrifice for goodness and freedom which has ever been demanded at the hands of men. For us and for our children's children their deeds will always be a romance. And for once romance has about it no element of fancy. It is literally true that these men died for the sake of those they love and to save the world from wrong.

In this place, writing for those who are bound together by the affectionate ties of a common religious faith, we would hold in special remembrance the noble band of men and boys who have gone forth from our own churches and Sunday schools, and found on the battlefield and in an heroic death the highest satisfaction of their instincts of duty. It is with unspeakable gratitude to God that we receive this signal proof that our religious teaching has been equal to a supreme test. The vacant places will not be filled and the broken hopes will not be made good, but God has reserved some better thing for us in the unspeakable gift of an undying influence. These churches to which we belong have proved themselves to be the nursing ground of heroes. In the memory of those who are gone we find a new consecration to the service of goodness. Had they lived to serene old age these boys of ours could never have served our church life and the cause of Christ in the world so well as they have done already by giving their lives for our sakes, and not for our sakes only but as their willing tribute to what is immortal in the souls of men. Who among us would be so base as to wish that they had lingered when the others marched away? "The souls of the righteous are in the hands of God and there shall no torment touch them." With them all is well and fair. In a short time they have won a deathless renown, leaving to those who come after them the memory of their glad surrender and the fragrance of perfect deeds.

AN ECHO FROM ÆSCHYLUS.

"Of late I ceased lamenting my own woe,"
Thus, to the driven and tormented Io, said
The suffering Titan, on whose dauntless head
Fell wrath implacable blow after blow
From the stern King of gods. Yet even so
Prometheus o'er his torturer triumphéd,
Because self-pity in his soul was dead,
Consumed for ever in the generous glow
Of pity for the race he loved too well:
For which he lived, and only could not die
Being immortal. O that we may learn
Of thee, Prometheus, then no tears will swell
For private griefs; but our purged souls be free
Only for other's wrongs to strive, and mourn.

THE USE OF PRAYER.

IN the columns of THE INQUIRER an interesting correspondence has been going on as to the use of prayer, and especially of petitionary prayer. One or two of the correspondents have contended that as God is all good and all wise and will surely give us what we need, it is not necessary that we should ask anything from Him. It becomes us rather, they argue, to leave ourselves entirely in His hands, and to accept with gratitude whatever He is pleased to give us.

There is certainly much to be said for this simply passive attitude of mind and heart. Any prayer that is made on the assumption that God would not be aware of our needs and would not supply them unless we told Him of them, can hardly be uttered by those who have learnt from Jesus to worship the Father in spirit and in truth. All truly Christian prayer is based on faith in the Divine love and goodness; and it is in response to this trustfulness rather than to any mere beseeching that God's best blessings come.

Yet Jesus taught his disciples to pray. He bade them ask and they would receive, seek and they would find, knock and it would be opened unto them. His attitude towards God was not merely passive and resigned; in his prayers he asked for the things he greatly desired. In one of his parables he seems to suggest that persistent and importunate begging is sometimes necessary to make God yield us the good things we want. Is it possible, then, to reconcile his inculcation of absolute trust in God's love and care with the counsel thus given us? Is there any inconsistency in our petitioning the Father, who knows what we have need of before we ask Him, and knows it so much better than we do ourselves? Or is there a sense in which His blessings—or some of them at least—are conditional on our seeking them?

Well, we may best, I think, arrive at an answer to this question by comparing spiritual things with material things, as Jesus was accustomed to do.

There are certain things in the physical world that are given to us unsought. Among these are the sunshine and the rain, the alternations of day and night, of summer and winter, seed-time and harvest—all, indeed, of the great processes and works of nature; these existed before we were born, and will be maintained with the same regularity after we pass away from this scene of their operations. Nothing we can do can make the sun halt in his course, or change the autumn back to spring; and we have learnt not to make the attempt We have come to accept the order of the natural world as a Divine order, and to find joy and cause for gratitude in it all. But there is a great deal in the Divine order of nature to which this attitude of passive acceptance and non-interference does not apply. We are constantly interfering with the powers and processes of nature, and we should miss much of the good of life if we did not do so; indeed, it is questionable whether we should be able to live at all unless we interfered with nature in order to make it serve our purposes and yield richer results than it would do without our labour and research. Granted that God is willing to give us all we need, it is yet evident that He does not give altogether without our seeking. As the old Latin saying has it, Laborare est orare —to labour is to pray; and many are the answers that we get to this form of prayer, and that we could not get otherwise. Even were we to reduce the necessities of life to the utmost, we should still, as a rule, have to seek them; they would seldom come unsought. The savage who lives on the bare products of the fields and forests as they come without any cultivation, must nevertheless search for his fruits and nuts, and hunt for his game, often exerting himself as much in this way as the most hard-working civilised labourer does in the effort to get his daily bread. But assuming that man had remained content with what God had originally provided through nature for his sustenance, it is easy to see that a vast amount of the food now available would never have come into existence, and would never have been brought to the perfection it has reached. Walking by the side of a cornfield last July, I had the curiosity to count the grains of wheat on one of the stalks, and I found about one hundred and fifty. Jesus, you remember, in his parable of the sower, speaks of some seeds bearing as much as a hundred fold, which we may regard as the maximum reached by cultivation in his time; but here was a seed whose produce exceeded that amount by 50 per cent. And the increase is due to human study and labour in the selection of the seed and the improvement of the soil—in other words, to the fact that the farmer has been seeking to get more and more from God in nature. God, he felt sure, was willing to yield an ever more abundant harvest, but has made this conditional on human toil and forethought, on the sweat of man's brow. In agriculture the saying is amply justified, Ask and ye shall receive, seek and ye shall find.

Now is there not something analogous to all this in the spiritual order of things? Is there not a sense in which the bread of life for man's soul is only to be had in its perfection and fullest abundance in response to man's demand for it? Is there not a sense in which the converse of the old saying is true—to pray is to labour? May not prayer be as really the means of obtaining spiritual gifts as labour is for getting material ones? And the more we pray, therefore, the more of these gifts we shall receive. God may be ready to bestow these gifts in a measure "above all that we can ask or think," but still He may be waiting until we really desire them before He lets us have them. He may have made our seeking, our prayer, the condition of His giving. And this indeed seems to be the case. Not altogether, of course. The human soul, even in what we may call its wild state, is by no means destitute of spiritual gifts and graces. There is much truth in Tertullian's saying that the soul is "naturally Christian." But it is naturally Christian in the sense that the wilderness, with its beautiful wild flowers, is naturally a garden. The thought of this will prevent us us from undervaluing the fine things that exist in human nature in its primitive un-Christianised condition. The time has happily long gone past when men could speak of the virtues of heathenism as but "splendid vices." We have come to recognise and rejoice in all that is noble and good in the original spiritual endowment of the race. But this does not mean that the race should have been satisfied with its original endowment of spiritual gifts, that it should never have sought to cultivate these to their fullest extent, and to gain possession of others—that it should not have sought to grow that fruit of the Spirit which is love, joy, peace, and the other things named by St. Paul. It has been the experience of men in all ages that these things come largely by means of prayer, which is just the labouring of the spirit. It was owing to his realisation of this fact that Jesus was so earnest in bidding men ask that they might receive, and seek that they might find. To him the question, Why should we pray? would have seemed as foolish as the question, Why should we work? We pray because through prayer we get help in our need, strength to do what is given us to do and to bear what is given us to bear, and the peace of God which passeth understanding. These things come sometimes, it is true, in other ways besides prayer; but the point is that they do come, and come most frequently, by prayer; and prayer, therefore, seems a divinely appointed means of obtaining them.

MEMORIAL NOTICES.

BASIL JAMES RICHARDSON.
FRANK SKELTON.

ON Sunday, July 10, 1898, there were christened together in Mill Hill Chapel six baby boys—an event unprecedented in the Register of Baptisms, which goes back to the beginning of the eighteenth century. A note made in The Record at the time was: "May God, the All Father, bless them, and grant them to grow up good men and true, worthy of the best traditions of the congregation." Very early in life, three of them have proved their worth. One,

Frank Hirsch, was so severely wounded that he was discharged from further military service, and is now at Cambridge. Two, alas! have proved themselves good men and true, while yet mere boys, by the sacrifice of their lives. Their parents, their church, their school, have all reason to be proud of them, even while we mourn the more bitterly a loss, the greatness of which has been manifested by death—death, as our minister wrote in his last letter, "in the holy cause of divine and human justice, as the conscious human organs and instruments of God in this world."

Basil James Richardson.—The second son of William and Beatrice Richardson, was born June 10, 1898. He went to Willaston School in 1909, and left to join the Cameronian Highlanders in May, 1915. He went out in July, 1916, and was engaged in the battles on the Somme, where he shared the terrible hardships to which our troops were exposed. After six months he was sent home to train for a commission. "I was keen to go," he said, "but, oh, war is horrible! I shall be a peace man when this is over." He went out again last August as a sub-lieutenant, having been kept back by illness. When up for medical examination the doctor said to him: "Would you like a few more months at home?" "Nay," he replied, "I think I ought to go." He was presently sent to hospital, suffering with asthma. On coming out he found that a detachment was preparing for attack, and though his name was not included, he begged so hard that he was allowed to join up. It was the dreadful October 9, "the battle of the swamps," and he fell. His colonel, the son of Mrs. Robert Hudson, well known to all engaged in civic work in Leeds, was killed at the same time, and his captain, a son of Mr. Hugh Lupton, was severely wounded. The O.C. of his regiment writes of him: "Our late colonel had a very high opinion of your son and his very gallant spirit. He was working with me the whole night in the foremost area. We had a most difficult and trying work to do; the weather conditions were foul, and the ground was one huge swamp; but never have I seen officer or man more calm, more cheerful, or more confident. He inspired confidence and hope into all of us, and I am proud to think that I worked alongside of him that memorable night." The chaplain of the regiment writes: "He was keen in his work, and I always had a sense of gladness that he was so clean and healthy in mind." A high testimony this.

Frank Skelton.—Younger son of William and Fanny Skelton of Roundhay, was born April 17, 1898. He was educated at Willaston, and went from there to Downing College, Cambridge. While there he joined the Flying Corps, training for a commission, and went out as a second lieutenant in September. He had but three weeks' experience of war when he was killed in action in October.

Dear boys! They have died for us, and great is the debt we owe them—a debt which we can repay only by enduring to the end, and maintaining till victory crowns our labour and sacrifices the cause for which they have given their all. C. H.

MR OSWALD WRIGLEY.

Bank Street Chapel, Bury, has sustained a great loss in the death on October 11 of Mr. Oswald Osmond Wrigley, one of the senior trustees, at the age of eighty-one. The funeral took place on October 15, when, after cremation at the Manchester Crematorium, the ashes were brought to Bury and interred at the Holebottom Unitarian Cemetery. The service in the chapel and at the graveside was conducted by the Rev. E. D. Priestley Evans, minister of Bank Street Unitarian Church, and among those who attended were many representatives of public bodies, hospitals, and other institutions, whose presence bore testimony to the respect in which Mr. Wrigley was held in Bury, and the wide scope of his interests and activities. The Mayor was unfortunately prevented from attending the funeral. In the course of his sermon at Bank Street Chapel on the previous day Mr. Priestley Evans said: It is true that we see only as in a glass, darkly, even at best, although we may believe that a time will come when we shall see face to face and know even as we are known. After our most vivid picturing and imagining death still remains a gateway into a great mystery. And once again have we had to witness the passing that way of one of our fellow-members and a great and valued friend of the cause at Bank Street Chapel, one of the oldest, if not actually our senior trustee. Mr. Oswald Wrigley had not been able to attend for many years past our services in this chapel, through long-continued ill-health and much physical pain. But when he did I am told he used to join in and enjoy the singing of the hymns most heartily; and whenever any real necessity arose we knew we could rely on a very handsome generosity. It is needless for me to relate here his many great and valuable public benefactions. They are well known to all of us. But we shall never know the number and extent of his private considerations, his thoughtful and timely help to various institutions and private individuals. He passed away most peacefully, and had his desire in not suffering a long and lingering illness, his confinement to his bed lasting only about twenty-four hours. He reached the ripe old age of 81 years, and often said in his jocular way that it was time he made room for others. But the end, nevertheless, came very suddenly, and with considerable shock to many of his friends, as well as to his nearest and dearest ones living. We mourn their loss and ours, and would tender to them our deepest sympathy in their bereavement. But they must have great consolation in the fact of his fine integrity, and in the fact that he was possessed of the spirit of doing good. And they have a blessed memory of his bright and cheery nature.

It is interesting to note that Mrs. Wrigley, who died fifteen years ago, and who was married to Mr. Wrigley in 1862 at the Ainsworth Unitarian Church by the Rev. John Wright (at that time minister of the Bury Unitarian Church), was the only surviving daughter of the Rev. James Whitehead, the Unitarian pastor at Ainsworth from June, 1817, until his death, in February, 1859, whose only son was minister at the same place from 1859 until his retirement in October, 1870. Her mother was a younger daughter of the Rev. Joseph Bealey, pastor of the same church from February, 1781, to May, 1786, and from September, 1791, until his death, in August, 1813. The Rev. Joseph Bealey (whose older brother Richard was the grandfather of the first chairman of the Radcliffe Local Board, Richard Bealey, J.P., of Radcliffe Close) was married to Ann Kay, the daughter of John Kay, cloth manufacturer or merchant, of Bass Lane and Bury, the wedding ceremony taking place at Bury Parish Church, when he was in his 27th year. On a gravestone in the Ainsworth Unitarian Burial Ground it is stated, with regard to the Rev. James Whitehead's wife: "Her father, husband, and son were successively ministers of this chapel during a period of ninety years."

WEEKLY NOTES.

I do indeed feel most grateful to all those friends who have helped so generously this week. I have been able to pay the expenses of the Maternity Home up to date and hope to be able to continue to maintain it for as long as it is needed. I have just received a letter from the head of the Belgian Army Medical Service thanking us very warmly for the help we have sent to the hospitals under his charge. I feel sure I can rely on the continued support of friends, and that I may assure him that our help will be continued as long as it is necessary. It is good to think that we have been able to show help and sympathy to the Belgian soldiers during their long three years of fighting and waiting. At last they have been able to move a step forward, and we must all share the feelings of elation that this must bring to them.

UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

AUTUMNAL MEETINGS.

The Autumnal Meetings of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association and the Sunday School Association were held in North-East Lancashire last Saturday, Sunday, and Monday. The district contains some nine or ten churches in various stages of growth and age, from Rawtenstall, founded in 1757, to Blackburn, 1905, many of which owe their origin to the Methodist Unitarian Movement at the beginning of last century, which may account for some of the sturdiness visible to-day. The churches themselves vary from the room in the Liberal Club at Blackburn, the Mission Hall at Burnley, to the fine building at Padiham, with its suite of classrooms and halls, and its outstanding position on the brow of the hill. The towns are typical cotton towns, with their mills, grey stone houses, and paved streets, suggesting nothing so much as drab commercialism of the most uninspiring kind, and crying aloud, therefore, for the brightening influences of a sane, health-giving religion. But in spite of the drabness there is a nobility of character produced amongst these smoke-begrimed hills that should make the most despondent pessimist full of hope for the future of the people and the future of our churches. Travelling in these days is no easy matter, but the meetings were well attended, and all the churches of the district were represented by members who knew that they might have to spend anything up to a couple of hours on the journey to or fro. The weather throughout the week-end was winterly rather than autumnal, and the hills were covered with snow most of the time. Perhaps the London delegates will take with them a more pleasing impression of the surrounding country than otherwise might have been the case ; but let us say at once that the alleged coldness of Unitarian meetings was nowhere else visible.

The first session on the Saturday afternoon was arranged by the Sunday School Association. The meeting commenced with a fifteen-minutes devotional service, conducted by the Rev. J. Arthur Pearson (London), who addressed a few timely words of encouragement to the Sunday School teachers present. This is, we believe, the first time the meetings have been commenced in this way, and we hope the example will be followed at future meetings : it created the religious atmosphere which should be present at more of our gatherings, and which lasted throughout the week-end.

The chair was then taken by the President of the local Sunday School Union, Alderman Wadsworth (Todmorden), who briefly welcomed the representatives of the Sunday School Association. After a response from Mr. Ion Pritchard (Chairman of Committee, Sunday School Association), the Rev. Jesse Pipkin (Colne) read his paper on 'The Boy at the Street Corner,' a subject which needs our serious attention at the present moment, when Sunday school statistics throughout the land show a marked decrease in the number of scholars on the books. These boys must be brought in, but that can only be done by approaching them in a sympathetic manner, and understanding their point of view and their demand for a vigorous religion of deeds, not words. Miss Mary Francis (London) followed, and told of what she had actually done with boys of this class, and how, because she was able to understand and sympathise, she managed to get them first to her home, then gradually by long process back to school, till, finally, she induced them to become assistant superintendents—an excellent piece of work, which showed the mingling of personality and the scientific approach, and the value of such a combination.

Tea was followed by a meeting of the local branches of the Women's League, addressed by Miss Brooke Herford and Mrs. Sydney Martineau, who emphasised the necessity of moving with the times. At the same time, we understand, there was an informal continuation of the afternoon's discussion, during which some valuable points were suggested for the furtherance of Sunday School work. A Social Meeting followed, presided over by Mr. Waddington (Padiham). Musical items were provided by ladies and gentlemen of the Padiham congregation, and brief speeches were given by the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie, Mrs. Martineau, and the Rev. Bertram Lister.

Sunday was a day of special services. Each church had at least one visiting preacher during the day, most had two, and many of the schools were visited on behalf of the Sunday School Association at one or other session. From all quarters came reports of good congregations and bright and encouraging prospects for the future work ; the singing was truly congregational, and each congregation and preacher felt that the day had been good and would remain long in the memory.

Meetings on Monday.

Monday morning found us back at Padiham for a full day's work. At the first session, Mr. Bowie spoke of the missionary work as it applied to the churches of the district, emphasising the necessity of taking the message to the people and the advisability of making more use of the printed page as a means of spreading the gospel we have to offer. In these days each must ask what he is doing to make his work and faith tell on the life and thought of the people, and see to it that he is not content solely to keep for himself the good things that he has. To make it a real missionary conference, Mr. Bowie then called upon representatives of each of the constituent churches to tell of any particular work being done or which there was a desire to do in his neighbourhood—another new departure which might very well and profitably be followed at subsequent Autumnal Meetings—at which discussion the following (among other) points were made : the desirability of holding local conferences for the exchange of ideas and suggestions ; the need for the stronger churches to help the weaker and more missionary ones ; the visitation of the bereaved who go to no church at all ; the need for more advertising ; the care of the soldiers and their dependents. A very profitable and practical session.

At 11.30 the Rev. Fred Hall (Blackburn) introduced the subject 'How should Religious Men and Women deal with the War Spirit ?' Though the speaker explained that he was not referring to the present war, and took as his examples the civil wars in England, the war of the Netherlands against Spain, and the American Civil War, it was shown in the subsequent discussion that the present war was in everybody's mind, and that the subject had to be prospective—how to deal with the war spirit after the war. Get rid of the idea, said the speaker, that war generates heroism; heroism was there before. He maintained that the war spirit was opposed to morality, and he asked whether the churches lead public opinion or merely echo it, suggesting that statesmen should be paid on the model of the payment of Chinese doctors—their salary should automatically stop on the outbreak of war. Mr. Hall found greater concurrence of opinion when he suggested that a change in the method of education was a necessity, though we did not follow him entirely in his opposition to physical drill, since he failed to distinguish the non-military from the military physical drill, with the former of which we have every sympathy. We need self-discipline : reason must outweigh the rifle, argument artillery ; we must be true, not to the highest we can see, but to the highest we could see if we would.

Mr. Hall was followed by the Rev. Herbert McLachlan (Manchester), who said that the war spirit must be dealt with by the Sunday schools and the churches. We must recognise the claims of other nations to have contributed their share to the development of civilisation, but it is essential that there be a higher morality for nations as there is for individuals. Others who contributed to the discussion included the Rev. C. Smith (Nelson), who defined the war spirit as the very embodiment of loyalty and patriotism in the hearts of men and women who felt themselves to be a part of the nation ; this must be transmuted, not crushed, and the old loyalty must be rediscovered in a new loyalty to Christ ; Mr. J. R. Camerson (Burnley), who wanted the Council school brought into line with the Sunday School, had caustic things to say about the German scholarship of the denomination ; Mr. Mackie (Burnley) ; Mr. Howarth (Accrington) ; Dr. Carpenter, who took exception to Mr. Hall's illustrations from past wars, and told how he and others had approached Mr. Carnegie to found a Chair of Peace in the University of Oxford to counterbalance the Chair of Military History, and how the proposal had been rejected because Greek was compulsory ; and Mr. Bowie, who affirmed his faith in the mental sanity of the future.

The luncheon was presided over by Mr. Smith, the President of the Padiham congregation. Brief speeches were made by the Chairman, Dr. Carpenter, Mr. Pritchard, and Mrs. Martineau. The delegates and local officials were then gravely led outside and photographed, for an illustration for the forthcoming number of the Lawrence House Bulletin.

At the first session in the afternoon, the Rev. W. McMullen (Rawtenstall) read a paper on 'How to Bridge the Gulf between the Sunday School and the Church,' in which he emphasised the gulf from the point of view of organisation, advocating one single committee to deal with affairs of the congregation and the school, thus making the separation of the two departments of the work impossible. They should be so linked up that the gulf could not exist. Not that this will do everything: the best teachers are necessary, and the best teachers are those who have been true to their own faith, men and women who have the passion for religion. The Church without the missionary spirit is a dying cause; and if the laity were convinced of the necessity for this closer bond between Church and school, we should not have to appeal in vain. The discussion was carried on by the Rev. J. Morley Mills (Manchester), who agreed that where there was no division there were the happiest results found, but urged the need to get first the right parent, then the right teacher, and the advisability of having a Minister's Preparation Class. The Rev. J. A. Pearson opposed the theory that personality was sufficient and pleaded for more preparation. The Rev. H. Bodell Smith (Mottram) placed his hope in teaching the Unitarian faith.

Then followed the liveliest session of the week-end. Mr. J. R. Cameron (Burnley) gave an address on 'How can the Spirit of Freedom be brought to bear upon the present World Problems of Life and Religion.' The speaker was chiefly concerned to show in what ways he considered the spirit of freedom was being harshly treated at the present time, claiming that we are being threatened from below as well as above, and thinking that it would be a refreshing change to see the Defence of the Realm Act applied to members of the War Cabinet as impartially as it is applied to less dangerous people. But he did not forget the Socialistic propaganda, which he described as doing mischievous work, and the trades unions, which forget that they ought to emphasise efficiency instead of power. Eight people took part in the discussion, but it was not until the fifth speaker that any reference was made to the conscientious objector.

The Public Meeting.

The Public Meeting in the evening was very well attended. The Rev. T. Munn (Padiham) presided, and following the example of the other chairmen of the day, contented himself with introducing the speakers. The Rev. J. C. Flower (Bolton) opened on "Religion and the Individual.' The need for the cultivation of a personal religion, he said, is specially urgent to-day if we are to fit ourselves for the task of the future, and if we are to stand fast now. Underlying that personal religion must be the principle of self-forgetfulness. Self-absorption leads to materialism, which is disastrous in the spiritual realm as in others. Instead of self-absorption there must be first absorption in God and then absorption in man. While we recognise our duties to mankind and freely give ourselves in service, there is something lacking in a personal religion which finds its outlet solely in social work. Without love of God there can be no love of man, which must not be confused with the love of some men. Only those who have completely forgotten themselves in God and the worship of God can stand in the day to come. Wherefore we must learn to worship Love, which is God manifest in our world.

Mrs. Sydney Martineau, speaking on 'Religion and the Family,' pleaded for a deeper family life. On what the parents may be depends what the family will be. While the child should be allowed complete freedom of development, it is unfair that he should be brought up in ignorance of his parents' views and why they hold them. How deep they are, what they mean to his mother and father, the child will soon discover for himself: he is always much more influenced by what his parents are than by what they say. Our sons demand from us and the world what is downright and sincere: that, surely, is the strong point of our faith—sincerity is essential. Simplicity is essential: there must be no mental reservations. Nor must there be any terrors suggested to their minds to make them fear and give them wrong ideas. But do we actually lay before our children our own faith in such a way that it becomes a real factor in their lives? The Sunday school is not enough; the Sunday service is not enough: neither can take the place of home teaching. Mrs. Martineau then spoke of the value of that hour when children are safely tucked up in bed but are not ready for sleep, the hour which the mother may spend "sitting on their toes," as her own boy put it, telling them stories and answering their questions, and forging a bond of union between parent and child which shall last their lifetime. But will the children believe that we believe in the good of church-going if we ourselves do not go? Not that pressure should be brought to bear to compel the child to go; there are other and better means of obtaining the same end. After referring to the value of family prayers, the speaker concluded by saying that it rests with us to bring up our children: we only can do it.

The Rev. H. McLachlan followed with an address on 'Religion and the Church,' in the course of which he emphasised the fact that there was much religion to be found outside the Church, witness to which had been borne by Donald Hankey in his 'A Student in Arms.' He also referred to the recent statement of the Bishop of Manchester that he believed the people were sound on matters of religion, though it might not be quite the kind of religion the Bishop thought. The war had brought problems of religion with fresh insistence before the masses, and the virtues prominent at the front, be it remembered, are undoubtedly Christian virtues. If, therefore, the Church is to win to herself the men who are sound, there must be much clear thinking and straight speaking by the Church's sons. The keynote of our new message must be Love, Service, and Self-Sacrifice. As we have humanised our conception of Christ so must we humanise the conception of Christianity.

The fourth speaker was the President of the Association, Dr. Carpenter, whose subject was 'Religion and the Nation.' The Dean of Durham, a liberal-minded man, Dr. Carpenter said, speaking recently of the new movement towards reunion amongst the denominations, had said that the first essential of those who would unite was the acceptance of ordination at the hands of the Established Church. But we must look for the expression of the religion of the nation from a different direction; we must look for it in a people's self-forgetfulness in love to God and love to man. The task of the future will be to secure that in the coming reorganisation we shall have a manifestation of the great qualities of the masses of mankind, even though certain chaplains at the front had designated them the qualities of paganism. A new war will be started then, a war against evil. Though there are signs that in those days we might not have the intellectual grasp to attack the problems that are waiting to be solved, we must remember that man is not asked to solve problems that are too hard for him. But there is a colossal ignorance on the part of the classes of the conditions of the masses, and we must provide that knowledge; we must set to work to effect the reconstruction from the point of view of justice to the people. Dr. Carpenter concluded by insisting that love of God must begin in love to man, and we should be able then to "build Jerusalem in England's green and happy land."

The meeting concluded with the singing of the hymn 'Now Pray We for our Country' and the benediction.

The delegates from the British and Foreign Unitarian Association were the President, Dr. Carpenter, Mrs. Sydney Martineau, the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie, and the Rev. T. P. Spedding.

From the Sunday School Association: Miss Francis, Mr. Ion Pritchard, the Rev. J. Morley Mills, the Rev. J. A. Pearson, and the Rev. Bertram Lister.

From the Women's League: Mrs. Martineau and Miss Brooke Herford.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Dudley.—Ald. Geo. Bean, J.P., a trustee of the Dudley Old Meeting House and a prominent member of the congregation, has presented to the town of Dudley a palatial residence to be used as a Maternity Home and Hospital, thus meeting what has been for some time a serious local need. Municipal appreciation of his generosity and practical interest in local welfare has been spontaneously expressed in the most cordial terms.

Framlingham.—The 200th Anniversary of the old Meeting House was celebrated on Sunday, October 21, when the Rev. F. Hankinson of Clarence Road, Kentish Town, London, was the preacher, and a large congregation assembled. On the following Monday a Tea and Public Meeting took place, the minister, the Rev. W. H. Sands, presiding. A goodly company of upwards of forty persons sat down to the tea, and at the public meeting which followed, the chapel was well filled with townsfolk and other sympathisers from the neighbourhood. In his opening address, the Rev. W. H. Sands recalled the fact that the Old Meeting House was the oldest place of dissent in Framlingham, and that they were standing on holy ground. The present building was erected in 1717, but the congregation dated as far back as 1660, and owed its origin to a clergyman ejected from the Parish Church. Miss Tagart then spoke. She referred to the father, the late Rev. Edward Tagart, his ministry at the Octagon Chapel, Norwich, and his interest in the Eastern Counties, of his subsequent activity in London where he founded the Little Portland Street Chapel which later on became so noted when Dr. James Martineau of world-wide fame occupied the pulpit, and whom Norwich is proud to claim as a citizen. Miss Tagart pointed out that all these early chapels were founded through sacrifice and effort, and that it is in this spirit that we must maintain them as a living power for good in the world. Earnest and encouraging addresses were also given by the Rev. F. Hankinson, Messrs. W. Burton and W. Waller of Norwich, F. M. Youngman, J.P., and Mr. Newbury of Saxted Green. Letters of regret were read from the Rev. W. J. R. Petherick (Congregationalist) and Mr. Alexander Lyle Samuel of Leiston. The congregation had the pleasure of welcoming the Rev. A. Basden of Rendham (Congregationalist) who, however, unfortunately had to leave early before addressing the meeting, but not before he had expressed to Mr. and Mrs. Sands his friendly sympathy. It is gratifying to note that the Old Meeting House is now in excellent repair, the interior has lately been re-varnished and renovated, and the well-lighted building decorated with flowers and autumn foliage presented a very bright and cheerful appearance on this 200th anniversary. It may also be mentioned that the approach to the Chapel has been made attractive by the trim lawn and abundance of flowering plants, and that the little graveyard at the back is in good order. Mr. Dorling, the indefatigable Chapel Secretary has made a detailed and accurate plan of the tombstones, and has presented a copy to the trustees of the Old Meeting House to be placed with other valuable documents in their strong box. In the past century Framlingham Unitarians took a leading part in political and social reforms, and won the respect and admiration of the townsfolk even of many who differed from them on religious matters. It is a source of congratulation that the present minister, the Rev. W. H. Sands, has won universal esteem and confidence, and is a brave champion of civil and religious liberty and all that it implies. Thus the Old Meeting House keeps true to its traditions, and is holding its place in the town.

Halifax.—The congregation of Northgate-End Chapel are to be congratulated on the honours which have been conferred on two of their members, Mrs. Laura Willson, who has been awarded the Order of the British Empire for her services in connection with the organisation of women's labour in munitions workshops, and Corporal W. H. Dimsdale, of the King's Royal Rifle Corps, 18th Battalion, who, having previously won the Military Medal for dressing the wounded under heavy fire in the field, and subsequently gaining a bar to the medal, has now won the D.C.M. In the November Calendar reference is also made to the fact that Councillor Howard Clay, whose wife is a devoted member of the Northgate-End congregation, has been made Mayor of Halifax. Mr. Clay will be present, in his official capacity, at the morning service on Sunday, November 11.

Ilford.—Anniversary Services were held on Sunday which were conducted in the morning by Mr. H. G. Chancellor, M.P., and in the afternoon by the minister, the Rev. A. H. Biggs. At the conclusion of the afternoon service a Recognition Service was held by the minister at which four of the junior members of the congregation were admitted to full membership.

North Cheshire Unitarian Sunday School Union.—The 54th Annual Meeting of the Union was held at Flowery Field on Saturday last, attended by sixty-five delegates and teachers. At the meeting of the Committee in the afternoon the chair was taken by the retiring President, the Rev. A. Thornhill. After tea the business meeting was held, the new President, Mr. Wm. Thompson, being in the chair. Apologies for absence were received from the Revs. H. E. Dowson, H. E. Perry, F. H. Vaughan, C. Travers and Jos. Wilson and Mr. George Cocks. The annual report and financial statement, presented by Mr. A. Slater, the hon. secretary, were received and adopted. The report, which was the 31st, referred to the fact that 1091 names were on the Rolls of Honour of the fifteen schools in the Union, and that no less than 71 had made the great sacrifice. The statistics showed an increase in the number of teachers, but a decrease in the number of scholars. The Rev. J. Ellis was elected vice-president, and Mr. J. E. Williamson, Gee Cross, was re-elected hon. treasurer. The Rev. J. Ellis was also re-elected representative to the Manchester District Sunday School Association, and Mr. M. Barnes, Flowery Field, to the Music Committee of the latter Association. The Rev. J. S. Burgess gave an interesting and suggestive address on 'The Religious Difficulties of Children,' based upon the book of that title by Mrs. Mumford. Pressure of time prevented lengthy discussion, but short speeches on the subject were given by Mrs. Dowson and the Revs. A. Thornhill and C. E. Read. Other ministers present included the Revs. D. W. Robson, B.D., and H. Bodell Smith.

Taunton.—If any congregation has copies of the Berwick Hymnal for disposal they would be of great service at Mary Street Chapel, Taunton, where the work is showing such encouraging signs of progress under the ministry of the Rev. G. S. Woods. Communications on the subject should be sent to Mr. Woods at Rose House, Bathpool, Taunton.

Todmorden.—On Wednesday, October 24, the Rev. Harold Twyford (United Methodist) lectured in the Unitarian school. The Rev. A. W. Fox took his Wednesday evening service for him. On September 23 the Rev. C. Biggin took the Harvest Festival services at Inchfield Bottom (United Methodist), and the Rev. A. W. Fox at Eastwood (Congregational). The same day the Rev. S. Smith (Congregationalist) preached in the morning, and the Rev. G. Kilgour (United Methodist) in the evening at the Unitarian Church.

☞ THE Fight for Right Movement has arranged a series of lectures on 'Industrial Reconstruction,' which will be given at the Æolian Hall, New Bond Street, on six consecutive Sunday afternoons at 3.15, beginning on November 4. The opening address will be by the Master of Balliol, and the lecturers include Lord Leverhulme, who will speak on the 'Six-Hour Day' (November 11); Sir George Paish on 'International Trade' (December 9); Mr. A. E. Zimmern on 'The Functions of the State' (Nov. 18), and Mr. Victor Fisher on 'Capital and Labour' (December 2). These lectures have been planned with the special object of imparting accurate information on the present industrial situation and the problems arising from it, which is an essential preliminary to the formulation and acceptance by the public mind of any sound policy of reconstruction in the future,

DEATHS.

BROCK.—On Saturday, October 27, at her residence, Holland House, Swansea, in her 75th year, Mary Emma, the eldest surviving daughter of the late George Browne Brock, of Brynsifi, Swansea.

FUNNELL.—November 1, at 3 Grange Road, Lewes, Alice Nora, wife of Wm. B. Funnell.

HUDSON.—On October 27, at Bakewell, John Pouriall Hudson, in his 70th year.

OLIVER.—On October 26, at Saunder's Green, Stalybridge, Joseph Oliver, in his 82nd year. Interred at the Old Chapel, Dukinfield, on October 30.

RENDALL.—Mrs. Julia Rendall, who died October 31 at Allington House, Bridport, Dorsetshire, in her 90th year. Cremation at Golders Green.

SKELTON.—Killed in action, October 21, aged 19, Frank Skelton, Second Lieutenant (Pilot) Royal Flying Corps, younger son of William and Fanny Skelton, Adare, Roundhay, Leeds.

STEAD.—Killed in action, October 9, Edmund (Eddie), the dearly loved nephew and adopted son of Emily, and the late Rev. J. E. Stead, aged 19 years and 11 months.

APPEAL.

The Committee asks friends for financial help in order to meet the cost of repairs to the Church and School buildings.

These had been postponed owing to the War, but the conditions of the fabric has become so bad during the last two years, that further delay would have been disastrous.

Mr. Arnold S. Tayler, at the request of the London District Unitarian Society, inspected the buildings and submitted a report of such repairs as were structural and indispensable.

The work has been put in hand, and the estimated cost is about £250. The Congregation has guaranteed to raise one third of the amount, and, as this will tax their utmost resources, the Committee has to make this urgent appeal for outside help.

Subscriptions will be thankfully received by the Minister,

REV. R. TRAVERS HERFORD, B.A.,

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

The address for our Belgian Hospital Fund, to which cheques and parcels of clothing should be sent, is Mrs. Bernard Allen, 14 Gainsborough Gardens, Hampstead, N.W.3.

WE cannot withhold a note of congratulation upon the recent appeal for increased support for our Belgian Hospital Fund. Nearly £750 has been contributed in three weeks, a result which shows how firmly the work is entrenched in the confidence and affection of our readers. We meet people sometimes who express surprise that we are still going strong after nearly three years of constant effort; they expected that interest would have vanished and support run dry long ago. But we who know both the extremity of the human need and the wonderful appeal which it has made to a wide circle of generous men and women are not surprised that the means of doing good are still placed at our disposal. Our faith has been justified, and we can only say that we are proud and happy and very grateful.

To people who do not live in the atmosphere of abstract discussion the Peace debate in the House of Commons this week will probably appear almost perversely inopportune, when the crowning need of the moment is to bring military help to Italy. Even its supporters will hardly be inclined to defend it on the ground of its timeliness. The real line of cleavage seems to be not so much in regard to our ultimate aims as between two divergent views of the present temper of Germany. If we could trust her, and found it possible to believe that her aims are really peaceable and humane, the way of peace would be much easier than it is. But unfortunately the evidence is all in favour of Mr. Balfour's view that Germany is "a Power more deliberately bent upon domination than any Power that has ever existed—upon a cold-blooded, deliberate, calculated, educated, skilful domination—which aims to be the dominating Power first of Europe and then of the world." This belief, which cannot be set down to passion or prejudice for it is held by the most intelligent and humane men in the country, makes the defeat of the aggressor our first aim in the war, and it is an aim which must control all the rest. It is not a mere question of politics about which wise men can agree to differ. It is a fundamental question of morals, which governs all our daily actions, and the whole future of the world depends upon it.

IN spite of many suggestions to the contrary, and the different problems which occupy the public mind and threaten to distort its judgment in the course of a long war, we have never seen any reason to suppose that our aims in the war are different from what they were at the beginning. On this subject Mr. Asquith was quite explicit in the debate on Tuesday night. He pointed out that the aims which he had explained three years ago were neither imperialistic nor vindictive. They were aims needed for the double purpose of the emancipation and security of Europe. So far as his knowledge went they had not in any particular been extended. And his hope was that they would not be in any particular contracted. For unless and until they were obtained there could be no hope for the enduring peace of the world.

MR. G. K. CHESTERTON has sent a trenchant letter to The Westminster Gazette, in which he pleads for the unity of all democrats in view of the sharp challenge and peril which is at present menacing the old Liberal ideal of United Italy.

> The invasion of Italy [he writes] may well find our position as solid with self-evident justice as did that dark but glorious day that told us of the invasion of Belgium. That unity, especially among Liberals, has been largely lost of late, by debates about various shades of compromise supposed to involve a potential peace with the Germans.....But I do not propose at present to discuss this; on the contrary, I propose at present that we should stop discussing it. For under the shadow of anything like a German military triumph, until it is shown to be a temporary triumph, it really is a deadly question whether we can "make the world safe for democracy."....I do not believe for a moment that even those Liberals who hanker after a compromise peace desire to give the last laurels to a mere War-Lord like Hindenburg; no pacifist can be so militarist as that. I suggest, therefore, that, until the doubt is over, we can honestly claim his most driving energy from every democrat in the world.

WE are in entire sympathy with the memorial which has appeared in the Press, pleading with the Government to reconsider its decision not to proceed with Mr. Fisher's Education Bill this session. The memorial is signed among others by Mrs. Creighton, Mr. Arthur Henderson, Dr. F. B. Meyer, the Bishop of Oxford, Principal Selbie, the Master of Balliol, and the Bishop of Winchester, so there can be no ground for the suspicion that the perennial religious difficulty has had anything to do with the postponement. "We pronounce no opinion," the memorial says, "upon the detailed administrative provisions of the Education Bill introduced by the President of the Board of Education. But its educational proposals, in particular the abolition of exemptions from full-time school attendance under 14, and the establishment of a system of part-time continued education, have the approval of those best qualified to judge of them. We submit that it is in the public interest that those educational proposals should be passed into law at a sufficiently early date to be brought into operation before the conclusion of the war confronts the nation with a host of other domestic problems demanding immediate attention."

IT is refreshing to find Sir Auckland Geddes inaugurating his work as Minister of National Service with an admirable little homily to his staff on manners and morals. Here are some of its maxims which deserve to be laid to heart by all who are engaged in public or business life. "At all times remember this—that whether the words that have to be said are pleasant or unpleasant to the hearer, whether they be of praise or of rebuke, courtesy and dignity can do no harm; rudeness, levity, and ill-temper can do no good."—"Remember, too, that no member of the staff in his or her capacity as a Government official has any opinion on religion or religious beliefs, on politics, on class, or on social distinctions. The laws that we have to administer have to be enforced impartially and without fear, favour, or affection, in accordance with the instructions issued from time to time."—"Avoid all forms of corruption, especially the subtle. There is no more difficult thing in the whole sphere of our duties than to avoid being corrupted by wile."—"Be on your guard. The forms which corruption takes are legion. I have known more men corrupted by pretended friendship than by any other wile. Remember in all your official acts you are the representatives of the will of the nation itself, and that that will is that there shall be the most scrupulous impartiality and fairness between man and man."

A CORRESPONDENT in The Times points out how independency among Congregationalists is moving towards some form of central control. In part this is due to the growth of large funds for the support of the ministry which require some guarantee of efficiency, but it is also intended to counteract some of the difficulties and dangers of isolation. It is stated that proposals have been framed for the appointment of nine superintendent ministers in England and Wales, who are to be selected on the ground of their experience and other special gifts which will enable them to be real "fathers in God." The experiment promises to be a very interesting one in the exercise of personal control without statutory powers. If it succeeds it will tend to place a salutary check upon some of the disintegrating forces in the Nonconformist ministry, where there is a ceaseless and degrading competition for the well-paid posts, with a growing preference for young men of pleasant gifts and slender experience, who certainly have not earned their promotion by graduating in the school of life. Any profession which has no honourable rewards for faithful service, and tends to make a man feel that he is too old at forty, so far as any larger sphere of influence is concerned, has in it the seeds of rapid decay. We see no remedy for this state of things in the case of free communities except in the growth of a strong and healthy public opinion. The system of superintendent ministers may create a closer link between the conscience of the community and the affairs of the individual congregation than has existed in the past, and so help to make the ministry less of a lottery and more of a career.

A SCHOOL OF CHARACTER.

WHENEVER we turn back to the early records of Nonconformity in this country we are struck with fresh admiration of the moral greatness which they display. To many readers Calamy's 'Account' may be a dull book, a mere catalogue of forgotten names; but those who allow the light of the imagination to play upon it, find in its pages a moving story of heroism which has left its impress upon national life and character. The same may be said of the remarkable document, long forgotten among the archives of the Presbyterian Board, which has just been edited by the Rev. Alexander Gordon. 'Freedom after Ejection' deals only with the religious activities of Presbyterian and Congregational ministers, 1690-2, when for two years after the passing of the Toleration Act they co-operated in a happy union, in order to succour the distressed and to aid students in their studies. Their aim was to place their worshipping assemblies upon a permanent basis and to secure the future of an educated ministry. The long list of names, arranged according to counties, with short notes in another column, reveals the thoroughness with which the work was done. These notes are full of shrewd observations and quaint touches. In several cases the remark is made "hath a competencie," but elsewhere the signs of a hard struggle against poverty are unmistakable. On the case of Mr. James Wright of Attercliffe the note is as follows: "His condition extreamely necessitous, labours abundantly, hath about 12*l*. per annum, three small children himself very infirm, having almost lost y^{e} Sight of both eyes." Another is simply described as "a gracious man of great use aged 56" without any indication of his means. There is abundant evidence of the desire of congregations for a settled ministry, and also of the care which was taken to select and encourage suitable candidates. On these matters the following entries may be quoted as typical. "There is preaching but once a Lords day in a fortnight because they can make up but a Small maintenance, and ministers are Scarce."—"There might be a greater meeting if there were a Settled Minister and a Competent maintenance."—"One John King a poor Cuttler in Sheffield has a hopeful Son almost ripe for Academical Studies, y^{t} wth Some assistance might make a usefull instrum^{t}."

Freedom after Ejection. Edited by Alexander Gordon, M.A. Manchester, at the University Press; London, Longmans, Green & Co. 15*s*. net.

Of the extraordinary care which Mr. Gordon has bestowed upon the editing of this unique document it is unnecessary for us to speak. But he has performed a task of at least equal importance by interpreting its significance to the modern reader. For him it is instinct with the deepest human interest. His commentary is written in a tone of chivalrous veneration for these pioneer. of the religious freedom of our own days It is their spirit of intrepid courage and tender devotion that lives again in these words in which he celebrates their memory:—

"By help of the late-found Manuscript elucidated by the Minutes of the body, for whose use it was framed, we are introduced to a new and clear view of the residue of the Ejected. A glorious residue indeed it is. Passed away into the shadows are many famous leaders of religion and of learning, Alleine, Ambrose, Bridge, Caryl, Gale, the Goodwins, Jenkyn, Manton, Nye, Owen, Poole, Spurstowe, Tuckney—these and their like are no more than gracious memories, when the muster-roll of the Bartholomaeans is called in 1689. Baxter survives in widowed loneliness, still plies his keen and ever-busy quill, and still can sometimes crawl to the Meeting-house a few doors from his lodging.

"Yet the vision before us is neither of the gone nor of the going. It is a fair and shining vision of old men, with young hearts and never-dying hope, springing into fresh and beneficent activity as the sunlight of freedom beams upon their path, resolute to find new opportunities for Gospel enterprise, willing for the moment to sink minor differences in the enthusiasm of a common cause, strong in the co-operation of a younger race of divines, who amid constant hindrance and persecution had devoted themselves to the service of the Gospel, carrying forward a labour of love, hallowed to them by the sacrifices of their fathers....

"No doubt there are features of pathos. It is not possible to scan unmoved the touching list of London Ministers 'not fixed to particular congregations.' Some will never again be thus fixed; they are the broken-down veterans swept from many quarters into London as to a city of refuge, needing the charity of the benevolent, yet ready, nay, anxious to render, while they may, such service as their failing strength permits. Sprinkled among them in the list are stalwarts of ripe years, whose powers will soon find fit scenes of further labour, and young men on their promotion, whose permanent sphere of work has not yet been reached. In these seasoned standard-bearers and these brave beginners are latent the forces which will build the future of English Nonconformity."

Many of our readers count some of these men among their ancestors; their names mingle with our family traditions, and we hold for the uses of our own day the meeting houses which they built for the worship of God. We are reminded once again that whatever worth our movement may have had in the sphere of knowledge and thought, its chief claim for national respect has been as a school of character. By its severe standards of simplicity and its readiness to sacrifice worldly station to spiritual worth, with a devotion to freedom which has never sunk into licence and a sensitiveness of conscience free from the temptations of pedantry, it has maintained a tradition of private virtue and public service which has enlarged the liberties of men and won for the exact performance of duty a place of equal respect with the mystic's rapture and the prophet's dream. We do not make a boast of these things, for to boast of any virtue is to lose it. Rather do we feel how much faithful effort is still required of us in order to make our fellowship into a school of character worthy of the spirit of its founders and equal to the stern duties of the time.

BEERSHEBA AND GAZA.

The recent capture of Beersheba and Gaza by our troops under General Allenby gives special interest to the following passages from Sir George Adam Smith's book on 'The Historical Geography of the Holy Land.'

Beersheba.

"Of all names in Palestine there are hardly any better known than Beersheba. Nothing could more aptly illustrate the defencelessness of these southern slopes of Judah than that this site which marked the frontier of the land was neither a fortress nor a gateway, but a cluster of wells in the open desert. But, like Dan, at the other end of the land, Beersheba was a sanctuary. These two facts—its physical use to their flocks, its holiness to themselves—are strangely intermingled in the stories of the Patriarchs, whose herdsmen strove for its waters; who themselves plant a tamarisk, and call on the name of Jehovah, the everlasting God....There are seven wells there now, and to the north, on the hills that bound the valley, are scattered ruins nearly three miles in circumference. Beersheba was a place of importance under Samuel; his sons judged there. Elijah fled to Beersheba. It was still a sanctuary in the eighth century, and frequented even by Northern Israel.... In Roman times Beersheba was a very large village with a garrison. It was the seat of a Christian bishopric. The Crusaders did not come so far south, and confused Beersheba with Beit-Jibrin.

"South of Beersheba, for thirty miles, the country, though mostly barren, is sprinkled with ruins of old villages gathered round wells. They date mostly from Christian times, and are eloquent in their testimony to the security which the Roman Government imposed on even the most lawless deserts."

Gaza.

"Gaza lies to-day where she lay in the most ancient times, on and around a hill, which rises 100 feet above the plain, at three miles distance from the sea. Fifteen wells of fresh water burst from the sandy soil, and render possible the broad gardens and large population. The Bedouin from a hundred miles away come into the bazaars for their cloth, weapons, and pottery. In the days when the pilgrimage to Sinai was made rather from Syria than from Egypt, the caravans were organised in Gaza for the desert march. The inhabitants were characterised as 'lovers of pilgrims,' whom, no doubt, like the Damascenes, they found profitable. As from Damascus, so from Gaza great trade routes travelled in all directions—to Egypt, to South Arabia, and in the times of the Nabatean kingdom to Petra and Palmyra....But Gaza has even closer relations with Egypt. The eight days' march from the Delta requires that if an army come up that way into Syria, Gaza, being their first relief from the desert, should be in friendly hands. Hence the continual efforts of Egypt to hold the town. Alike under the Pharaohs of the sixteenth to the fourteenth centuries, and the Ptolemies of the third and second, we find Gaza occupied, or bitterly fought for by Egyptian troops. Alexander, invading Egypt, and Napoleon, invading Syria, had both to capture her. Napoleon has emphasised the indispensableness of Gaza, whether in the invasion or the defence of the Nile Valley. Gaza is the outpost of Africa, the door of Asia."

THE USE OF PRAYER.

To the Editor of The Inquirer.

Sir,—The important subject of prayer has recently engaged the serious attention of some who have written to The Inquirer about it in suggestive and helpful ways. May I also refer your readers who are interested to the second lecture on 'Worship—Prayer' delivered by G. Vance Smith in St. George's Hall, London, in March, 1881, and contained in the volume entitled 'Positive Aspects of Unitarian Christianity'? I have found his treatment of the subject thorough and helpful and wish to recommend it to others in the hope that they also may derive benefit after a careful study of his luminous and well-expressed thoughts on a question which presents many difficulties to thoughtful people at the present time. Worship and prayer are destined to form leading items in the programme of theological reconstruction and religious revival.—Yours, &c.,

WAR BONUS TO OUR MINISTERS.

To the Editor of The Inquirer.

Sir,—The financial strain imposed on many of our ministers by the increased cost of living is very severe, and falls with especial weight upon the smaller incomes. The managers of the Sustentation Fund have recently resolved to give a Christmas bonus of £5 to all ministers of congregations which are in receipt of their grants, and an additional £5 to those among them whose total earned income does not exceed £200. This may perhaps absorb about £750. The Committee of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association will assist in providing a war bonus of £10 to all other ministers of congregations whose income in like manner does not exceed £200. This will probably involve an additional expenditure of £750. It therefore becomes necessary to make a special effort to meet this exceptional need. "Association Sunday" falls this year on November 18, and the Committee venture to suggest that contributors to the annual collection (whether taken on that or any other Sunday) should bear in mind the grievous hardship of many of the poorer ministers, and should by generous donations raise a sufficient sum to enable the Committee to make this benefaction of goodwill, without impairing the general efficiency of the Association's work. The money will be distributed by the Presidents of the two Funds in concert; and it is not, of course, intended to publish the names of the ministers.

Any one prevented from contributing to the Association Sunday Collections may send a donation for this special purpose to the Treasurer of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, Essex Hall, Essex Street, Strand, London, W.C.2. Cheques should be made payable simply to the Order of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association—Yours, &c.,

J. Estlin Carpenter, President, British and Foreign Unitarian Association.

LAWRENCE HOUSE.

To the Editor of The Inquirer.

Sir,—The Bulletin for Christmas and the New Year is now in preparation and its dispatch to men in distant parts will begin very shortly. I should be grateful if ministers and others who can supply names and addresses of those to whom it should be sent will assist in making the list as complete as possible, and will do so without delay. Some ministers and congregations have taken infinite pains in giving us all the help in their power, and to them we are greatly indebted, but there are still some congregations from which even a first list has not been received, and some of the men feel aggrieved at not receiving Lawrence House communications. In a large number of cases the names of those who have joined H.M. Forces during 1917 have not yet been received. The names and addresses of any of our young women engaged on war-work away from home should also be sent us, so that they, too, may receive copies of the new issue.—Yours, &c.,

M. Edith Martineau,
Chairman Lawrence House Committee.

BOOKS AND REVIEWS.

The Ways of War. By Prof. T. M. Kettle, with a Memoir by his wife, Mary S. Kettle. London, Constable & Co. 7*s.* 6*d.* net.

This volume is a moving tribute to the memory of a brilliant Irishman. It explains the reasons why Tom Kettle the Nationalist, with some of the uncompromising intransigeance of Irish Nationalism in his blood, died as a soldier in the British army.

He was quick to grasp the moral significance of this gigantic struggle for the future of civilisation, and he fought not for England but for Europe and for the Ireland which he loved. Even the rebellion, which broke out just before he went to France, and the terrible fate of his brother-in-law, Sheehy Skeffington, did not shake his resolution. "It is impossible not to be with Belgium in this struggle," he wrote, "it is impossible any longer to be passive. Germany has thrown down a well-considered challenge to all the forces of our civilisation. War is hell, but it is only a hell of suffering, not of dishonour, and through it, over its flaming coals, Justice must walk, were it on bare feet." He was an ardent Catholic, and regarded religion as "one of the ideal forces that make men good citizens and gallant soldiers." He was convinced that "if soldiers will not fight on an empty stomach, still less will they fight on an empty soul." One of the most interesting of the essays reprinted in this volume deals with the Soldier-Priests of France. It may be commended to the notice of those who have defended the exemption of the clergy in our own country. It is the deliberate opinion of many careful observers that the inclusion of priests in the ranks of the French army has done more to create an atmosphere favourable to religion than anything which has happened in recent years. Their selfless courage has extorted admiration even from the anti-clericals. All these brilliant essays, with their frequent touches of pungent realism, are good reading; but in charm they must yield place to the Memoir, in which the hand of affection has traced for us a portrait of singular force and beauty. It has upon it the glow of indomitable youth, and sparkles with the bright sayings of a man who was a poet and a wit as well as an ardent patriot. Some exquisite lines written to his little daughter from France a few days before he was killed reveal the secret motive which made him a soldier and inspired the last act of heroism:—

Know that we fools, now with the foolish dead,
Died not for flag, nor King, nor Emperor,
But for a dream, born in a herdsman's shed,
And for the secret Scripture of the poor.

CHRISTIAN TELEPATHY.

THE SURVIVAL OF JESUS. By John Huntley Skrine, D.D. London, Constable & Co. 5*s*. net.

DR. SKRINE has given us several books already marked by independent thought and beautiful with a vein of meditative insight. But in its suggestiveness, and the candour with which he applies the criticism of his own experience to the problems of Christian doctrine and brings everything to the touchstone of Life, this volume on the 'Survival of Jesus' has special claims upon our attention, which some of its predecessors hardly possess in the same degree. The form of narrative which he has adopted has the advantage of imparting an element of personal interest to the whole subject. He is one of the wise men who sees that a conversational hint or the sidelights which play about a writer's mind mayhave more religious help in them than a dogmatic statement. The book opens with the following question, "Am I, —I, John Desmond, residentiary Canon of Dumminster, am I all the while — Unitarian?" Perhaps we may venture to suggest that the whole tendency of the discussion is to remove the sting of these words even for the orthodox mind; for many of the controversies of the past fall to pieces as soon as we realise that the object of Christianity is not to fence us round with dogmas or teachings about God but to give us life. This is recognised without reserve in many places in this book. We give two typical examples:

"When I call Christ also the Life of men, I declare a power in Him to impart life, to cause men to live as He lives. While I go no further than this in my definition of Christ the Life I lose the company of none of my Christian brethren. They have always said the same." "Jesus takes sin away by giving life. Sin is the failure of life. Heinous sin or venial, it is the same; it is disease winning against health, disintegration against wholeness, decay outstripping reparation, death defeating life. In the stricken body nothing can remove disease except more life infused; in the stricken soul disease is called Sin, but its cure is no otherwise. Christ takes it away by giving the sinner life."

Taking this belief in a communicated life as the starting-point, from which traditional doctrine is to be judged and if necessary restated, Dr. Skrine proceeds to ask, how was this gift imparted by Jesus during his earthly life, how does he impart it now from the heavenly places? He believes that the answer is to be found in a faith-transference, a telepathy of spirit. "A thought-transference," he says, "is a telepathy, if it only cross the breadth of a hearth between one silent sitter and another. Across just such an interval the faith of Jesus transferred itself to a companion. The notions of his all-pure intelligence and all-devoted will, expressed in speech and conduct or even unexpressed, are not reabsorbed within him nor exhaled on the air; they went out of him as virtue, their vibration struck upon souls around him, and where these were attuned to receive the vibration life started in them at the shock." It is, so he argues, in the same way that Jesus has been redeeming men ever since by the transference from behind the veil of the vitalising power of his own personality to men who look to him for help. We have no space to discuss this bold attempt to enlist psychical research in the service of Christian experience. The unfamiliarity of the ground makes us anxious to proceed with caution, while we cling tenaciously to the bestowal of life as the crowning achievement of Christianity. It is the reception of the gift and not the method of its coming which is our primary concern; but the method is none the less a matter of deep interest, and we cannot resist the fascination of this doctrine of Christian telepathy, even while we hold our judgment in suspense. Dr. Skrine has returned to the subject in an article on 'Telepathy as interpreting Christ' in the current number of The Hibbert Journal. Readers who are interested and perhaps a little puzzled by the article will do well to turn to the much fuller discussion contained in this volume.

The Social Service Quarterly for October contains an article by Dr. Mellor on 'The Ethics of Incarnation' (one of the new series on 'Fundamental Principles' which are being issued in leaflet form); a third instalment of the Rev. W. Whitaker's study of the question, 'Will there be a World-State?' and an article on the 'Scheme of Christian Social Reconstruction,' referred to in our columns some months ago, which is now published in pamphlet form with a Preface by the Bishop of Oxford. Copies may be had gratis from the Rev. H. H. Johnson, The Orchards, Croft Road, Evesham.

MEMORIAL NOTICES.

MRS. FIELDING JOHNSON.

IT is with deep regret that we have to announce the death of Mrs. Fielding Johnson, the wife of Mr. T. Fielding Johnson, J.P., "Brookfield," Leicester, which took place after a short illness last Saturday. She was the daughter of the late Mr. Alfred Paget, and was married to Mr. Fielding Johnson in 1863. Throughout her life she was devoted to the welfare of Leicester and its people, and has left her mark on the life of the town, especially from an educational point of view. She was a member of the original board of the Wyggeston Grammar School for Girls, and had been a manager of several of the Council Schools and Special Schools for backward children. For some years she was a member of the House Committee of the Leicester Royal Infirmary. She performed a distinguished service to the town in writing 'Glimpses of Ancient Leicester,' a book which has achieved a recognised place among local histories. Like the rest of her family, she was closely connected with the Great Meeting, and was unfailing in her interest and support of the various activities of the congregation and Sunday school. Many of our readers have gracious memories of the friendship and hospitality of her home, with its wide sympathies and eager interests, and will desire to express their deepest sympathy with Mr. Fielding Johnson, Mrs. W. W. Bruce, and her other relatives in their sorrow.

MR. J. OLIVER.

WE regret to announce the death of Mr. Joseph Oliver of Stalybridge, one of the founders of the Stalybridge Unitarian Church and Schools, which took place on Friday, October 26. Mr. Oliver, who was a director of Messrs. J. Cheetham's Bankwood Mill, was born at Dukinfield on April 24, 1836, and early in life was trained for the teaching profession; this he gave up, however, in order to follow a business career, which brought him opportunities of showing qualities which won him much respect in that connection. Outside affairs of business, Mr. Oliver had few relaxations, especially in his later days. When a young man he became a teacher in the Old Chapel Sunday School, Dukinfield. At that time education was not what it is now, and hundreds of men and women learned to write in the Sunday school and at night classes. Along with several of his friends, Mr. Oliver helped in this good work for many years, but his greatest work was done in the founding of the Unitarian Church and Schools at Stalybridge, which to-day may be said to stand as a memorial to him and those few others associated with him in the early days of its history. He was the first and only treasurer of the Hob Hill Sunday School, having at the time of his death held the office for fifty-five years. On the occasion of the jubilee celebration he was presented with a gold medal as a memento of his long connection with the institution. He was one of the most active members of the congregation, and also one of the most prominent at the time of the building of the church in Canal Street, being Chairman of the Building Committee. In later life he unveiled a "Burne-Jones" stained glass window and an alabaster font —memorials erected to commemorate the faithful service of his greatest friend and companion, the late Mr. Joseph Greenwood. He was a trustee both of the church and of the school, and at his death was the sole survivor of those who helped to found the Unitarian Institutions and cause in Stalybridge. He was a man of sterling character and worth, respected by every one who knew him, his main and guiding principle being that if a thing was worth doing at all it was worth doing well. This was exemplified by his singleness of service to his employers, and by his service to the church and school which owe to him so much.

The funeral took place at Dukinfield Old Chapel on Tuesday, October 30, the service being conducted by the minister, the Rev. E. G. Evans. Among those present were the Mayor and Mayoress of Stalybridge, representatives of the business life of Stalybridge, members of the congregation of the Unitarian Church, and others

CAPTAIN A. D. PIPE.

The Rev. Thomas Pipe of the Woodlands, Combe Martin, has received news from the War Office, stating that his son, Captain Archibald David Pipe, was killed in action in France on October 27. He was commanding a company in the Poelcappelle battle. His colonel has written a letter of sympathy in which he says: "Your son did great things the day of the battle. He was my right hand man through all the day. He did not know what fear was, and could be depended on to carry out any duty whatever the difficulties he had to encounter. He had moved about the world a great deal, and was splendid for the work out here. He was hit by a shell while he was rallying his men to resist a German counter attack, I feel sure he died as he would have liked to die, in the heat of action." He was in the Colonial Service in British East Africa. When war broke out he enlisted in the London Scottish, preferring to begin as a private. He was soon offered a commission in the Argyle and Sutherland Highlanders. He was afterwards attached to the Royal Marine Light Infantry where he was promoted to Captain. He took part in the Vimy ridge, Beaucourt and other great Somme battles. His fellow officers describe him as "the best and truest of pals, the most generous and kindly of friends, the most courageous and manly of comrades."

THE LITTLE COMMONWEALTH.

The Earl of Sandwich had promised to address the Fitzwilliam Street Social Union at Huddersfield on Wednesday, October 24, but was detained in Holland by important work in the interests of British prisoners of war. Rather than permit the Union to suffer disappointment, the Countess of Sandwich generously volunteered to fulfil his Lordship's engagement herself, though it involved an all day railway journey to Huddersfield, and an all-night journey home, via London. The Rev. Robert A. Dickson (President), in introducing the speaker, described her Ladyship's action as "the bravest bit of disinterested service he had witnessed for many a day," and his statement that "we cannot possibly exaggerate the measure of our admiration of the splendid spirit of our guest" was greeted with prolonged and fervent applause.

Lady Sandwich then described an interesting social experiment which owed its inception to her husband, who started in Dorset some years ago "The Little Commonwealth: a self-governing community for juvenile delinquents." It began with the assumption that, given proper self-expression, the child nature leaned to what was good and not to what was bad, and that children were not criminals. Their first inmates were three girls who were so "brilliant" that they had eluded the London police for more than a year, although they had been "wanted" many times. They took hold of those children and tried to divert their talents and make something out of them. The children made their own laws and governed themselves. They tried all their own cases once a week, and anybody could bring up a charge for trial. The judge, a boy or girl, was elected every six months: but if the judge's verdict was not popular there was a protest against it, and it could be overruled by the majority present. There was no prison in the commonwealth, and there were no locks: the inmates could, therefore, run away at any time. This problem of running away was a very serious problem, but the chief delinquent in that respect was cured, after many voluntary penitential returns to the colony, by being ordered by the girl judge to wear "jumpers," on the ground that a colonist who could not act like a sensible, grown-up person should be clothed like a baby. That punishment was quite sufficient, and it cured the offender, who later joined the army, and was killed at the front whilst trying to bring his officer out of danger. Every opportunity was given to the children to do the work they found most congenial. Work was found for them within the colony in building operations, in the laundry, on the farm, in the shop, and in other ways. Wages were paid at so much per hour, the girls being paid at the same rate as the boys. Exchange took place through the medium of an aluminium coinage, which had the same value as gold when, upon leaving the commonwealth, the savings of a colonist had to be converted into the currency of the outside world.

The colonists lived in houses in each of which there were from fifteen to twenty occupants. The houses were the property of the Committee, but were rented by the citizens, who maintained themselves by their own labour. They had a right to dispose of their labour as they chose, or even to remain idle so long as the remainder of the colony would suffer them to do so. Taxes were imposed, and the boy or girl who was a wastrel had to be maintained out of the taxes, so that if a colonist was idle those who had to maintain him soon wanted to know the reason why. The habitual "slackers" were subjected by the children themselves to a social ostracism which speedily brought them to their senses. The social life within the commonwealth—its government, its laws, its labour market, its domesticity, and its methods of exchange—was like that of the great outside world, hence colonists who had been sent out into the world readily found their feet, while delinquents who had lived the artificial and unnatural life of industrial school or prison emerged into a new world for which they were unfitted, and in which they were utterly puzzled and bewildered. The institute had got past the experimental stage, and although it was not a reformatory it was certified as such by the Home Office. Altogether between eighty and ninety children had passed through the institution. Fourteen of the boys had gone into the army and five into the navy. The girls had gone into domestic service, munitions production, dressmaking, farming, and three had been taken on to the staff of the institution. They wanted, if possible, to widen the interest of the institution, and were, therefore, prepared to take children from other parts than London, whence the colonists had been almost solely drawn until recently. She hoped that a boy—the very worst obtainable!—would be sent to the institution from Huddersfield, but they did not want feeble-minded children, who were unable to govern themselves.

An interesting discussion followed, and a cordial vote of thanks to Lady Sandwich was passed on the motion of the Rev. Robert A. Dickson, supported by two ex-mayors of Huddersfield, Ald. Ernest Woodhead, M.A., J.P., and Mr. Owen Balmforth, J.P., Secretary of Education. Her Ladyship's response concluded a most interesting and instructive meeting.

NATIONAL CONFERENCE.

A MEETING of the Committee was held at the Memorial Hall, Manchester, on Tuesday, October 23, the President (the Rev. Dr. Hargrove) in the chair. Thirteen other members were present, and apologies for absence had been received from twenty-one others.

On the motion of the President, seconded by Mr. Monks, the following resolution was adopted, all standing: "That the Committee of the National Conference takes the earliest opportunity of expressing its deep sorrow at the death of Mr. Howard Chatfeild Clarke. He succeeded his father, who was the original Treasurer of the Conference, and after filling the office for many years, he became and remained to the end one of the Vice-Presidents. Mr. Clarke's great ability, high character, and genial kindness were a great support to the churches which compose the Conference, and his memory will long be cherished by all who were associated with him in religious work. The Committee desires to offer to Mrs. Clarke and her family its sincere sympathy with them in their bereavement."

It was reported that about 7,500 copies of the Memorial Service held at the opening of the fourth year of the war had been applied for. The Annual Report of the Ministerial Settlements Board was received, as follows:—

As in previous years during the war, the business of the Board has again been considerably below the average. Ten ministers and three congregations have applied to be placed on the lists, while nineteen ministers and eight congregations have been withdrawn—all the latter in consequence of the appointment of ministers. The excess of ministerial withdrawals is due to the operation of a new rule, the object of which is to keep the lists up to date, containing only the names of those actually desiring and seeking settlements. At the close of the year there were twenty-seven ministers and three congregations on the lists. The disproportion between these figures has engaged the attention of the Board during the year. It has opened up wider questions which have been referred by the Conference Committee to the Committee on the Supply of Ministers, to whose province they more fitly belong. In due course, no doubt. that Committee will report to the Committee of the Conference.

The Committee on the Supply of Ministers presented an interesting and important Report on the proportion between disengaged ministers and vacant pulpits, and matters connected therewith. This was approved and ordered to be circulated. The President was authorised to sign on behalf of our churches the appeal to all the churches in the country for a collection on behalf of the Red Cross Fund on an appointed Sunday about Christmas. The question of holding Triennial Meetings in 1918, about which over twenty absent members had written, was considered. The following suggestions, which had previously been circulated, all received more or less support and opposition: (a) Meetings as usual after Easter; (b) a meeting in Whit-week; (c) meetings at Swanwick; (d) meetings in London in the autumn, as in 1915; (e) no meetings at all in 1918. Ultimately, it was agreed to postpone the final decision to a meeting of the Committee to be held at Sheffield some time before Easter.

CARMARTHEN COLLEGE.

THE most interesting feature of the Report on the work of Carmarthen College, 1916-17, is the list of forty names of students and ex-students who are serving in one capacity or another in connection with the war. Of these sixteen are serving with the Y.M.C.A., either at home or abroad, eleven with the R.A.M.C., seven are combatants, and two are Army chaplains. One combatant has died in France, another is invalided, and one (R.A.M.C.) has died on his return home invalided. The list is believed not to be complete, but it is a very creditable one for a small College. Students of the College and External Arts students who undertake military service are given leave of absence from their studies during the continuance of their service, with permission to re-enter upon their courses at the point which they had reached whenever they shall be able and willing to do so.

THE HOWARD ASSOCIATION.

THE Howard Association has addressed the following memorial to the Government:

"The Committee of the Howard Association desires respectfully to call the attention of His Majesty's Government to the treatment of conscientious objectors to military service. The Howard Association, as is commonly known, is not a pacifist body, but has devoted itself for some sixty years to watching the administration of justice, and to seeking and advocating the best methods of treating and preventing crime. It appears to the Committee, and to many supporters of the Association, to be a grave contravention of justice that men should be subjected to repeated sentences of imprisonment for what is in reality the single "offence" of refusing, on conscientious grounds, obedience to military orders. This policy it regards as contrary to the spirit and letter of the Miltary Service Acts, and as involving the nation in a course of religious persecution. The Committee therefore earnestly requests the Government at once to release from prison, and to discharge from the army, all men who have proved the genuineness of their conscientious objection to any form of military service."

This memorial is supported by the Bishop of Lincoln, Lord Courtney of Penwith, the Dean of Worcester, Canon Scott Holland, Principal W. B. Selbie, Dr. F. B. Meyer, Dr. A. Alexander (Moderator of the Presbyterian Church of England), the Rev. W. Y. Fullerton (President of the Baptist Union), the Rev. J. Tolefree Parr (President of the Primitive Methodist Church), and Dr. J. Estlin Carpenter.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Bedfield.—Anniversary Services were held at the Unitarian Chapel on Sunday, October 21, when the Rev. T. Hankinson of Clarence Road, Kentish Town, London, preached in the afternoon, and in the evening the service was conducted by the Rev. W. H. Sands, the address being given by Mr. W. Waller of Norwich. The Annual Tea and Public Meeting took place on the following Tuesday, when Miss Tagart and Miss Hill were present. In his opening remarks the Chairman, the Rev. W. H. Sands, gave a short retrospect of the past year, mentioning in particular the Men's Club, which is such an important feature in the village. Miss Tagart referred to the loss of several who had been connected with the chapel, the sudden death of Mr. Henry Coleby, so universally respected in the neighbourhood, and of Harry Scales, a former Sunday scholar and active member of the Men's Club, who was killed at the front. Miss Hill conveyed a message of friendly greeting from the Committee of the Central Postal Mission, and concluded by making a strong appeal to the women to exert their influence in the cause of peace. The Rev. F. Hankinson also spoke. During the evening a very hearty vote of thanks was accorded to Miss E. M. Smith, the devoted Secretary of the chapel, whose work and influence have been such a blessing to the village.

Belfast.—The All Souls' Church Calendar expresses deepest sympathy with Mr. and Mrs. Dickson, whose elder son, 2nd Lieut. Robin Dickson, Royal Irish Regiment, was killed in action at the beginning of August. Lieut. Dickson was a cheery and brave soldier who brought a matured devotion and optimistic energy to the service of his country. His brother, Captain Charles Dickson, R.A.M.C., has recently been awarded the M.C. for great gallantry and devotion to duty. Other members have suffered bereavement by the death in action of 2nd Lieut. Thomas Henderson. In addition to the honour conferred on Capt. Dickson, Staff-Captain Terence Duffin was awarded the Military Cross for gallant and valuable services in June. This makes three M.C.'s won by young men connected with the Church. Another member, Mr. Rupert Meyer, who has just recently graduated M.B. (with honours), has received a commission in the R.A.M.C., and is now on the way to India."

Birmingham: Newhall Hill.—The Rev. Stanley Mossop was formally inducted on Wednesday evening at a well-attended meeting of the church. The Rev. J. M. Lloyd Thomas presided, and among those present were the Revs. E. J. E. Schreck (Wretham Road), William Hawkins, Wesleyan Superintendent (Edgbaston), Glyn Evans (Dudley). The Rev. R. J. Campbell expressed his deep interest in Mr. Mossop's pastorate, and said that if he had been in Birmingham he would have wished his friend "God speed" in the presence of his people. "You begin your ministry," he wrote to Mr. Mossop, "in stern and critical times which will test to the utmost our resources, moral, spiritual and intellectual if the Church of Christ is to prevail against the new forces that threaten her." The Rev. E. J. E. Schreck, welcoming Mr. Mossop on behalf of the local Nonconformist churches and ministers, expressed the view that the friendly feeling prevailing among the various churches indicated that they were drawing nearer together in the fundamentals and in loyalty to Jesus Christ. The Rev. William Hawkins offered a warm personal tribute as a ministerial friend of long standing. The Chairman thought Mr. Mossop was fortunate in commencing a ministry at a church where he was not bound by too rigid traditions. As he had been democratically elected captain, he hoped that the congregation would heartily and earnestly co-operate and give him as much freedom as possible, above all, supporting him by regular attendance. No true minister wanted security of tenure except in the hearts of the people, and personally he would not remain a single hour with a congregation after he had lost their trust and affection. He hoped also that they would honour his ministerial vocation and his reasonable authority as a minister. The Rev. Glyn Evans offered a welcome on behalf of the Midland Christian Union, and strongly advocated an aggressive policy. It was not good enough in the present times merely to carry on and hold their own. Mr. Woollaston, on behalf of the church, assured Mr. Mossop of their determination to give him their hearty co-operation. They had the land adjoining, and their programme included eventually a large building worthy of so great a church. He felt certain that they were on the eve of a great success. The Rev. Stanley Mossop, acknowledging the welcome, said he greatly prized the presence of ministers of other churches. It was one of the signs of the drawing together of the different branches of Christendom, anticipating the time when they would have one fold and one Shepherd. He thought one of the weaknesses of their denomination was that too much was expected of the minister, and they would be much stronger if they realised their personal responsibility as members of the church. He invited their co-operation in the spirit of self-sacrifice.

Brighton.—The Rev. R. H. U. Bloor, B.A., has received and accepted a cordial invitation to the pulpit of Christ Church, New Road, Brighton, and will begin his ministry on Nov. 11.

Chowbent.—The Atherton Journal of November 2, in its "On Dit" column, notes that "the Rev. J. J. Wright, after being laid aside by another serious illness, returns to duty again at Chowbent Chapel on Sunday"; and his friends will be further pleased to hear that Mr. Wright was able to preach both morning and evening, with good help at the services by Mr. Redfern.

Colne.—The Church Anniversary services were held in the Stanley Street Church on Sunday, October 28. In the morning the preacher was the Rev. Bertram Lister, and in the evening the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie. This visit of the delegates of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association was greatly appreciated.

Harrogate.—An interesting series of addresses by representatives of the various Christian Churches, delivered from a common platform, has been given at Harrogate, with the hope on the part of the organisers that it will promote toleration, mutual understanding and brotherly feeling. On November 2, the Rev. J. Tyssul Davis of York was invited to set forth the principles of Unitarianism. The chairman happened to be a man who had been connected with our congregations at Scarborough and Cape Town; the lecturer's hostess had been connected with Darlington, and among the audience were some Glasgow Unitarians who deplored the absence of Unitarian services in the Northern Spa. The lecture was sympathetically received, and some very pointed questions were asked as to the basis of agreement of churches so diverse, their historical origin, their scriptural authority, their ordinances and sacraments, their theology, their relations to the rationalist and mystical schools. A former President of the Primitive Methodist Conference, who has been the victim of a heresy hunt, put some pertinent questions. A Churchman who had walked four miles to the meeting was disappointed that the lecturer should completely ignore the argument from Scriptural texts. Incidentally, some foolish criticisms of Unitarians by the Anglican exponent were disposed of.

Hastings.—On Wednesday, November 1, there was a Social Gathering at the Free Christian Church, followed by a meeting presided over by the Rev. E. Lockett to pass the new rules for the congregation. These Rules are arranged for senior and junior members, so as to give the young people a fresh interest in the work of the Church. A Covenant was also unanimously agreed to, which was as follows: "We covenant with God and with one another to unite in the worship of God and the service of man, in the spirit of Jesus Christ, according to our best endeavours." There was a hearty and united spirit in the meeting that promised well for the future of the Church under the able ministry of the Rev. E. Lockett.

Hindley.—On Saturday, October 27, a social meeting was held in the Presbyterian Chapel to bid farewell to Dr. and Mrs. Rattray, Dr. Rattray having been appointed minister of the Great Meeting, Leicester. The chair was taken by Mr. James Law, and in addition to his words of appreciation and regret short addresses were delivered by the Rev. J. Cyril Flower (Bolton), the Rev. J. Jeremy, minister of St. Paul's Congregational Church, Hindley; Mr. James Platt, secretary of the Trustees, and Mr. D. H. Law, deputy-superintendent of the Sunday school. The next day Dr. Rattray preached farewell sermons, and both he and Mrs. Rattray addressed the Sunday school in the afternoon.

Kilburn.—An effort is being made to clear off a debt of £200 with which the movement at Quex Road is still burdened, and members of the Church, former members, and friends are invited to send contributions. The London District Unitarian Society has lent the Church the services of its Minister, the Rev. J. Arthur Pearson, who has been in charge since September, 1916, and there is, therefore, nothing to pay, at present, for a minister's stipend; but this, it is felt, is all the more reason why efforts should be made to pay current expenses and clear off the debt. A Sale of Work is being organised which is to be held in the early part of November, and a "St. Dunstan's Stall" has already been generously promised. Any promises of assistance will be gratefully received by the Secretary of the Ladies' Committee, Miss E. Yerbury, 31 Buckley Road, N.W.6, or the Rev. J. Arthur Pearson, 4 Ella Road, Crouch Hill, N.8.

Lewes.—The congregation of Westgate Chapel has suffered a severe loss in the death of Mrs. W. B. Funnell after a long and trying illness. She was a most devoted member, proud of the Chapel and its traditions and deeply interested in all the improvements which have been effected during the ministry of Mr. Connell. She played the organ for many years, and made her home the centre of much simple and delightful friendship. Many members of the congregation gathered at the funeral on Nov. 5, when the service was conducted by the Revs. J. M. Connell and W. H. Drummond.

London: Hampstead.—It is announced that a Memorial Tablet to the Rev. Stopford A. Brooke will be unveiled by Dr. L. P. Jacks on Sunday, December 9, at the close of the morning service. The tablet, which is of beautiful design, will be placed in the chancel.

UNITY CHURCH, Islington, will celebrate its 250th anniversary on Sunday, November 11. At the morning service the Rev. Alexander Gordon will give an address on the early history of the congregation, which is hardly second in interest to that of any Nonconformist place of worship in London. Its long list of ministers includes the name of Richard Baxter, who was assistant minister for a short period.

BIRTH.

BAILY.—On November 3, at 11 Gainsborough Gardens, to Captain and Mrs. Gerard G. Baily, a son.

DEATHS.

BOYD.—On October 29, at Adelaide Park, Belfast, Robert, youngest son of the late Robert Boyd, of Bloomfield, Belfast.

DAWTREY.—On November 7, at 25 Perth Road, Dundee, Mary Ellen Dawtrey, aged 76, peacefully. A dearly loved mother.

FIELDING JOHNSON.—On November 3, at Brookfield, Leicester, Agnes, for fifty-four years the wife of Thomas Fielding Johnson, and daughter of the late Alfred Paget of Leicester, in the 77th year of her age.

NOTCUTT.—On November 1, at 23 Heathgate, Hampstead Garden Suburb, Margaret Notcutt, daughter of the late Stephen Abbott Notcutt, aged 77.

TITFORD.—On November 3, at 10 Holwood Road, Bromley, Kent, Eliza Mary, the dearly loved wife of Arthur Titford, in her 73rd year.

APPEAL.

The Committee asks friends for financial help in order to meet the cost of repairs to the Church and School buildings.

These had been postponed owing to the War, but the conditions of the fabric has become so bad during the last two years, that further delay would have been disastrous.

Mr. Arnold S. Tayler, at the request of the London District Unitarian Society, inspected the buildings and submitted a report of such repairs as were structural and indispensable.

The work has been put in hand, and the estimated cost is about £250. The Congregation has guaranteed to raise one third of the amount, and, as this will tax their utmost resources, the Committee has to make this urgent appeal for outside help.

Subscriptions will be thankfully received by the Minister,

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

The address for our Belgian Hospital Fund, to which cheques and parcels of clothing should be sent, is Mrs. Bernard Allen, 14 Gainsborough Gardens, Hampstead, N.W.3.

MR. LLOYD GEORGE'S speech in Paris has become the topic of the hour. As usual the emotional atmosphere in which most men consider it has been determined by the headlines of the daily press. The speech should certainly be read as a whole and allowed to make its own impression apart from all newspaper comment. It is no use spending time over its criticism of the past when what matters is its programme for the future. If we interpret the situation rightly Mr. Lloyd George sees an opportunity of using the lessons of the Italian disaster in order to achieve closer unity of direction among the Allies, and with the instinct of a popular advocate he has not minced his words in order to get it done. It must also be remembered, if we are to see the incident in its true perspective, that the speech was made at Paris and was addressed to France and Italy quite as much as to ourselves.

THE danger of this kind of appeal is that it tempts many people to dwell in the land of might-have-beens, and so to waste precious strength in barren discussion and despondency. We can never reproduce a past situation. Even the calmest historical judgment must always be fashioned in the light of knowledge which the actors at the time did not possess, and consequently it is seldom quite free from some tinge of unfairness. This war has been for all of us a terrible lesson in the value of close co-operation. Whether with our historical traditions and our proud independence we are to blame for not learning it more quickly is a matter of opinion; but the only thing of real importance in the present situation is that we should act upon it now.

THE past week has been a time of severe testing, and we ought to come out of it stronger and more determined if we are in the least worthy of our cause. There has been a fresh appeal for men; Sir Arthur Yapp has issued his new scale of voluntary food rations, with a plain warning that if it fails the Government must resort to compulsion; and day after day has been punctuated by the serious news from Italy. "I want you to realise," the Director of National Service said on Wednesday, "that this war is really going to call for the utmost effort, the utmost output of energy of which the people is capable. There is going to be no margin at all." Let us greet these words with new courage and self-discipline. Nothing else can be worthy of our blood and our religion.

WE are glad to see that Sir Auckland Geddes has his eye upon the luxury trades, and threatens to make short work of the manufacture of expensive fur coats when all our labour is required to supply the elementary needs of the people. In his speech at Plymouth on Monday he singled out for special censure the baits which are still dangled before the eyes of foolish people to tempt them to extravagance. "I am sorry to say," he said, "we have great organisations which exist to encourage waste. That is not the ostensible reason for their existence, but it is their effect. Look at the advertisement pages of almost any newspaper, and see the waste that is urged upon the women of the country. I am told that the papers cannot help it; they must contain advertisements or go under. I know their position is difficult. Newspapers are an essential part of our war organisation, but that does not modify the fact that their advertisement pages contain matter for which the advertisers are responsible, but which in its intention and result encourages waste of money, waste of human energy—just waste."

* * *

PRESIDENT WILSON made another of his great war speeches on Monday, this time to the American Federation of Labour in session at Buffalo. It is the speech of a free man to free men, who desires to work with them in a spirit of co-operation, with intelligent sympathy for their needs and desires, but on the assumption that they are all united in loyalty to the one supreme aim. "It matters not," he told them, "what a man claims as his reason for justifying the retarding or holding back of our war activities, we must stand on results. Any man, or any body of men, who gets in the way of means of winning this war for democracy and humanity is on the side of Germany, regardless of what his method of reasoning may be." And then he asked them this pertinent question, "If we continue to argue among ourselves as to the right and wrong of this principle and that principle, and if we continue to try to satisfy our personal ambitions and our pocket-books at the expense of our national efficiency, what will we say when our boys return from France?" The American mind has a happy gift of stripping a moral situation to the bone and stating it in its naked simplicity.

ON another matter of grave importance President Wilson spoke with equal force. We may well take these words of warning to ourselves, for the long strain has produced a tendency in some quarters to support the demands of patriotism by the coarse methods of mob law.

> I have been much distressed [he said] by some of the things that have happened recently. The mob spirit is displaying itself here and there in this country. I have no sympathy with what some people are saying, but I have no sympathy with the men who take the punishment of those into their own hands, and I want to say to every man who does so that I do not recognise him as worthy of the free institutions of the United States. There are some organisations in this country whose object is anarchy, but I would not meet their effort by making myself a partner in destroying law. I despise and hate their purpose as much as any man, but I respect the ancient processes of justice, and I would be too proud not to see that they have justice done them, however wrong they are, and so I want to utter my earnest protest against any manifestation of the spirit of lawlessness anywhere or in any cause. We claim to be the greatest democratic people in the world, and democracy means first of all that we can govern ourselves. The man who takes the law into his own hands is not the man to co-operate in any form of, or the development of, law and institutions.

WE find it difficult to appraise the value of the announcement of the Government that it views the Jewish Zionist aspirations with favour, and is prepared to facilitate the establishment in Palestine of a national home for the Jewish people, "it being clearly understood that nothing shall be done which may prejudice the civil and religious rights of non-Jewish communities in Palestine, or the rights and political status enjoyed by Jews in any other country." Undoubtedly a large volume of Jewish sentiment is gratified, but it is difficult to suppose that there is any genuine prospect of going further than the foundation of a certain number of colonies for the poor and the oppressed, which could never merge into an autonomous national state. Under any other conditions we should be faced with the possibility that Palestine might become a Jewish state, with a religious test for full citizenship, which would exercise a subtle political influence upon Jewish life in other countries. Such a result would be inconsistent with the whole trend of civilised life in the modern world.

MANY Liberal Jews are inclined to look upon the movement as reactionary. For them the enduring bond is religious and not national, and their aim is to identify themselves politically in the closest possible way with the country to which they belong. It is the opinion of Mr. C. G. Montefiore that Judaism must lay a diminishing stress upon nationality if it is to become a living and spiritual force and take its place among the universal religions of the world. "It is not without significance," he writes, "that the chief Continental leaders of the nationalist movement should be men who have little or no interest in the Jewish religion." From this point of view we should be justified in regarding Zionism chiefly as a political answer to the anti-Semite movements on the Continent, deeply tinged in many quarters with religious emotion, but hardly deriving from religion its original impulse. On this subject we may recommend Mr. Montefiore's recent pamphlet 'Nation or Religious Community?' to the attention of our readers.

ENGLAND AND FRANCE.

WHATEVER opinion may be held about the wisdom or the timeliness of Mr. Lloyd George's speech in Paris, it was at bottom a plea for closer international relationships. Germany has solved her problem by the method of ruthless domination. Can the nations who are fighting for freedom and democracy achieve an even more effective union along the lines of spiritual sympathy and mutual understanding? For without these moral forces in the background no central council of the Allies can possess the sanction of the popular will which it needs for effective action. We state the problem in this way, not in order to pursue it into its political implications, but because it suggests certain definite lines of personal duty. What can we ourselves do to make a closer liaison in policy and ideals possible? "International" is a big word and is often on our lips, but like many other big words it is allowed to have a hypnotic influence upon the mind. It suggests a vague ideal of harmony and goodwill among the estranged peoples of the earth, and we blame our public men for not realising it while we ourselves linger in the atmosphere of discontented discussion. But the truth of the matter is that if there is any good in it at all, it is something to which we must make our own contribution in thought and effort and sympathy. We cannot escape from the limits of our insular intelligence until we grapple with the problem of really understanding the mind of another nation as a matter of personal duty.

We venture to suggest, as a test of our sincerity in this matter, that we should ask ourselves how far we have advanced since the beginning of the war not only in our praise of the valour of French arms but also in our appreciation of the abiding qualities of French civilization. It is among the Allies first of all that this liaison of intelligence has to be made into an effective instrument of our common life. The United States, Italy and Russia all present fascinating problems of their own; but France, in the splendour of her ancient civilisation, the dignity of her intellectual life, and her rare power of changing turbid sentiment into clear thought and rational enthusiasm, has special claims upon our friendship and the intimate confidence which only friendship on equal terms can create. There are many cheering signs that there is a growing sense both of the greatness of the need and of the unique character of the present opportunity. On the French side the interest in English literature and the problems of English social life goes steadily forward. Among ourselves the spirit of the French army has made a deep impression and there is a genuine desire to understand the moral idealism which sustains it. We are becoming aware that there are war books over there, which in the depth of their human appeal and the perfection of their art put the work of all but a very few of our own poets and prose writers in the shade. The Westminster Gazette gives its readers a fortnightly chronicle on 'Life and Letters in France'; The Athenæum has just issued an admirable supplement on 'French Literature during the War'; while the recent foundation of the Anglo-French Society may be accepted as a pledge that the claims of French life and thought, in all their varied activity, will be impressed with fresh energy upon the public mind. Clearly on the intellectual plane we have no excuse for either ignorance or apathy.

But all this is not enough. It touches only indirectly many of the urgent questions of the common life. The domestic interior, the problems of labour in agriculture and factory, the amusements of the people, their spiritual condition, these are all matters about which we need information. The scholar has his books of reference and he knows how to put his hand upon elaborate treatises on these subjects; but it is a popular literature that is required, chapters in school books which will help boys and girls to understand the life of a French town, pamphlets about industrial conditions and movements of reform in France which our working-men will care to read, some effort to interpret the spiritual life of the people, written without ecclesiastical bias, in order to convey an accurate impression of the character and ideals of Catholics and Socialists, and of the large group of men who, without party ties, cherish the spirit of religion in their hearts. Popular propaganda of this kind is still in its infancy But the day has passed when we can be content to leave the Anglo-French Entente in the hands of politicians or the members of a literary coterie. It must be broad-based upon popular sympathy; and there can be no sympathy without knowledge.

In the address which Mr. Gosse gave the other day at a meeting of the Anglo-French Society he was careful to point out that enduring friendship must rest upon a genuine respect for national differences. "Unless literature is personal," he said, "it has no stimulating value, and without strong national colour personality in literature is unattainable. We must therefore abandon the dream of so many amiable persons at the close of last century, who saw a sort of millennium spreading before them in which there should be one literature and almost one language. Not only must we reject the idea of a 'European' literature, but we must see to it that English and French writers, in taking each from the other whatever of energy or illumination they can collect, shall remain true to their respective national character....Nothing would be so unfortunate as the adoption even between France and England alone of a sort of spiritual Esperanto." These words are equally true of all the intimate relations between the two countries which may be possible in the future. We look forward to a friendship based upon personal knowledge and mutual respect, in which we shall be able to give much to one another because we have the courage and the common sense to remain entirely ourselves. Cosmopolitanism is an attempt to reach a goal as undesirable as it is impossible. The peace and happiness of the world depends upon the growth of a brotherhood of nations. Political arrangements may establish its framework, but its animating spirit must be the creation of the popular will. For this purpose moral idealism needs the guidance of an instructed judgment. Of all the methods which we can use in the pursuit of our goal, none lies closer to our hands or is richer in promise for the future than the liaison of intelligence between England and France of which we have written in this article. Whatever France may gain from it, and we hope that she will gain much, we shall be her willing debtors if she can disclose to us the secret springs of her greatness, and make us partners in the steady power of her best minds to see through the sordid details of war to the heart of immortal ideals.

FIELD AMBULANCE NOTES.

By the Rev. Mortimer Rowe, R.A.M.C.

VIII.—East and West.

I have just been watching the passing of September—a month of marvellous weather, making a world of difference to our life at the front, and ending in a Sunday evening of wonderful beauty.

We knew of no immediate call for our services, so I spent a leisure hour in a quiet stroll beyond the exit from the trenches. There was nothing exceptional in the setting of the sun, and the chill evening mists were gathering very early in the hollows below the wooded village and beyond, where stretched an almost level and monotonous horizon. But the wonder began when the sun had dipped out of sight; rapidly, moment by moment, the after-glow extended and grew richer in colour, tinting more and more deeply a long winding streamer of cloud flung carelessly across the western sky. The floating mists spread steadily wider, until the broad horizon, with its few distant lonely trees, became a mere purple-black profile between the white mantle below and the golden splendour above; and set like a jewel in the gold appeared the solitary evening star. How the glory grew with each moment that passed, until the whole scene was just a miracle of colour and contrast, and one's mind "a thanksgiving to the Power that made it," for the eye to perceive such grandeur and the memory to recall it.

But when the marvel was at its height the thought occurred to me to see what lay behind me in the east; and, turning, I caught my breath in amazement and awe at the equal and opposite beauty displayed—so opposite and so equal that the surprise of it was a measureless joy. There, in a cloudless night sky of shadowy blue, hung the full-orbed moon, so white and wonderful, so calm and pure and still, encircled by a glowing halo as broad as herself; and beneath her, for a setting, a few scattered ruins and a belt of lofty trees. How could one heaven embrace both such an east and such a west? Yet there, in very truth, was the rich and roseate west again with a turn of the head. So I waited and watched, until the west died down to darkness, and in the east the stars appeared and claimed the whole sky for the reign of night.

Sadness had been with me from dawn, because of a brave lad who died at our dressing-post in spite of all that medical skill could do for him. But now at eventide came peaceful thoughts. I could not say:—

When the glad morn upon the hills was spread,
Thy smile was there;
but in my heart I sang:—
Now, when the darkness gathers overhead,
We feel Thy care.

His body lay in the little military cemetery, but his spirit had passed beyond the splendour of the setting sun.

J. A. C., Oct. 16.

For him, no soldier's glorious part to play
To gather laurels on a bloody field,
Or meet grim death, with comrades side by side,
Nor fear to die for England's holy cause.
For him, another battle, day by day,
With brain of insight and with words of truth
To fight the enemies of England's power,
Lifting his workers to their utmost height—
To grudge no sacrifice of time or strength
To meet great needs, with greater effort still Advising, helping, warning—so, upheld
By one great watchword—who shall say indeed
Which battle is more glorious! One above
Holds careful scales, and marks the work well done,
And hark! the sentry's challenge "Who goes there?"
"A friend—the password, Duty!" Loud and clear
Rings out the answering voice—"Pass on. All's well!"

WORKERS' AID SOCIETY.

To the Editor of The Inquirer.

Sir,—This year the difficulty of providing gifts of warm underclothing for the poor women and children connected with our Domestic Missions will be very great, and I would especially urge their claims on your readers who have so faithfully for many years supported the Workers' Aid Society. It exists to provide suitable garments for the poor of our Missions, and for the invalid children at Winifred House. Membership consists of a contribution of two or more garments yearly, with an optional subscription of 6*d.* to defray expenses. May I also beg the secretaries of working parties to send me whatever they can spare from their own special needs. Parcels should reach me by the first week in December.—Yours, &c.,

Mabel Barmby.

MEMORIAL NOTICE.

MISS M. E. BROCK.

The Unitarian Church at Swansea has sustained a heavy loss by the death on Saturday, October 27, of one of its most faithful members and trustees, Miss Mary Emma Brock of Holland House, in her 75th year. She was the eldest daughter of the Rev. George Browne Brock, from 1837 to 1854 minister of the Unitarian Church, Swansea. Having received a good education at Bedford College and elsewhere Miss Brock, when she settled down in her native place, became the pioneer of higher education, especially among women. She was one of the first lady members of the old School Board, and when that body was disbanded her services were requisitioned as a co-opted member on the new Education Authority, on which she faithfully served until failing health compelled her to resign. She was also greatly interested in the Swansea Training College for Women, and many of the Unitarian students will have kind recollections of the hospitality of her home. As a member of the Swansea Board of Guardians and of the Committee of the Swansea General Hospital, by public donations and private charity she helped wherever she could to alleviate the lot of the suffering and the poor. Her kindliness was a key that opened to her the door to all hearts and kept her own doors open to all needy cases and good causes of every sect and party. The town, the Church, and the denomination in Wales are all the poorer by her death. A memorial service, conducted by the minister, the Rev. Simon Jones, was held in the church on Wednesday, November 1. The interment took place in the Dangraig Cemetery, Swansea.

WEEKLY NOTES.

I have received a special letter of thanks this week from both the Head of the Belgian Army Medical Corps, and from the Belgian Minister of War, who both recognise most warmly the work we have been able to do for their wounded soldiers. I have also had a good many letters from hospitals, acknowledging arrival of goods, and expressing warmest thanks for our gifts. They all seem to expect a great many wounded in the near future and their hopes are high of getting back another piece of their country soon.

A SCHOOL FOR MINISTERS AT OXFORD.

The first School for Ministers at Manchester College, Oxford, is at an end, and the ministers have returned to their various fields of work. Not the same men. We are different. We have brought back with us treasure. How rich this treasure is, how helpful it will be to us and, we hope, to others, we do not yet know; but we know that it is great. As we go through our notes in the coming weeks, and especially if it is possible by and by to study some of the lectures in print, we shall realise more fully what we have received.

The names of the lecturers giving the public lectures, together with their subjects, appeared in a communication in The Inquirer of October 27. To give even the shortest report of the nine lectures delivered since that communication was sent is, it will be obvious, not possible. Dr. Schiller's lectures were a keen examination of present conditions, brilliant with mordant aphorisms, and, if more critical than constructive, not without helpful suggestion, explicit and implicit, for the future. Dean Inge had the largest audiences. The keynote to his lectures was given in the opening remark that he was inclined to agree with one of the few German great thinkers at the present time, that the survival of Christianity depends upon the revival of the old alliance with Platonism; while their heart was found in the repeated quotation from Plotinus: "Nothing that truly is can ever perish." Especially should we like to have in print Principal Jacks' three lectures on 'The State, Visible and Invisible.' It was not possible to take in all their implications at a hearing, so full were they of suggestion. Their main thesis was that the truth is in the world but has not been accepted by the world, has been almost without effect upon the world in general because it has lacked the necessary "power," and this power is found in goodwill. The great empires of the world have to choose between goodwill or downfall. So in the relations of class with class. When there is goodwill laws will cease to be compulsory by penalty, and become simply declaratory, no man will impose his will upon another, and government will become the absence of government.

The lectures in College by the Principal, the Rev. H. Gow, and the Rev. D. C. Simpson, caused us to wish we could, again or for the first time, take the full theological course, and to think very fortunate the students who hear courses of lectures each of distinctive type and all admirable. We thought they would be of even greater value to us in middle age, though indispensable in youth. We were also very fortunate in coming in for the first part of Dr. Carpenter's late lectures on 'The Doctrine of Life after Death in Greek and Roman Religion.' The four lectures we heard brought keen disappointment that we could not complete the course.

But the treasure we received was not only from lectures. There were the morning prayers in chapel, the week-night and the Sunday services. These can only be mentioned. Those who have shared in them know what their influence is. There were the evening discussions and conferences on 'Industrial Reconstruction,' 'Spiritualism,' 'Social Service,' 'Supply of Ministers,' 'Prayer,' 'Preaching after the War,' the last introduced by a stimulating paper by the Rev. Joseph Wood. There were the informal talks in the Common Room during the day, and in our own rooms when the day's work was done, often going on into the small hours. And there was just the daily life together of those who before the month did not know one another, or had barely met, but who in the common experiences of our month, experiences intellectual and spiritual, and striking deep into the nature of each one of us, have been brought close together.

The School for Ministers was an experiment. It is difficult to think of a point of view from which it has not been a success. Already ministers are heard of who wish they had realised what the opportunity was. It is to be hoped earnestly that the authorities may see their way to repeating the experiment. If it is repeated, the response is likely to be such that the month will cease to be an experiment and will become an institution. Such a month makes the College known to ministers who had not known it before. Through them the congregations hear of it, and additional students become possible. (There is evidence in that direction already.) That is an advantage to the College and to the congregations. A further and important advantage to the congregations is the reflection of the advantage to the ministers. To the latter, and perhaps especially those who are very much cut off from intellectual life and religious fellowship, it is incalculable. A minister in a more or less isolated field of work is likely in course of time to become what one of our number on speech night graphically described as "depleted." The College gives replenishment. The month, then, gives the minister new material. That is important, but it is the least of the advantage. It gives refreshment and invigoration of mind. That, especially in these times, we all need. And it means deeper insight into things of the spirit, spiritual inspiration. And that we all need at all times.

Probably, if the school can be repeated in coming years, and if the time were equally convenient to the College, for ministers a change from October to some period between Easter and July would be a better arrangement. The week-night winter work, often begun in October, would not then keep many busy men away.

UNITY CHURCH, ISLINGTON.

250th ANNIVERSARY OF THE CONGREGATION.

The 250th anniversary of the founding of the congregation of Unity Church, Islington, was celebrated on Sunday, November 11, when an address was given in the morning by the Rev. Alexander Gordon on 'The Early History of the Congregation.' In an interesting survey, which covered the first ninety-one years of the life of the church, Mr. Gordon traced its growth from the earliest meetings in Rutland House, Charter House Yard, after the Ejection in 1662, to the death of Thomas Newman, pastor of the Carter Lane Chapel in succession to Dr. Wright, in 1758. Rutland House had formerly belonged to the Earls of Rutland. In 1558 Queen Elizabeth held her court there for six days, and the opera was performed for the first time in England in one of its chambers. It was destined to become the first meeting place of the congregation that met to profit by the teaching of Matthew Sylvester, a Nottinghamshire man, who had been educated at Cambridge, and placed in a rectory in Lincolnshire at the age of 21, and who made the great sacrifice which conscience demanded of so many four years later when the Act of Uniformity drove more than two thousand men out of their livings. A distant relative, who had been made his Bishop at the Restoration, offered many inducements to Sylvester to remain where he was, but he elected to sink to the position of private tutor in the house of Sir John Bright, a moderate Parliamentarian, who had worked for the Restoration. We hear of him at several places after this, until he came to London after the Great Fire and took part in helping the sufferers in the desolated city. In the year of Charles II.'s Indulgence, having previously married, he settled with his young wife in Coleman Street, and took out a licence as a Presbyterian preacher "in any allowed place." No licence was taken out for Rutland Place, however, and it is not certain whether he continued his ministry there, though it is probable that he did, taking rank as one of the Duke's chaplains for whom no licence would be required. He carried out his pastoral charge with a care and assiduity which Baxter praises highly, and, though his delivery was poor, the matter of his sermons was good, while he had a gift of prayer which deeply impressed Oliver Heywood. In 1687 he was living at Rutland House, which was now licensed under the dispensations allowed by James II. In the previous November Richard Baxter had been released from prison, and, old as he was, and with his health shattered, he offered himself as unpaid assistant to Sylvester. For over four years he preached, when he was able to do so, on Sunday and Thursday morning, and the congregation decreased considerably in numbers after his death. Mr. Gordon paid a high tribute to the memory of Baxter, whose works, he said, he would choose in preference to all others if he were condemned henceforth to restrict his reading to a single author.

Sylvester was now left alone, but it was at this time that a resolution was carried into effect to provide him with a Meeting House of his own. It was situated in a court off Knight Rider Street. In 1692 young Edmund Calamy became his assistant. Sylvester's stipend never exceeded £70 a year, and did not always reach that figure, yet he contrived out of it to offer Calamy £40, and the latter preferred this, and the opportunity of remaining in London, to the chance of going to Bristol at £100 a year. He only remained at the newly erected Meeting House four years, however, for his promotion was rapid. We are accustomed to look upon him as the biographer of the Ejected, but in his own day that brought him more odium than praise. He was the most influential Nonconformist that ever lived in London, and was so regarded, not only in his own ecclesiastical circle but in high quarters. He became familiar with the Court, he even had access to the Throne Room, and was a man of infinite tact, genial humour, and imperturbable temper.

Matthew Sylvester died in 1708. He has been described in his later days by Calamy as "meek, silent, inactive and in straitened circumstances." That he was poor was owing to his great generosity, and, as has been inferred, to the inroads made upon his means by the improvidence of two of his three sons. It is interesting to note that when the fund for the benefit of poor Dissenting ministers, now known as the Presbyterian Fund, was started, the largest contributors were London ministers, no layman, with one exception, subscribing more than £10; and Sylvester subscribed £30 a year, paying it while he was also paying Calamy, so that every penny of his stipend was absorbed by the good cause which he loved.

The next minister was Dr. Wright, who, after an early life spent in grinding poverty, had been educated at the Academy of Mr. Timothy Jollie at Attercliffe, and had become celebrated as a preacher. He became the minister of the chapel in Meeting House Court, and, two years later, married Sylvester's widow. Wright, theoretically at any rate, would have been glad if Presbyterianism had been instituted in this country, and his taking charge of Sylvester's congregation marks a change in the history of the ministry, for Baxter, Sylvester, and Calamy had all been advocates of comprehension. The thirty-seven Articles of Faith which he drew up at the time of his ordination reflect a robust Trinitarianism, but he was a man who held his opinions with a due regard for those of others, and he admitted the possibility of a change in his views being effected after further study and inquiry. His views did not, however, alter greatly, but for such a man, strong in orthodox convictions, to say: "I am prepared for the toleration of heresy, though I do not hold any of it myself," is the sign of a brave and fine spirit. In 1734 a larger chapel was built for Dr. Wright in Little Carter Lane, on the site of an inn known as the Saracen's Head, and the foundation stone of this place was removed to Unity Church when the congregation settled in Islington. Mr. Gordon concluded his survey by giving a brief account of the life and work of Jeremiah Burroughs, and Thomas Newman, who successively assisted Dr. Wright in his ministry, the latter succeeding him on his death in 1746.

A SOCIAL SERVICE UNION AT NEWARK.

The Rev. J. Walter Cock recently got into touch with all the ministers of religion in Newark with a view to such a union being formed, and found them all in sympathy with the project. He was aided in his mission by being able to furnish each of them with the leaflet, 'An Experiment in Evesham,' issued by our Social Service Union, and the pamphlet, 'A Scheme of Christian Social Reconstruction,' issued by the Inter-Denominational Conference of Social Service Unions. The former gives in detail the steps taken in the formation of the Evesham Inter-Denominational Social Service Union, and the latter embodies the fundamental principles of Christian social reconstruction which have received the assent of representatives of all the great Christian denominations of our country. Finally, Mr. Cock invited all the ministers of the town to attend a meeting at the Town Hall, November 6, in order to take steps to form a Union, and he also asked the Rev. H. H. Johnson to attend and give some account of the founding and work of the Evesham Union. Thirteen out of a possible fifteen ministers attended that meeting, two being unavoidably absent but in full sympathy with the proposal. The Vicar of Newark, Canon Hindley, was in the chair, and there were also present four other clergy of the Church of England, the Roman Catholic priest, three Wesleyan ministers, the Congregationalist and Baptist ministers, the Rev. J. Walter Cock, and the Captain of the Salvation Army. The spirit and unanimity of the meeting were remarkable. The Union was constituted, its basis established, an "object" agreed upon, officers and executive appointed, all on the lines of the Evesham Union. The Vicar was appointed Chairman and the Rev. J. Walter Cock was appointed Hon. Secretary. The Union is to be on a Christian and Inter-Denominational basis. Its "object" is the same as that of the Evesham Union: "To study the social conditions of the town, and to endeavour to promote the general welfare through the inspiration of the Christian spirit and the application of Christian principles." The Executive consists of the minister of each congregation and one, or two, members of his congregation nominated by him.

The Rev. H. H. Johnson, of Evesham, Secretary of the Union for Social Service, will be glad to give help and advice in the founding of similar inter-denominational Unions elsewhere.

BRITISH AND FOREIGN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

The colonial and foreign work transacted at the October meeting of the Executive Committee included a careful report and statement of accounts submitted by the Rev. Nilmani Chakrabarti, relating to the Khasi Hills Unitarian Mission Stations. Mr. E. Harris, son of the late Mr. Edwards, had, with the aid of the Association, completed his studies at Calcutta, and he would probably begin his missionary work in the Khasi Hills at an early date. It was intended to continue, and to increase if possible, the superintendence and control of the work through the Committee and ministers of the Brahmo Samaj.

At Vancouver the services are still conducted by laymen with an occasional visit from a minister. Hopes are entertained that after the war a minister may be appointed. Victoria, B.C., has been fortunate in securing the services of the Rev. E. J. Bowden, who recently completed his studies at the Unitarian College at Berkeley, U.S.A. A grant of £50 towards his salary is made by the Association; and a generous grant is also made by the American Unitarian Association. The important church at Montreal is without a minister, the Rev. F. R. Griffin having accepted a call to Philadelphia. There is a splendid opening at Montreal for an able, active minister.

The liberal religious movement in Italy had suffered a very serious loss in the death of the Rev. Gaetano Conte. Supported by the American Unitarian Association and the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, Mr. Conte had carried on propaganda work in Italy, more particularly among the educated classes, and had succeeded in creating a widespread interest in Unitarian and Free Christian thought and literature among his fellow-countrymen. It was agreed to send Mrs. Conte a letter of sympathy in her sorrow, and of appreciation of the services rendered by her husband to the liberal religious movement in Italy. It was further agreed to continue the grant in aid of the work until March 31, 1918; and meanwhile to obtain a detailed report from the responsible committee at Florence, and to communicate with the American Unitarian Association in respect to the work in the future.

Interesting letters were received from Lagos, Nigeria, where several earnest religious inquirers are meeting together; books and pamphlets were forwarded to them. Grants of Unitarian literature were also made to correspondents in Canada, India, and Trinidad. Mr. Sasipada Banerji, the aged apostle of a free and enlightened religious faith and of benevolent and practical philanthropy in India, sent a most grateful letter of thanks for a grant of a thousand rupees in aid of the fine work he is doing.

The report of the work at Lawrence House was most encouraging. Letters from our sailors and soldiers are received daily at Essex Hall, and very delighted they are with the literature which they receive. It was agreed to issue a second Lawrence House Bulletin early in December, under the editorship of the Rev. W. G. Tarrant. Upwards of six thousand copies will be sent to men on active service whose names and addresses have reached Essex Hall. There are not a few additional names and addresses which the Committee would be very glad to have, if only ministers and secretaries of congregations would write them out and forward them to Essex Hall. The Hostel, No. 1 Essex Street, is proving a great boon to many of our young men. There being only six bedrooms, some nights there is no bedroom available, but men are told where to find one in case of need. From June to September 444 beds were made and occupied. The building and equipment cost more money than had been anticipated, but it is not intended to make any further appeal for money this year.

A SCHOOL FOR MINISTERS will be held at the Unitarian Home Missionary College, Manchester, from January 7 to March 11, 1918. The long list of lecturers includes Dr. Jacks, Dr. Mellone, Principal Graham, Prof. A. S. Peake, Prof. S. A. Alexander, Dr. Mellor, the Revs. H. McLachlan, C. J. Street, and J. C. Flower, Dr. Jessel, Mr. G. G. Armstrong, Mr. G. B. Wilson, and Councillor Margaret Ashton. The School will be held on Mondays, from 10.30 to 12.30 A.M. and from 2 P.M. to 4 P.M. It will be open free to all ministers whose names are in The Essex Hall Year-Book, and to others upon special application to the Warden, Summerville, Victoria Park, Manchester. Lunch will be provided daily at 12.45 P.M., and travelling expenses for single journeys will be paid for all ministers who attend the lectures. Application for membership should be made to the Warden as early as possible, and, at latest, before December 24, 1917.

MAJOR CROTHERS, the eldest son of Dr. Crothers of Cambridge, Mass., has been spending a few days in London on his way to America after a strenuous time in France where he has been attached to our army as a member of the American Medical Unit. He is deeply impressed with the splendid qualities of the British soldier. His father follows the course of the war with intense eagerness, and nothing would please him better than to take some active part in it himself either as a chaplain or in connection with the work of the Y.M.C.A.

THE Rev. Mortimer Rowe, of Preston, who has been serving in the R.A.M.C. in France, has been gassed, and is now a patient in the Military Hospital at Tooting. We are glad to hear that he is not seriously ill.

THE Rev. Walter Short, of Bootle, who holds a commission in the King's Own Yorkshire Light Infantry, has shown the capacity for leading men which his friends expected from him, and has been promoted to the rank of Captain and Adjutant as from August 17.

THE Rev. Harman Taylor, till recently assistant minister at Ullet Road Church, Liverpool, where he did most valuable work in the Sunday school, has completed his medical training. He has received a commission in the R.A.M.C. We understand that he will go out to Mesopotamia shortly.

AN Army officer on leave chanced to attend one of our Chapels where Lieut.-Col. C. S. Bullock was preaching, and he wrote as follows:—

I feel I should like to write and tell you how much I benefited by your service at the Unitarian Church last Sunday morning. Though not officially a Unitarian I am so by conviction, but having spent most of my time in the East I have had no opportunity of associating myself with such a Church. This, however, was not really the reason which led me to come on Sunday. My reason was one which, had you known it, your sermon could not have been more helpful. I had my son home from school for the week-end to give us the chance of enjoying one another's society before I started for service in the East again, and I was anxious to counteract in as gentle a way as possible a tendency which I fancied I had discovered in him towards over-rating the value of the externals of orthodox religion; and I hoped to let him see that God could be worshipped as truly in plainer circumstances than those which obtain in the Church services to which at school he is accustomed. Your sermon not only helped us both, but gave us pleasure, and led us to a discussion such as is necessary between a father and son some time in life and which I had been cowardly enough to put off from time to time. Next to the fact that I leave a wife who is as wonderful a mother as she is wife, and a son whose best happiness is to care for his mother, my chief pleasure and compensation in again going on active service is the happy revelation of my son which your sermon led to. I am sure it must be some satisfaction and some encouragement to know that you have been so helpful.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Cape Town. In connection with the Jubilee Anniversary of the Unitarian Church at Cape Town the following letter was sent to the Rev. R. Balmforth, signed by the President and Secretary of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association: "We learn with much interest that your church will celebrate its Jubilee in August next, and the Committee of our British and Foreign Unitarian Association desire us to convey through you their sincere congratulations on the completion of fifty years of its activity and their hopes for its future prosperity and usefulness in the midst of your growing community. The lapse of half a century must under any circumstances bring with it many changes. Your own ministry has covered two out of its five decades. The founders of your Church have probably all passed away, committing their enterprise to sons and daughters after them, and many new names appear upon your roll of membership. Your city has become the centre for fresh enterprises of vast national importance; new ideals of government have brought with them unexpected opportunities of development and have generated fresh obligations. And the great scientific and theological movements of our time cannot have been without their influence, as your own contributions to the independent study of the Bible have sufficed to prove. Such conditions make the testimony of a Free Church, unhampered by traditional creeds, and pledged only to the search for truth and righteousness, all the more important; and we rejoice that in the midst of so many conflicting interests your Church has borne its steadfast witness to a Christianity untrammelled by ecclesiastical system, in simple fidelity to the two great commandments of love to God and love to man. To apply these under the complex conditions of modern life can never be an easy task. You have your own problems of special difficulty. Those who undertake to bring the trusts and demands of religion to bear upon them, must often face unpopularity; they must not be afraid of prejudice and suspicion; they must be willing sometimes to stand alone. May you and your people go forward on the next stage of your united labour with good heart and hope; and may the blessing of the Heavenly Father rest on your word and work."

Dukinfield.—On the occasion of the formal resignation by Mr. T. H. Gordon of the position of Town Clerk which he had held since the town was incorporated, he was the recipient of many compliments on his long period of service at a meeting of the Town Council, when a presentation was made to him by the Mayor (Mrs. Kenyon). Reference was made to the great interest which Mr. Gordon had taken in education, having himself, as a voluntary worker, taught classes at the old Village Library, before it became known as the Technical School. In the course of his reply Mr. Gordon said that of the 68 years of his life he had spent in their midst 39. He came to Dukinfield for the second time 35½ years ago—a young man, known personally but to a very few, but possessing a surname identified with his father's ministrations to the congregation at the Old Chapel on the hill. When the town was incorporated it had no tradition behind it, but he trusted that the foundation which they had laid might be as firm and durable as a block of Aberdeenshire granite. Mr. Gordon has been obliged to relinquish office owing to ill-health and increasing years, and we understand that he will make his home, in future, at Sidmouth.

Evesham.—The Rev. H. H. Johnson, minister of Oat Street Chapel, is giving a series of four addresses on 'A Liberal and Rational Christianity' on the Sunday evenings in this month. The first two were on 'God' and 'Christ'; other subjects will be 'The Bible' and 'Immortality.'

Killinchy.—On November 3 a social meeting of the congregation of the Remonstrant congregation was held, and a cheque for a substantial amount was presented to the Rev. D. J. and Mrs. Williams in recognition of their work during the past nine years. Mr. F. J. Orr of Ballystockart in making the presentation spoke in high terms of the success which had attended Mr. Williams's ministry and the energy which he had thrown into his pastoral visiting and other departments of his work. Mr. Williams in the course of his reply spoke very gratefully of the unfailing kindness of his people, and referred to the improvements which had been effected in the Church, Lecture Hall and Manse during his ministry. The Rev. Kenneth Dunbar also spoke on behalf of the ministers of the neighbourhood.

Llandyssul.—At Graig Chapel, on Sunday, November 11, at the Communion Service, the minister, the Rev. T. Arthur Thomas, J.P., welcomed fifteen new members.

London: Hackney.—The second Annual Baby Show was held in Aspland Hall on Monday, November 12. Forty-three babies were entered, some of whom had won prizes the previous year. Dr. Stansby judged the babies, and afterwards spoke of the great care for their welfare which must have been given to them by their mothers through the year. The prizes were distributed by Mrs. W. H. Drummond, who expressed her pleasure at being able to be present, and at seeing such a large number of beautiful, healthy little babies.

London : Mansford Street.—The fiftieth Annual Meeting of past and present scholars, teachers, and workers of Spicer Street and Mansford Street, Bethnal Green, was held on Saturday last, November 10. The Rev. Gordon Cooper welcomed the visitors on behalf of the teachers. Mr. Alfred J. Clarke responded, and bore strong personal testimony to the valuable work done by the old Spicer Street Mission and its revered guide for many years, the Rev. C. L. Cockran, and emphasised his faith that the Mansford Street Church and Mission, with its increased facilities and under the care of its able minister, the Rev. Gordon Cooper, will long be a power for good, in ever widening circles. A short musical programme was rendered by Miss Margaret Gould and Miss Edith Ryman.

London : Ministers' Meeting.—At the Ministers' Meeting held at Essex Hall on November 12 the following resolution was passed: "That the London Unitarian Ministers' Meeting protests against the continued disregard of the Statutory provisions passed by Parliament with the intention of protecting those who conscientiously object to take any part in the organisation of military force, and more especially against repeated punishment for what is one and the same offence; and calls upon His Majesty's Government to take immediate and effective steps to put an end to the present state of affairs in this matter."

London: Stratford.—A Sale of Work will be held on Thursday, Friday and Saturday, November 29 and 30, and December 1, in aid of the Church Renovation Fund. £150 is needed to meet present requirements.

Manchester District Lay Preachers' Union.—The members of the Lay Preachers' Union in connection with the Manchester District Association, paid a visit to the Unitarian Home Missionary College, Manchester, on Saturday, November 4, when the Warden of the College, the Rev. H. McLachlan, gave an informal address on the College library and its contents. This visit is part of a scheme for making use of the College during the disorganisation caused by the war. In the course of his remarks Mr. McLachlan explained the method of using the library, described the convenient and efficient system by which the books are indexed, and pointed out the conditions on which the members of the Lay Preachers' Union would be allowed to borrow books. He is himself forming a collection of chapel histories, which he hopes to make one of the special features of the library.

Manchester : Women's League.—The Autumn Meeting of the Manchester Branch of the Women's League was held on November 3 at Stalybridge. Seventy-eight members represented the following branches: Bury (Bank Street), Chesham, Gee Cross, Oldham Road (Manchester), Mossley, Oldham, Padiham, Stalybridge, Stand, and Stockport. There was a Conference of Delegates in the afternoon. After tea Mrs. Ellis welcomed the visitors to Stalybridge, and addresses were given by Mrs. Laycock of Sheffield and Miss Johnstone, President of the Manchester District League.

Mottram.—A Social arranged by the two senior classes to raise funds for soldiers' Christmas comforts was held on November 3, and realised about £10. Some week night Lecture Talks by the Rev. H. Bodell Smith are being well reported in the local press. The subjects have included 'God and the War,' 'What can We Do for Mottram?' 'The Goodwill of Mottram Folk,' 'What—after the War?' Temperance Sunday, November 11, was kept, Mr. C. Pollitt of Stockport giving a temperance address to the school. The Rev. H. Bodell Smith preached at evening service on 'The Evils of the Drink Traffic.'

Newcastle-on-Tyne.—Mr. H. Boothroyd, Superintendent of the Unitarian Sunday school, has gone to France to serve a second period in the Y.M.C.A. huts.

Portsmouth.—At an "At Home" which has been held in connection with the General Baptist Church in St. Thomas's Street, the Rev. T. Bond, who has been minister there for thirty-two years, was welcomed back after his recent illness, and a presentation was made to Engineer-Captain and Mrs. Hills as a token of appreciation of the good work they are doing in Portsmouth. It was stated that over a thousand garments had been given to the children in and around the town.

Sheffield.—A series of Sunday evening lectures is being given by the Rev. C. J. Street at Upper Chapel on 'Modern Developments of Hindu Religion,' ranging from the religion of the Vedas and Upanishads to the Sadharan Brahmo Samaj, the Theistic Church of India. The lectures began on November 11 and will continue till December 16.

MARRIAGE.

CRUICKSHANK—BLOOR.—On November 10, Alexander Tytler (Royal Engineers), only son of Alexander Nicol Cruickshank of Aberdeen, to Ruth Fulgoux, only daughter of Margaret and Robert Bloor.

DEATHS.

BLAKE.—On November 7, at Bridge, South Petherton, Somerset, Fanny Follett Osler Blake, aged 96, widow of the late William Blake.

APPEAL.

The Committee asks friends for financial help in order to meet the cost of repairs to the Church and School buildings.

These had been postponed owing to the War, but the conditions of the fabric has become so bad during the last two years, that further delay would have been disastrous.

Mr. Arnold S. Tayler, at the request of the London District Unitarian Society, inspected the buildings and submitted a report of such repairs as were structural and indispensable.

The work has been put in hand, and the estimated cost is about £250. The Congregation has guaranteed to raise one third of the amount, and, as this will tax their utmost resources, the Committee has to make this urgent appeal for outside help.

Subscriptions will be thankfully received by the Minister,

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

The address for our Belgian Hospital Fund, to which cheques and parcels of clothing should be sent, is Mrs. Bernard Allen, 14 Gainsborough Gardens, Hampstead, N.W.3.

WRITING last week we singled out the need of closer union among the Allies in counsel and action as the dominant note in the Paris speech. Mr. Lloyd George's words in the House of Commons on Monday justify this point of view. He confessed that he had recourse to shock tactics and deliberately chose to make a disagreeable speech in order to drive it home. For the moment the use of the megaphone may have achieved its purpose, but it has grave drawbacks. It tends to bring shouting into fashion among men who want to get things done, and it starts currents of disturbance and misunderstanding in public life, which may easily get out of control.

WE cannot leave the incident without a reference to Mr. Asquith's speech. The newspapers had prepared for it an elaborate stage-setting, and in their disappointment they could find no words to describe it but "tame" and "ineffective." Self-restraint and the resolute refusal to accept a tempting opening for attack, because private ends have no place in public policy, are the marks of great character and noble mind. In Mr. Asquith's words there was not a trace of any desire to embarrass the Government or to swing the feeling of the House to his own side. His request for information provided Mr. Lloyd George with the opportunity of scattering some clouds of bewilderment and misapprehension, and having done that he was content to leave the rewards of oratory to others. It is often in his silences that the character of the true patriot is displayed.

WE watch the recovery of the fighting spirit of the Italian army with tense admiration. The spirit, which carried the struggle for United Italy to victory, has flamed up again in the civilian population. Germany has arrayed the moral forces of nationality against her, and already it is difficult to see what ultimate advantage she hopes to win by her violent and costly adventure. Who can read unmoved these words of a blind Italian soldier, whose one desire is still to be of use to his country? "Yesterday I presented myself to the Army Staff and begged the General to send me there where the danger is greatest, so that I may be, if of no other use, an example to those laggards who, having eyes and arms, still cannot make up their minds to do their duty. At my repeated entreaties the General at last consented, and I am permitted to send in the official request, and am now full of confidence that I shall soon be on my way."

* * *

THE long period of inactivity at Salonika and disgust at the treachery of the Court have caused the affairs of Greece to fall a little into oblivion. But our genuine concern for Greek freedom has received a new impetus through the welcome visit of M. Venizelos. Lord Bryce, who is accustomed to weigh his words, spoke of him the other day as "one of the foremost men in Europe and one of the foremost men among the nations of the world." "M. Venizelos," he said, "had shown not only boldness in action, but a prudence and power of waiting, a self-restraint, and moral as well as physical courage which had deserved, and had received, our warmest admiration."

IN the speeches which he has made since his arrival M. Venizelos has expressed his firm faith in democratic principles. He looks forward, at the end of the war, to the organisation of a community of democratic nations. But he is convinced that this can only be achieved if the Allies win a complete victory.

It is only by such a victory [he said at the Mansion House last week], a victory that will abolish brutal force and will establish justice, that real peace can be secured—a peace that must not be a mere truce, during which the world would continue to be crushed with military expenditure and after a few years find itself, out of breath, faced with the horrors of a fresh war; but a peace that will establish the community of nations and will create a new world, a better world than that in which the will of a single man was sufficient to plunge humanity into this unprecedented catastrophe. Toward the new edifice which has thus to be raised, Greece can contribute but a few minor blocks of stone. Yet she will be proud to know that, in the midst of dire difficulties and in spite of the disastrous consequences of the absolutism of her King, she remained to the end faithful to her obligations and refused to accept the dogma of "scraps of paper."

AT a meeting held in Liverpool on Monday in support of the North Wales Heroes Memorial at Bangor, Lord Kenyon said that he hoped the scheme would include the idea of a memorial chapel, not representative of any creed, and not served by any parson, but a place of prayer and meditation, which would help to lift the people above petty religious squabbles and teach them the spirit of true Christianity and unity. At the same meeting Sir Henry Jones spoke of the scarred land of the Somme battlefield. The whole countryside, he said, would probably in the future be covered with a vast forest, and what more beautiful thought for bereaved parents than this, that the resting-places of their dear brave lads were sentinelled by giant trees, through whose branches God's music played? Both suggestions serve to remind us that the strongest appeals of religion at the present time come through the deep needs and emotions of the common life, and are largely independent of the familiar ecclesiastical channels.

FAR-SEEING men in all the Churches are becoming aware of this fact. Thus Artifex in The Manchester Guardian confesses quite frankly that in his opinion 90 per cent of the adult males of the country are totally indifferent to every question connected with the Anglican Church. He does not think that the Free Churches are in any better position. "Men do not go to church because they love church, or to chapel because they love chapel. Most of them stay away altogether, and send their children to the school which is handiest or has the pleasantest district visitor or the best-equipped club or brigade....For most men the issues that divide church and chapel or chapel from chapel are dead and done for....Many men greatly desire spiritual guidance and prophets who can speak with conviction about God. Most men desire from the Church brotherhood, service, and teaching as to good living. The issues that divide Christian people are, for most men, dead ones." In all this there may be a tinge of exaggeration. But broadly speaking the facts are true. What do we intend to do about it? If we simply stand aside, or allow ourselves to drift into a campaign of self-defence, nothing can save us from the lingering death which is the fate of those who meet the shock of great days with small minds.

On Wednesday the House of Commons resolved by a majority of 38 to disfranchise the conscientious objector. We view the decision with grave misgiving. Logic, possibly in some cases tinged with resentment, has triumphed over common sense, and logic is often a very unsafe guide in political action. At first sight it seems reasonable enough to forbid a man to take any part in the government of a country which he will do nothing to save from destruction. It may even be pleaded that he has disfranchised himself by refusing the duties of a good citizen. But this is a line of argument which men who have not forgotten the long struggle for Catholic Emancipation and the removal of Nonconformist disabilities will be very slow to adopt. No doubt the case is extreme and a war for national existence requires drastic measures; but this is no reason for inflicting political disabilities when the war is over, which are not demanded by any temperate regard for the general welfare.

No reasonable man can object to the regulation that pamphlets and leaflets dealing with the war, which are issued for public distribution, must bear the names of author and printer. The country has a right to defend itself against the corroding influence of anonymous sedition. But compulsory censorship before publication is a very different matter. To the departmental mind, accustomed to move along the grooves of safety, all originality of thought is unwelcome, and it is within the bounds of possibility that it may include the prophet and the criminal under a common ban. Let the penalty be swift and stern for all proved offences against the law; but at the same time let us beware lest an uncontrolled censorship should reduce public utterance to a mean standard of uniformity and sterilise mental activity at its source.

LORD MORLEY'S RECOLLECTIONS.

"There are some books," Lord Morley writes, "which cannot be adequately reviewed for twenty or thirty years after they come out." Regardless of this plea for delay the reviewers were busy with his 'Recollections' on the very day of publication. The practised hand searched its pages with feverish haste for political revelations, bons mots, or opinions on his great contemporaries, and there was no difficulty in gathering a rich harvest. Fortunately for good books the first storm of applause is succeeded by the quieter and more reflective methods of the critic, who shrinks even from unlimited praise before he has steeped himself in their atmosphere and allowed their vital power to play upon his own mind. This is the method used by Lord Morley himself in the pages devoted to literature, as he seeks to explain what it is that holds him in Lucretius or Wordsworth or the poetry of Matthew Arnold. We have no desire to attempt such an adventurous task. We are still too much under the spell of first acquaintance with a book, which is likely to take its place with the greatest of its kind. It belongs to the class of "Memoirs" in which French literature is so much richer than our own. It gives us a picture, full of light and glow, of the man and his age. Alike in its clear intellectual passion, its vein of pungent humour, and its moral austerity, it is a revelation of the living mind. On this personal side we may hazard a few impressions.

One of the first things which will strike the reader is the consistency and the earnestness with which Lord Morley has adhered to the rationalism of his early days. He has never been the easy victim of casual creeds or succumbed to the fashionable weariness of thought. In some men this would only be the badge of narrowness, but with him it points to the central loyalties which have given consistency and completeness to life. Amid the absorbing interests of his long career, the battles of the mind and "the tidal agitations of the parliamentary world," he has never allowed himself to tamper with the moralities of thought. But there has been nothing slavish in his reverence for Mill and his early teachers. Does he not remind us that "even young disciples do not always lose the rudiments of a mind of their own"? For him thought untrammelled by human authority was combined with the forward look and an eager receptiveness, and it gave to him unswerving confidence in the blessings of freedom in human relationships. "You do not feel the inherent power and glory of the spirit of Liberty," he wrote once to Walter Bagehot. It is his capacity for feeling these things and communicating them to other men, which has turned the careful thinker and student into a prophet of democracy.

Even more than a history of his own mind this book is a record of Lord Morley's friendships, but never surely were a man's friends so true a revelation of himself. His generosity of nature shines through them all, and with this native instinct was combined from early years a trained mental capacity for doing justice to those with whom he disagreed. He has never pretended that difference in opinion does not matter, and he warns us against the danger of allowing the Laodicean, the Latitudinarian, the Trimmer, the Manpleaser to make for himself a complacent lodging in our bosom; but this is not inconsistent with just and temperate judgment and the sovereignty of good temper in human relationships. He quotes with approval the saying of Halifax that, "The Man who is Master of Patience is Master of Everything." It is a reflection of his own that "love of truth is often a true name for temper." If this had been remembered there would have been fewer partings of friends over changes of policy. He once wrote the following criticism of Chaumette, "one of the least estimable of terrorist Jacobins":—"Our opinions are not more important than the spirit and temper with which they possess us....It would be far better to share the superstitious beliefs of a virtuous and benignant priest like the bishop in Victor Hugo's 'Misérables,' than to hold whatever was truer in the opinions of Chaumette as he held them with ravening intolerance, and a shallow forgetfulness of all that part of our nature that lies out of the immediate domain of the logical understanding." As we read these words we seem to grasp the secret of the steadiness of Lord Morley's friendships with men who were not in close agreement with him. He is most expansive and delightful where there was intimate harmony of mind and purpose, as in the sketches of George Meredith and John Stuart Mill, and of Chamberlain in the early days of their friendship; but the whole record, with its candid good humour, has in it no flaws of taste. It is instinct with the spirit of justice and charity.

Recollections. By John, Viscount Morley, O.M. London: Macmillan & Co. 2 vols. 25s. net.

Of the spiritual influence of the life depicted for us in these volumes it is too soon to speak. Lord Morley has impressed himself deeply upon his generation by the force of his personality and the special qualities of his mind. Of the first one memorable illustration must suffice. Just before the outbreak of the Boer War a meeting of protest was held in Manchester. The great hall was packed with an excited throng. There was organised opposition. Not a word of the chairman's speech could be heard even at the reporter's table. For ten minutes Morley stood face to face with a deafening uproar. Then he subdued it, and for an hour there was breathless silence, till at the close he swept aside the arguments of policy and in a magnificent crescendo appealed to the deep human instinct of right and wrong, and the vast audience sprang to its feet in an answering cheer of approval. For many of those who were present it remains in memory as one of the most signal triumphs of the moral forces of personality which they have ever known. But in quieter and not less effective ways his influence has penetrated into the higher life of our day. If he has widened the horizons of thought, he has also elevated feeling and purged it of much of its dross. Some people will describe an influence of this kind as purely moral, while others will see in it some of the most gracious qualities of religion. We care not which word is used, so long as men recognise and honour the thing itself. "Religion," he said in one of his election addresses at Newcastle-on-Tyne, "has many dialects, many diverse complexions, but it has one true voice, the voice of human pity, of mercy, of patient justice, and to that voice your candidate, to the best of his knowledge and belief, has always done all he could to listen."

As we turn the last page of this record, with a mind braced and enriched, we linger for a moment on the words, feeling how apt is their quotation in this place, "The nobler a soul is, the more objects of compassion it hath." To this memorable saying of Bacon we are tempted to join another. Its fitness will be enhanced for those who remember that it is a paraphrase from Lord Morley's favourite poet, Lucretius. "It is a pleasure to stand upon the shore, and to see ships tost upon the Sea; A pleasure to stand in the window of a Castle, and to see a Battaile, and the Adventures thereof below; But no pleasure is comparable to the standing upon the vantage ground of Truth (A hill not to be commanded, and where the Ayre is alwaies cleare and serene,) And to see the Errors, and Wanderings, and Mists, and Tempests, in the vale below. So alwaies that the prospect be with Pity, and not with Swelling or Pride. Certainly it is Heaven upon Earth to have a Man's Minde, Move in Charitie, Rest in Providence, and Turne upon the Poles of Truth."

ZIONISM.

By C. G. Montefiore.

The Zionist movement was caused by anti-Semitism. Its creator and founder, Dr. Herzl, was an Austrian Jew, a journalist and writer, of distinguished appearance, wide culture, charming manners, and attractive personality. Yet such a man, no less than the most vulgar and disagreeable upstart, was the victim of anti-Semitic prejudice and hatred. He was as Western and "Austrian" in culture and habits of thought as any Christian Viennese. So far as religious practices were concerned, and religious belief as well, he was estranged from the synagogue. But, at last, as he told me himself, he could bear it no longer. He realised that his own lot was even less irksome, less galling, and less restricted, than that of hundreds and thousands of his fellow Jews. He remembered the Russia of that day, and the persecution and the disabilities that were then in full swing. He said to himself: "They will not let us be Austrians or Russians. They spurn upon, and spit at us, be we never so patriotic. Well, then, let us find a home and a country for ourselves."

Thus he argued in dejection and despair. At first he thought of a home in the New World, but he soon realised that an immense power and impetus would accrue to the movement if the home were to be the old country of the forefathers. So South America was soon abandoned for Palestine.

The movement caught on, and after many ups and downs, has become powerful and important. It gradually drew to itself many kinds of adherents. (1) There were those who despaired of emancipation and of freedom in Russia and Roumania. (2) There were those who, like Dr. Herzl himself, thought that anti-Semitism was incurable; that if, in any European or American country, there were more than a minute number of Jews, anti-Semitism was inevitable and permanent. (3) Again, there were thousands in Eastern Europe who were quite estranged from Jewish orthodoxy, or even from religion, while no other presentation of Judaism had ever been put before them. Yet deep within them their Jewish feelings slumbered. Zionism awoke these feelings. Here was an ideal to work for apart from, and unassociated with, religion. (4) The nationalist cravings and impulses, which have so greatly increased in recent years, affected many Jews. They, too, would be again a nation; they, too, would have a home. Naturally, those Jews specially felt like this who had no home and no country: the unemancipated and persecuted Jews of Eastern Europe. (5) Even when the Jews were technically free—in Germany and Austria—there was the galling, the bitter, the virulent, anti-Semitism. And it was not a mere sentiment. Hardly a Jew in those countries ever became an officer in the Army, or a full professor, or reached the higher stages of Government employ. The young men were, therefore, fired by the dream of a country of their own, where they could shape their own life, and develop their powers unhindered. (6) The immense number of newly settled Russian and Eastern European Jews in America took up the movement. They had not been long enough in America to develop American patriotism and American feelings. Their separatist and Jewish-national feelings were played upon, and they yielded to the incitement. (7) And now a certain number of other Jews were also infected. The romance of it all fired their imaginations, and they asked themselves, Should they selfishly ignore the feelings, the needs, the aspirations of their brethren? Should they not cast in their lot with the masses? Zionism was a democratic movement. But they were democrats too. Should they, because themselves comfortable and happy, ignore the wounds and yearnings of their brothers? (8) Lastly, many recruits came to Zionism from the religious side. For, after all, the old prophets had predicted the restoration. It was a dogma of the faith. Might not, perhaps, man assist God, and so anticipate the Messiah? Moreover, emancipation and liberty have their dangers. They promote indifference and mixed marriages. The law can only be observed, in its perfect fullness and strictness, in a Jewish environment. How observe the Sabbath, when the national day of rest is Sunday? In Palestine the Jew need neither starve nor sin.

These eight classes have brought to Zionism a large number of eager supporters. Before the war, the Zionists were, upon the whole, supporters of Turkey. It was hoped that Turkey might, perhaps, allow the Jews to become the practical owners of Palestine, under the nominal suzerainty of the Porte and guaranteed by the Powers. I do not know what the German and Austrian Jews think and feel and hope to-day. But, in England and America, Turkey has naturally been dropped. The idea now is that Palestine shall be the national home-land of the Jews under English suzerainty. By a curious turn in events it would seem that such an eventuality would not be unpleasing to the British Government, and so we have the recent "declaration," which has filled the hearts of the Zionists with justified pride and rejoicing. Whether the Declaration will be fulfilled, and in what form, remains to be seen.

The Zionist movement was not, at first, taken seriously by the majority of Western and Emancipated Jews. Only very gradually did they begin, one might almost say, are they beginning, to realise its implications. What is the position, and what are the ideals, of this large and important body?

In their eyes the Jews are not a nation, and do not constitute a separate political nationality. For them the great bond which knits the Jews together is not so much a bond of race as the higher, more spiritual, bond of a common religion. They are not unwilling that those Jews who may desire to settle in Palestine should settle there; and if the settlers can develop a separate nationality of their own—if circumstances allow, and even conduce to, this—by all means let them do so. But outside this local nationality of the future, there is no present and common Jewish nationality of to-day. The Jews whose views I am now describing are patriots and citizens of the lands in which they live. They want nothing better, and they will be satisfied with nothing less. In countries where their full and complete citizenship is still to seek, they will not be satisfied till they have attained it; in countries where this full and complete citizenship is theirs, they will make every effort to retain it. They are English, French, Italian, yes, even German, Jews of the Jewish faith, and they want no other home of country than England, France, Italy, yes, even Germany. They want no other nationality, they repudiate any other nationality, than that which is equally enjoyed, but not more keenly beloved, by their fellow citizens of the Christian faith.

Russian Jews have now won, or been given, their freedom, and, by such accounts as reach me, comparatively small is the percentage of those who would wish to leave Russia for Palestine, or abandon their Russian nationality for a new nationality elsewhere.

The Jews of whom I am now speaking see in Zionism a serious danger. For though they do not believe with Dr. Herzl that anti-Semitism is a permanent disease or weakness of non-Jewish humanity, though they hold that such a view is a libel alike upon humanity and the Jews, yet they cannot shut their eyes to the fact that in every country there is an anti-Semitic party—a small, noisy, and disagreeable group of anti-Semites existing even in England. In certain prominent journals there are constant attacks upon, and innuendos against, the Jews. But all the anti-Semites are enthusiastic Zionists. And the reason is clear. If all the Jews could be deported to Palestine, the nations among whom they now live would be rid of them. But that is not all. The Zionists, by asserting the nationality of the Jews, by declaring that the Jews are homeless strangers all over the world, by desiring to leave Europe and America and to settle in Palestine, are confessing and agreeing to the very charges which the anti-Semites are always bringing against the Jews everywhere. The Zionists—strange that they do not see it—play into the anti-Semites' hands. They, too, say that the various countries of Europe and America will never, gladly and willingly, incorporate among their citizens a large number of Jews. They, too, say that the man who claims to be, and believes that he is generally regarded as, an Englishman of the Jewish faith, and neither more nor less, is a mere victim of self-delusion. Now the more Jews who say and feel all these things, the more real justification is there for the attacks of the anti-Semites. The chief point is this: do the Jews feel themselves to be devoted citizens of the countries in which they dwell, differing from their fellow citizens merely in certain religious doctrines and practices? Do they want to remain where they are, or do they want to go elsewhere? If, as I fully believe to be the case, the vast majority feel themselves to be citizens of this kind, if they do not want to leave their homes, but to remain in them, then, even though some may be Zionists for others, vicariously, but not for themselves, they are no mere birds of passage, then emancipation and liberty are reasonable, then the sneers and taunts and attacks of the anti-Semites are false and unjustified. But if not, then not!

Other objections to Zionism of a more purely religious kind I will not now mention. Some feel them; others do not. I have only mentioned those objections in which all anti-Zionists are united. The very practical nature of these objections may be realised by this single reflection. Suppose all went well with Zionist hopes, and suppose that in ten years from now there were one million Jews settled in Palestine. That is a very high estimate. There would remain ten or eleven million Jews elsewhere. Is their status, well-being, and half of all that makes life worth living, to be endangered because of the million? And is not being a full, free, acknowledged, undisliked, and devoted citizen of your country, half of what makes life worth living?

THE Z—— BETWEEN.*

THE short December afternoon was drawing to a close. Darkness settled sooner than elsewhere on to Z——. The sun went off to the forests of Trois Fontaines on the other side of the hill, and the citizens of the little township sloping towards the north kept early hours. Already at 5.30 the most zealous were preparing for repose.

The Relief-Worker, a long round of visits accomplished, consigned to the pockets of her oilskins the list of beds and tables. The pressing demands of the immediate present yielded place to other interests. She crossed the one-time square below the fountain, whence rounded chalky roads like the legs of a great spider radiate on every side.

The streets were empty. Twilight had stilled the resonant hammers of the English builders. Over the hillside above her it seemed to Mademoiselle there spread tall red-roofed houses along well-tended streets, stores, bureaux, hotels she had never known, ghosts of a Z—— that had gone up in smoke and collapsed in red-hot ash on that terrible Sunday afternoon when the Battle of the Marne began.

Involuntarily she passed her hand over her eyes to sweep out the phantom buildings and looked again.

This city of maisonettes—a queer sort of Z—— it must be to those who had known the other; but even it was acquiring an air of homeliness all its own. The red glow of the stove behind the neatly curtained window of Madame Lefèvre rivalled the bright coloured tiles of her humble roof.

Madame Lefèvre and her daughter, their frugal supper over, had drawn their chairs to the stove to sit for awhile and talk ere they went to bed.

The Relief-Worker entered without preliminaries. They had greeted her half-a-dozen times that day and were looking for her to come. Dropping her wet oilskins in a corner of the hut, she took the well accustomed seat by the warm pipe of the chimney.

"There is just one sou in the house and never a candle, and none at the épicerie if we had the money to buy them!" Madame laughed gaily, explaining the absence of a light.

The thoughts of the Englishwoman, however, were upon other topics.

"I have been seeing, out there in the square," she began, "a Z——, that I never knew, tall, red-brick and rich; then after that I saw the Z—— that was really there, white huts near the ground, small and poor. One thing I tried to see but did not know how, that was the Z—— between, the invaded Z——. But you, you saw it all."

Mademoiselle waited. Charcoal fell together in the stove, but no one spoke. "Why did you stay?" she asked.

"I do not know," the woman answered. "I did not mean to stay; but at the last they came so quickly. I hoped all the time they would not reach us. Where was there for me to go? There was no food, no shelter. The roads were full. Nearly everybody went. I stayed in my cellar as long as I could, and when I had to go it was too late. The flames were right across the road in front and I could not get through."

"Did they fire the place on purpose, do you think?"

"Well! Yes and no. Some of our people say they saw Boche soldiers lighting a fire at the corner there to the left; but I did not see that. I saw the incendiary shells fall into the houses and then the houses took fire. I could see the fires starting everywhere. There was a strong wind blowing from the north-east. It took the fires and rushed them up the hill till the whole hillside was ablaze; it lifted the flames high up into the sky making a mountain of fire. It was magnificent! magnificent! I never saw anything like it before, and I never want to again.

"I stayed until my own house was on fire above my head and it was too hot. Then the only way I could get out was down at the back towards the station. I walked down to the Sugar Refinery and I saw them coming in—Boches everywhere. Very, very black they were, and their uncut beards made them look blacker still. I did not entirely like it, not entirely." Madame Lefèvre shook her head meditatively.

"When they saw me they took me prisoner, me and a few other women and children who had not got away. They put us in the Sugar Refinery and we were not allowed to go out. We could not tell what was happening, and we did not like that at all.

"There was no food either. There we were in the Sugar Refinery surrounded by sacks and sacks and sacks of sugar! For two whole days we had nothing to eat but sugar! I laugh about it now; but I did not laugh then. I hated the sugar. It was worse for the poor children, they were so hungry and the sugar made them ill. The countryside had been eaten bare of food. There were no rabbits, no chickens, no bread. The Germans themselves had none. They had biscuits, however, and some of them came down to the Sugar Refinery and gave their biscuits to the children. They could not speak much French.

"'Moi pas méchant, pas méchant,' they would say; but they looked very 'méchant' all the same." Madame laughed a second time.

"Still, we could get along quite well with them. It was the Commandant we did not like, and, as for that, neither did they.

"He, too, came down to the Sugar Refinery and strode about. He wanted Monsieur le Maire and the other men. He thought we might be shielding them; but we could tell him nothing. We did not know where they were.

"He said, 'You shall hang for this! You shall all hang!'" Madame raised her hand to draw in the air an imaginary gi bet, and once more a ripple of laughter filled the hut.

"But," she added naïvely, "we did not hang. Later in the week the shells began to fall into Z—— again, and we did not know what would happen. One shell fell right into the house where the Commandant was asleep and killed him. His little grave is on the hill there with the rest.

"When the men knew he was dead they were not going to stay. Quite suddenly they broke and ran. Even in their haste they did not forget us. They came rushing down to the Sugar Refinery, shouting as they ran:—

"'You are free! You are free! Go back to your houses!'"

The woman's voice rang through the little hut. A gleam from the stove showed the animation dying from her face.

"As though," she continued quietly, "we had any houses to go back to. They had forgotten that. We went out, and we saw them going down, running over the bridge yonder by the canal. They went very quickly indeed. Then we turned and went up the hill. That was on the Friday, and I had seen nothing since Sunday, the day of the fire, when the town was in flames; but now it was all black ash. Everywhere black ash, over the roads and all. I never saw so much blackness in my life before, and never, never do I want to see that again."

Madame changed the subject abruptly.

"You, too, have suffered. Your East Coast is laid waste, is it not?"

Mademoiselle smiled. "It is not so bad as that," she said. "But tell me what became of you that day?"

"Oh, I—" Madame resumed, the interest passing out of her voice, "I came back to my cellar. It was half-full of water at times, and there was no house above it, and even by day it was dark."

Mademoiselle, slipping on her oilskins, pointed to the stove. "Even here it will be dark if you do not remember the fire."

Madame threw up her hands. "No fuel!" she said briefly. "To-morrow, perhaps—I do not know—the savings of forty years are not made good in one or two."

Outside the snow was falling, thick and soft. The maisonettes were roofed and plastered in white, the ruins disguised as banks of drifting snow. But Mademoiselle saw a Z—— of yellow fire, and along the snowy streets she passed through flames that did not burn.

MEMORIAL NOTICE.

CAPTAIN E. S. RUSSELL, M.C.

It is with deep regret that we have to announce that Captain Edward Stanley Russell, M.C., Hereford Regiment, youngest son of the Rev. and Mrs. J. R. Russell, of Birmingham, was killed on November 6. Born in 1882, he was educated at London University and Manchester College, Oxford, and was for three years assistant and co-minister at Ullet Road Church, Liverpool. In September, 1914, he enlisted in the Liverpool Regiment, and soon became corporal and then sergeant. In February, 1915, he received a commission in the Herefordshire Regiment, with which he landed at Suvla Bay in August, 1915. Later he was invalided home with typhoid fever. He rejoined again in the spring of 1916, and shortly afterwards went to another front, where he won the Military Cross. Captain Russell married in 1913 Elizabeth Durning Holt, daughter of the late Mr. and Mrs. Robert Durning Holt, of Liverpool, and leaves a son who was born on the day war was declared.

Mr. Russell is the first Unitarian minister who has been killed in action. He was a man of great personal charm and will be deeply mourned by a large circle of friends.

'CONTEMPORARY THOUGHT IN FRANCE,' by Dr. Lilly Mary Grove, will be found a helpful guide by those who wish to know something in outline of modern French literature. It deals with the period from 1900 to 1914, and is issued by the National Home Reading Union, 12 York Buildings, Adelphi, W.C.2, price One Shilling.

'THE SOUL OF THE NATION' and other Essays on Religion, Patriotism, and National Duty, by the Rev. W. H. Drummond, is now ready. It is published by the Lindsey Press (price 2*s.* 6*d.* net).

The £5 acknowledged last week as from Mrs. Wallace Bruce should have been from Miss M. Bruce.

Parcels have been received from:—The Misses Suttill; Miss Sharpe; Church of the Messiah, Birmingham, Adult Class, per Miss M. Abbott; Finchley Unitarian Church Sale (contents of basket for gifts for B.H.F.) per Mrs. Blake Odgers; Mrs. Robinson's Redlynch House Work Depot; Stockport Branch of the Women's League, per Miss New; Miss Isabel Worsley; Bournemouth Unitarian Church Working Party, per Mrs. V. D. Davis; Kentish Town Branch of the Women's League (parcel from their Sale of Work), per the Rev. F. Hankinson.

WEEKLY NOTES.

AMONG the parcels this week was a large one containing seventy-eight articles from the Finchley Sale of Work. In sending it, Mrs. Blake Odgers writes: "We workers at Finchley have felt sorry that having so much to do for our Sale, we could not keep our monthly parcels to you up to last year's standard in quantity. But all along I have said we would make suitable things for your purposes and buy them for you at the Sale. So I wrote a notice for the basket and Miss Lawrence urged the idea in her little speech, that anyone present should put in at least one thing for you. I think the response was very good, and I am so glad to pack the seven guineas' worth off—a most varied assortment! But it might be good to mention the plan we adopted as so many sales are coming on just now, and say how good the result was at Finchley yesterday." The Rev. F. Hankinson evidently had the same idea, as he forwards a parcel of twenty articles from his Sale of Work at Clarence Road Church, Kentish Town. May I commend the idea to other sales of work? Clothes for men in hospital, for women, children and babies, and any little gifts for Christmas would be very welcome. ROSE ALLEN.

SPECIAL WANTS.

Pyjamas, shirts, socks, and all sorts of men's underclothing.
Mufflers, cardigans, slippers.
Clothing for women and children.
Games, jigsaw puzzles.

The name and address of sender and list of contents should be enclosed in each parcel.

Contributions of money and clothing should be sent to Mrs. Bernard Allen, 14 Gainsborough Gardens, Hampstead, N.W.3.

TOYS FOR BELGIAN CHILDREN.

MRS. W. H. DRUMMOND acknowledges with many thanks gifts for the Belgian children from: Mrs. Green, Mrs. Sydney Martineau, Peggy, Annys and Kathleen Cusack, Mrs. F. E. Baines, Mrs. Byles, Margaret and Kathleen Falconer, a Friend from Chatham, the Rosslyn Hill Chapel Children's Guild, Miss H. Scott. The first consignment of toys will be sent off at the beginning of next week. Further gifts will be most welcome, so that a second consignment may be sent out with as little delay as possible. Address—23, Cannon Place, Hampstead, N.W.3.

A SOCIAL REFORM SOCIETY AT PLYMOUTH.

OUR columns have reported the formation of Social Service Unions at Evesham and Newark, and an account of a similar society formed in Plymouth over two years ago may be of interest and serve as a guide for other towns. The initiative in Plymouth was taken by the Rev. Charles Joseph, a former President of the Baptist Union, and the Rev. A. W. T. Perowne, Vicar of St. Andrew's. A meeting of the ministers of religion of the town and others known to be interested in social subjects was called, and resulted in the founding of the "Plymouth Social Reform Society," with the following objects: (1) To cultivate and promote the love and practice of purity in conversation and in conduct; (2) To afford opportunity for conference, for the public declaration of opinion, and for joint action on questions affecting the moral and social condition of the Borough; (3) To secure the impartial administration and enforcement of the existing laws relating to social conditions, and to seek the improvement of such laws; (4) To promote the election and appointment of fit persons of high moral character upon the various governing bodies of the Borough, irrespective of Imperial politics or distinctive religious belief, and generally to seek by all legitimate means to reclaim the fallen, to protect the weak, and to purify and safeguard the social life of the community.

The work of the Society is carried on by four Committees elected by the Council. The Council itself is elected annually from the general body of members. The committees are known as the Social Purity, the Licensing, the Housing, and the Labour Committees, in accordance with their specific fields of inquiry and work. The Unitarian minister serves on two of these committees. The Society has been active and helpful. It has been able to engage a paid general secretary, Mr. Robert Fairbraes, in addition to enjoying the services of two honorary secretaries, one an Anglican vicar and the other a United Methodist minister. Several improvements have been effected as the result of representations made by the Housing Committee. The efforts of the Social Purity Committee have met with some success in handling a very difficult problem. The Society works in harmony with the Civic Guild of Help and allied institutions, and is winning the confidence of the Town Council. By two large meetings in the Plymouth Guildhall, one addressed by the Bishop of Oxford and the other by the Rev. Thomas Phillips of Bloomsbury and Sir Walter Essex, M.P., the Society has focussed local attention upon the need for social reforms. It is a hopeful sign that similar societies are springing up in many towns in answer to a common need.

THE LAWRENCE HOUSE BULLETIN.

THE Lawrence House Committee are about to post a new Bulletin to upwards of six thousand soldiers and sailors connected with our Churches and schools, so far as these can be reached. There is reason to fear that some of the former addresses are out of date, and ministers or other friends are asked immediately to send the present addresses, in postal detail, of all those men who have changed their status or whereabouts in recent months. The names and addresses of men who have newly joined the forces will be specially welcome. Communications should be forwarded to the Secretary, Essex Hall, Essex Street, Strand, W.C.2.

LORD MORLEY AND DR. MARTINEAU.

THERE are two interesting references to Dr. Martineau in Lord Morley's 'Recollections':—

"Saturday, September 11. Such glorious golden weather. Wrote a few letters. At noon we all went off on a picnic with the Murrays to Loch-an-Eilein. Most delightful in every way. Murray and I called on old Dr. Martineau. Wonderful old fellow. Is 93; comes down soon after 8 and does not retire until midnight, but has plenty of dozing in the day. Can walk up a hill that would wind most of us. Is deep in Harnack's History of Christian Literature up to Eusebius. Lent me a funeral sermon by Harnack on Frau Lisco. Alas, he gave me a piece of funeral news that filled me with sorrowful and affectionate thoughts; he had heard that day that poor Hutton is dead: 'a most tender-hearted, upright, and truth-loving man,' said the old man truly. He was indeed all that, and we have lost a fine English critic and a beautiful character. Read Martineau on Death again. Excellent writing, but unconvincing as argument."

"The most brilliant English apologist of our day, I should think, has been Martineau, and when the apologist comes to deal with the 'great mountain-chain of death,' and life to come, it is to the rolling hexameters from Lucretius he goes for adverse texts that he made it his business to overthrow. Goethe himself, so widely counted 'Europe's sagest head,' may well be said to be the founder, guide, and oracle of an informal, nameless, and unorganised communion of his own—men and women content to live their lives independently of two articles of such profound and saturating belief as those against which Lucretius waged his impassioned war."

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Croydon.—An interesting account of the various activities of Mr. John Bredall, F.R.G.S., the popular secretary of Messrs. Cook & Son, the tourist agents, has just been published in The British Workman. Mr. Bredall has been with the famous firm at Ludgate Circus for forty-seven years, and during that time has not only made an extensive study of travel, but has himself travelled in many parts of the world, including Egypt, Palestine, and India. At the time of the Franco-Prussian war he had an exciting journey to Paris during the terrible siege, when he was sent there with important documents on behalf of the committee established in London to collect money for feeding the starving Parisians. In connection with his work he has met many prominent people, and has a fund of anecdotes to draw upon which adds much to the liveliness of the lectures which he occasionally gives on the subject of his travels. In addition to being a Fellow of the Royal Geographical Society he is an Esperantist, a student of astronomy, a good amateur photographer, and a life-long teetotaller.

Huddersfield.—Dr. Arthur A. Beale of Bradford spoke on 'Mind in Relation to Health,' at the usual weekly meeting of the Fitzwilliam Street Social Union on Wednesday, November 14. The Rev. Robert A. Dickson, in introducing the speaker, referred to the deep significance of the newer psychological thought, which recognises that the body is not something separate and distinct from the mind, but merely the objectivised aspect of mind; that all disease is due to, and the physical expression of, mental imperfection. "As a man thinketh in his heart, so is he"—bodily; and disease is the effect of habitual mental states out of key with the true norm of life, and calling for redress. A corrected mentality is followed automatically by an improved objective state of body, as St. Paul very well knew when he said, "Be ye transformed by the renewing of your mind." The power of mind over matter is no longer hypothetical—it is a fact to be dealt with in every condition of the human body. Taking as his text the dictum "Mens sana in corpore sano" Dr. Beale said that his psychology was not in any way the psychology of the Western world. For all conceptions of the deep mysteries of life they were bound to go to the East. The brain was the registering organ for the mind, and in the highest sense mind, properly understood, was identical with man himself; that was to say, man was a conscious entity, a mentality. With regard to health, the keynote lay in the realisation of an old aphorism which again had its origin in the East, and which said that the mind took on the form of that which it contemplated; and another aphorism stated that mind was like a mirror which, whilst it reflected, covered itself with dust, and which constantly required the breeze of wisdom to brush away the dust of illusion. Again, a man contemplating a beautiful picture, if capable of appreciating it, was lost in its atmosphere, and his countenance took on a more beautiful aspect. The constant association with hills produced not only a type of mind, but also a type of body. If the mind took on the shape of that which it contemplated it was desirable that those who aspired to improve social and physical conditions should ensure that the sort of thing that the people contemplated was such as was desirable. They must not present evil in the press, on the stage, or elsewhere if they wished to avoid evil. In this connection the speaker uttered a warning against the terrible danger in any circumstances of using hypnotism as a means of acquiring influence over one's self or over other persons. Persons who obtained profit by imposing upon credulity in this way were, he said, a class of criminal from which society should be protected. Although it might not be easy to prove it he believed that thoughts were things, and the influence of those thoughts none could estimate. In this age of wireless telegraphy it was not difficult to imagine that they could impress the mentality of people at some great distance, and if thoughts were things, and could impress themselves on the body, it was not difficult to trace some definite relationship between disease germs and mentality. As a result of wrong living and wrong thinking food poisons were produced. The mind was the great disease producer, and yet, paradoxical as it might seem, the mind was the great healer. They poisoned by their thoughts their highest selves, and became the willing bondslaves of passion. They could, on the other hand, literally dwell among pure and noble thoughts, recognising that nothing is of value but the beautiful, the true, and the good; and such mental condition would bring wholeness, or health, or holiness, of body and spirit. A long, interesting, and appreciative discussion followed.

London: Finchley.—During the past ten months the members of the Unitarian congregation have been steadily preparing for a Sale of Work in aid of the funds of their church. The sale took place on Wednesday, 14th inst., and was opened at 11 A.M. by Miss Durning Lawrence. In introducing her, the chairman, Dr. Blake Odgers, recalled the fact that she was the daughter of the late Sir James Lawrence, who was the Lord Mayor of London at the time of the Franco-German War. Belgium at the time, as in 1914, was in danger between the two great military powers. Then it was that Sir James Lawrence, to show the sympathy of England with Belgium, visited, in the full panoply of all his mayoral dignity, the city of Brussels, and so assured the world of England's care and sympathy with the small nations of Europe. Miss Durning Lawrence, after a pleasant and friendly little speech, declared the sale open, and was duly thanked for coming to perform the ceremony. The result has been most satisfactory, as over £146 has been already cleared after paying the necessary expenses. And there are still sundry orders to carry out which will bring the total up to £150 or more. Warm thanks are due to those kind friends from other congregations who by their presence and generosity helped to bring about this success. But the most gratifying feature of all is the goodwill and enthusiasm shown by men and women alike in working together to secure the adequate maintenance of the church they love; such a united spirit in the congregation augurs well for the future of the Finchley Unitarian Church.

London: Wandsworth.—On Monday evening the Rev. W. G. Tarrant gave a lecture, with lantern views, on 'Palestine and General Allenby's Campaign,' specially illustrating the physical features of the country between the Suez Canal and Galilee. The schoolroom was well filled. On Sunday evenings in October Mr. Tarrant spoke on 'National Reconstruction,' dealing with the subjects of Child Life, Education, Housing, and Land. Considerable interest was evoked. In December the evening addresses will be on 'The International Debate in 1917,' referring to representative utterances on the part of our Allies, the neutrals, our enemies, and the British, respectively. The services now begin at six o'clock.

Manchester: Moss Side.—The Rev. H. C. Horsley, M.A., of Acton has accepted a cordial invitation from the Moss Side Unitarian Church.

Pudsey.—There was a crowded congregation at the Unitarian Church on Sunday evening, November 18, when a selection of sacred music was given after a short devotional service. In the absence of the Mayor through illness the Deputy-Mayor presided. The Rev. R. Newell in the course of a short address pleaded that there should be greater facilities in the town for good music and also a public library and art gallery, in order to bring high and ennobling influences within the reach of the working people.

Scottish Ministers' Fraternal.—The Scottish Ministers' Fraternal met at Dundee on Saturday, November 17, when there were present the Revs. H. Williamson (Dundee), E. T. Russell (Edinburgh), L. Jenkins Jones (Glasgow), Raymond V. Holt (Edinburgh), H. Dawtrey (Dundee), and S. T. Pagesmith (Kirkaldy). In the morning the Rev. Raymond Holt read a paper on 'The Old and the Newer Nationalism.' In the afternoon a congregational public meeting was held in the Unitarian Church in which all the ministers present took part.

Stand.—Dr. Thackray, minister of Stand Chapel, is now serving for four months with the Y.M.C.A. in France. Various ministers have undertaken to supply the pulpit during his absence.

York.—The congregation of St. Saviourgate Chapel have received with profound regret the announcement of the resignation of their minister, the Rev. J. Tyssul-Davis, B.A., who is taking up the ministry of the Theistic Church, formed by the late Rev. Charles Voysey, and now meeting at Essex Hall, London.

SEVERAL of our ministers in different parts of the country have been granted permission by the prison authorities to visit conscientious objectors to military service who describe themselves as Unitarians. In the London area this work has been undertaken by the Revs. W. G. Tarrant, F. Hankinson, and Basil Martin. We understand that in many cases the Home Office scheme of National Service has been accepted, but a certain number have persisted in their refusal and are included in the group for whom greater leniency of treatment was urged by Lord Parmoor and other speakers in the House of Lords last week.

BIRTH.

HUXLEY.—On November 22, at 16 Bracknell Gardens, Hampstead, the wife of Leonard Huxley, a son.

MARRIAGE.

WAID—HARDY.—On November 17, at Wandsworth Unitarian Church, by the Rev. W. G. Tarrant, B.A., Engineer Sub-Lieutenant W. H. Waid, R.N., elder son of the late Rev. C. H. Waid, to Edith, second daughter of Mr. T. Maskell Hardy.

DEATHS.

BAKER.—On November 15, at Brooklands, Ringwood, Malachi Blake Baker, solicitor, aged 84, eldest son of the late John Baker, solicitor, Ilminster.

CROOK.—Killed in action on November 9, Lieut. Philip Joseph Crook, D.L.O.Y., dearly loved only son of Mr. and Mrs. Edward T. Crook of Lostock, Bolton, and Woodlands, Bridgnorth, Shropshire.

HAWKINS.—On November 17, at 147 Fawnbrake Avenue, Herne Hill, Annie Haskard, widow of William John Hawkins, for many years connected with the Stratford Unitarian Church, aged 73.

APPEAL.

The Committee asks friends for financial help in order to meet the cost of repairs to the Church and School buildings.

These had been postponed owing to the War, but the conditions of the fabric has become so bad during the last two years, that further delay would have been disastrous.

Mr. Arnold S. Tayler, at the request of the London District Unitarian Society, inspected the buildings and submitted a report of such repairs as were structural and indispensable.

The work has been put in hand, and the estimated cost is about £250. The Congregation has guaranteed to raise one third of the amount, and, as this will tax their utmost resources, the Committee has to make this urgent appeal for outside help.

Subscriptions will be thankfully received by the Minister,

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

The address for our Belgian Hospital Fund, to which cheques and parcels of clothing should be sent, is Mrs. Bernard Allen, 14 Gainsborough Gardens, Hampstead, N.W.3.

IN M. Clemenceau France seems to have got the strong man she desires. His blunt manner of speech, which brushes all irrelevancies aside, has rallied people to his side. His policy is to get on with the war and to put his whole energy into the military task, believing that in present circumstances it is the only way of promoting peace. "We must conquer for the sake of justice" is his motto. Another saying of his is this, "I believe that when you are in the middle of action you should talk as little as possible."

IN the series of Allied Portraits which is appearing in the pages of The New Europe there is a notable sketch of Georges Clemenceau, which brings him vividly before us as "the most nimble witted of Parisians, the cleverest of intellectual and political forces, quick as lightning with the thrust and parry, quelling his adversaries, disciplining his friends, and urging them on with le mot cinglant, the word that cuts like a whip." The writer adds, "But behind all this inimitable play of the rapier stands a great personality, the biggest heart and the clearest head in French public life." In another passage he describes how "on a day of crisis you will see him pass like a tornado through the lobbies of the peaceful Senate—assuredly the best club in Paris—followed by a breathless throng of senators and journalists, unaccustomed to such rapidity. He sees to the heart of a situation in a trice, and every one knows that he knows what is going to happen. There can be few men living who have such an 'intelligent appreciation of events before they occur.'"

IN the earnest plea for economy in food which the Bishop of London made in St. Paul's last Sunday he laid special stress upon the fact that the cause of the Allies hangs together in the matter of food as in other things. We have got to share our food with Italy and France—the terrible shortage of supplies in Greece might also have been mentioned—if the great Alliance is to hold together to the end. The bishop showed little patience with the people who excuse themselves from taking the situation seriously because some people are growing rich out of the war. "I do not know the facts about the lives of others," he said. "I only know the facts about my own. With this great question our concern is with ourselves. Compulsory rations may be found necessary. This is the last appeal to the honour of the nation. Let us all at least answer it for ourselves, and for our households. If there is going to be a traitor in this country to sell the pass, let it at least not be myself. If there is going to be a traitor in the beleaguered garrison who is going to steal other people's food in addition to his own, let it not be me. If there is going to be someone who would rather have his beer than that his child should have bread and sugar and milk, let it not be me. If a sufficient number of people from one end of the country to the other will fill in the cards which will be freely distributed in every church and chapel in Great Britain and will keep the resolution they make, by doing so the situation will be saved, and the disgrace of compulsion will be avoided. Those at home will then have taken their part with the soldiers at the front, and having shared the hardship they will share the victory."

THE card to which the Bishop of London referred has upon it the following appeal:—"Men and Women of England: Under the providence of God and by His arm that steels the heroic self-sacrifice of our kinsfolk fighting on sea, on land, and in the air, you live in safety. But to you also the call now comes to serve in the cause of humanity. Will you not therefore fill in the attached card, offering yourself as a member of the League of National Safety?"

WE called attention to the three striking articles on 'Liberal Policy' by Prof. Gilbert Murray, when they appeared originally in The Daily News. They have been published this week by Messrs. George Allen & Unwin, Ltd., under the title of 'The Way Forward,' with a preface by Viscount Grey. The former Foreign Secretary writes with caution about the distinction which is made in some quarters between the militarist German Government and the German people. He admits that there are some ugly facts against it, especially the prevalent belief that defeat or even failure was impossible, and that war was synonymous with success and speedy victory. "It is incredible," he says, "that this belief will survive this war. There are some indications that it has already finished or is finishing, and, if so, we shall sooner or later get concrete evidence of the fact. The German people will then think and feel about war and militarism as we think and feel about it; and, if they make themselves masters in their own house, the conditions contemplated by Prof. Murray, which are also those demanded by President Wilson, will be forthcoming, and peace will be possible."

INTERESTING news reaches us from America of the zeal and generosity with which the Unitarian churches are taking up their share of the burden of the war. At the October meeting of the Board of Directors of the American Unitarian Association it was resolved to make gifts of the publications of the Association and of The Christian Register to the various camps and cantonments. Arrangements were also made for the selection and publication of suitable pamphlets and bulletins to be issued as an Army and Navy Series. These pamphlets are intended to meet the special needs of the men in camps and on the ships. The President of the Association was also authorized to appoint volunteer chaplains for the camps.

THE contribution of Harvard University to the Allied cause is described in a special bulletin entitled 'Harvard in the War 1917.' With its classes for military instruction, its Base Hospital Units of which three are at present on active service in France, and departments for scientific research including psychological tests for aviators and submarine operators, the whole institution is teeming with practical effort. At present 5,429 Harvard men have enlisted in the army or some other form of national service, while 116 members of the teaching staff have either severed their connection with the University or obtained a leave of absence to devote their full time to war work for the government. One hundred others are engaged in some form of national service while conducting their regular courses of instruction at the University.

THE new regulation that all pamphlets and leaflets dealing with questions of war and peace must be passed by the censor before they are issued has aroused a great deal of criticism. This is due not to any desire to embarrass the Government, or to impede a policy of "thorough" in the prosecution of the war, but to a genuine belief that it is contrary to sound policy. Even the Times, though it sees only the hand of the pacifist and the political partizan in the objections which have been raised, acknowledges that our present system of censorship is quite unsuitable for this new task. The suggestion has been made that adequate control would be secured if it is made an offence to distribute any leaflet without depositing a copy at the censor's office. To this course we can see no possible objection.

IT is with very deep regret that we hear of the death of Mr. Charles Hawksley, which took place suddenly on Tuesday afternoon. We are not competent to speak of his eminence as a civil engineer. He had received the highest honours of his profession, and great weight was attached to his judgment. It is as an earnest-minded, religious man of boundless generosity that we remember him in this place. During his year of office as President of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association he became widely known in our churches, and he has left a fragrant memory of simplicity and unfailing kindness in many hearts. We must reserve a fuller memorial notice till next week.

THE publication last Tuesday of 'The Life and Letters of Stopford Brooke' by Dr. Jacks is a literary event of special interest to our readers and will stir many kindling memories. It is to a large extent a self-revelation in diaries and letters to his family and intimate friends. Among the family claimants to his gratitude Dr. Jacks says that the chief place must be given to his wife, "who has written out the whole text from my dictation, and suffered no word to pass unchallenged which, in her judgment, might leave a wrong impression on the reader's mind. It is to her that I would dedicate the book. Without her the biography of her father could not have been written by me."

THE VIOLENCE OF THE PEACEMAKER.

LAST week we called attention to two matters affecting the rights of the public and the liberty of the individual, which require grave consideration on the part of all thoughtful citizens. We did so in calm language, and we hope without any tinge of exaggeration. We had no desire to denounce anybody or to indulge in the angry vehemence which upsets the balance of judgment. To some people, and especially to many ardent lovers of peace, such restraint is strange and reprehensible, and they are inclined to attribute it to tepid convictions or a wavering loyalty to the principles of freedom. For them the warmer tones, which fall away so easily into the banalities of abuse, are natural and appropriate in order to express their distrust of persons and their dislike of policies, even at a time when our acute problems have little similarity to any which we have had to face before.

But for most of us it is quite impossible to view any aspect of our present duty out of relation to the dominating fact that the people of these realms are fighting against a crafty foe who desires to cripple and enslave them. A cheerful surrender of personal liberty in many directions is the condition of the common action needful for victory. There is no code of rules, no principle of abstract justice which can save us from the trouble of thinking out the problem of the rights and liberties of the individual, and the limits of wise action by the State, in the special circumstances in which we stand. Anarchy in speech and conduct, which is an element in the free conflict of intellects and wills in time of peace, may be fraught with terrible danger to the common safety and happiness amid the swift and critical decisions of war. But if we are to think, and to make our thinking contribute to the common stock of practical wisdom, which is a vital element in the fighting efficiency of our armies in the field, the disciplined strength of our people at home, and the attainment of a just and lasting peace, we must be careful to avoid the language of abuse or denunciation, which is nearly always an attempt to enlist prejudice on the side of weak argument.

It is for this reason that we dislike the habit, which is becoming very common in some quarters, of using the words "Prussian" and "Prussianism" in order to hold up restraints upon liberty to public contempt. Some of the temporary regulations to which we have to submit may be unwise as others are plainly necessary, but the slinging of epithets does not help us to decide in any special case between quiet acceptance and candid criticism. It cannot be pleaded that it is a justifiable method of summary argument, a kind of short-hand of reason, for its effectiveness depends upon the creation of a barrier of prejudice in the mind before the particular case has been examined. For the friends of freedom and peace to use weapons of this kind in public controversy is highly dangerous, for it robs their just criticisms of the attention which they deserve, and causes them to be neglected in the counsels of the wise as the complaints of men to whom dogmatism is more precious than large-minded concern for the public welfare. It is not by abusing the State, which after all is the creation of human wills and is good or bad according to the ideals by which it is inspired and controlled, that we shall guard the rights of the individual, but by a careful attempt to think out the reciprocal relations between public authority and private freedom at a time when national safety is gravely threatened, and in the new conditions which may arise after the war.

We have had a long and painful experience of the rhetoric of abuse in matters of religion. Nowhere else have men been so prone to mistake their own temper for the love of truth. It is only slowly that sharp conflicts of dogma, barbed with prejudice and personal misunderstanding and thriving mightily on angry watchwords, have given place to a desire to examine human conduct and belief in a reasonable spirit. Even now the victory is only partial. Belief without reticence or reserve, which makes no allowance for the light and shade of a particular situation, is still mistaken for deep conviction, and there are signs in some quarters that the positiveness which tries to browbeat an opponent and does not care to understand him is seeking to gain a new ascendancy. It is this spirit which must be banished from all our discussions in politics as well as in religion, if we are to disagree with charity and advance in the ways of peaceable friendship without the constant stings of irritation. At a time when excitement runs high, and weariness after long effort makes men quick in speech and impatient in temper, all the true friends of liberty must set a watch upon their lips and steadily refuse to seek relief for their feelings in words of abuse or despondency. We do no good even to ourselves, when we call a man "a Prussian" because he disagrees with us upon some difficult question of public policy. Besides, when we have recovered from our temper we know that it is not true. Even the peacemaker is not justified by the loftiness of his aims in using these methods of violence.

FIELD AMBULANCE NOTES.

By the Rev. Mortimer Rowe, R.A.M.C.

IX.—Out on Patrol.

They were truly as cheerful a couple of cases as ever walked down to a dressing station; and with good reason, for in each case the bullet had inflicted little more than a deep scratch—although, be it remembered, that a wound so slight is in general a cause for sad and bitter reflections, being so near a thing to good "Blighty" wound, and yet so far! Still, a few inches difference in the line of each bullet would have meant the loss of all smiles for at least a good while, so they were very jovial about the adventure, especially as they were the only casualties.

"'Ow did it 'appen? Oh, we was out on patrol, nine of us, and we'd just got as far as Fritz's barbed-wire, when suddenly we 'ears 'im shout—some blessed thing or other, I dunno—from a bit of an old "commy" (communication) trench we 'adn't no idea 'e was occupying now. So we flops down and keeps quiet, but 'is pals all comes running along—we could 'ear 'em—and 'e shouts again—needless to say none of us answers 'im back; then 'e puts up a Verey light, but evidently they couldn't spot a man of us, so 'e puts another up, and then another. 'Owever, they must 'ave thought we was there, for they starts shooting, and straight away I feels something 'ot on my neck, and my head gives a jump, and I knew I'd been 'it."

"So what did you do?"

"Me? 'About turn,' and crawls back towards our trench."

"Same with me," added the second; "in fact we was all beginning to think about how to get back—you see, we had 'is wire to cross when 'e spotted us, so it was all up for to-night anyway—then I gets this one like a hot poker across my shoulder-blade, so I 'about turns' too, and the rest comes along behind us, all expecting more bullets in our anatomies every second. 'Im and me just tumbles into the trench with a rush, nearly on top of the sentry. 'Password!' says 'e, would you believe it? with 'is baynit up, just as I fell over the parapet. 'Password be blowed!' says I, dropping very nearly on top of 'is chest; as if the fool could expect me to stop on the parapet and remember to say ''ampstead' at a time like that!"

"''Ampstead!' you idiot!" cheerfully remarked his friend, "it's 'Ighgate,' not ''Ampstead'—you'd 'ave looked well saying ''Ampstead!'"

"Blow me if you're not right, now I come to think of it!" he replied, unperturbed.

So we dressed their little wounds, and made them comfortable for the night, and in the morning took them off to the motor-ambulance and away—but not, alas! I fear, to journey as far as "Blighty."

X.—A City of Destruction.

Broken and shattered villages are amongst the commonest of sights in the broad belt of country behind the firing line. Some of them are sheer mounds of utter ruin on either side of a bare road; others retain a certain picturesqueness amongst the trees which once gave to them a special beauty of their own; and one which is often "mentioned in despatches" appeals particularly to my eye, for in spite of its battered and deserted state it still remains a little "city set on a hill, which cannot be hid," and even on many a cloudy day the sunshine seems to favour it and clothe its distant ruins with a mystic radiance. By borrowing a pair of field-glasses I have often (in imagination) climbed the slope behind it and wandered securely through its silent streets—a journey not yet permissible, I believe, in reality, "except on business."

But the first sight of a large town which has suffered a similar fate gives one a new thrill of interest and awe; and within a reasonable walking distance, when we are out of the trenches for a spell, is one of the most familiar of these. Crossing over a railway bridge one comes into full view of the handsome station, still complete in outline despite the shattering of its thousand panes of glass, but now untenanted and unused: tall weeds hiding the steel rails, green grass struggling everywhere between the paving-stones of the platforms, and a most indescribable air of desolation about the once bustling and busy scene. Words cannot utter it, a photograph would not reproduce it; perhaps an artist might convey it.

So one wanders thence into the city, which opens fan-wise in most pleasing fashion from the square before the station-front; along a boulevard of villas and gardens, whose centre is still littered with a tangle of red, rusty barbed wire; or down one of the narrower business streets; across the "Grand Place," imposing even yet, though so strangely silent and still. And although damage is everywhere apparent, yet now that the streets have been cleared and the city is to some little extent in use, the majority of the buildings look surprisingly whole—until one turns a corner and sees a sudden change, for here is the absolute wreckage of a noble Town Hall, the poor stump of its lofty tower and some fragments of its beautiful walls and doorways; yonder, a hundred yards further, the naked white walls of a vast cathedral church, rising bare from among mountainous heaps of stone. The heart of the city's deepest life—its civil and religious life—has been utterly broken by the merciless wrath of the guns. But with what interest one reads a report that a wealthy American city has decided to "adopt" this unfortunate city of France, and shoulder the task of its restoration to beauty and prosperity again in the days of peace!

CORRESPONDENCE.

AN INTERNATIONAL CHRISTIAN MEETING.

To the Editor of The Inquirer.

Sir,—In this time of deep and universal heart-searching many people are becoming increasingly convinced that neither arms nor politics can save civilisation from the risk of destruction, but that only the spirit of Christianity can bring healing to the world Since Christian people in this country are feeling this, we cannot but believe that their convictions must be shared by Christians in other lands. Is it possible to find a means by which such convictions can have expression? There has been some discussion lately of the possibility of holding an International Christian meeting, and an Interdenominational Council has been formed in this country with that object. The Council consists of men and women of very varied religious and political opinions. Their object is to promote a purely religious meeting which will discuss neither the causes of the war, nor the political conditions of peace, but which will demonstrate the true unity which even in the midst of this bitter conflict unites all Christians in allegiance to their common Master. It is thought that if belligerents and neutrals could meet in prayer together they might help to create the atmosphere which is essential if the Governments of the nations are to conclude and to preserve a just and lasting peace. The same thoughts seem to be stirring in other nations, for an invitation has just been received from Archbishop Söderblom of Sweden (a well-known leader, even before the war, in the cause of Christian unity) and Bishop Ostenfeld of Denmark, and Bishop Tandberg of Norway, to a Christian Conference at Upsala, on December 14, of belligerents and neutrals. We are grateful for the spirit shown by this invitation, but we fear that the time is too short to organise a Conference which would be really representative. The British Council hopes, however, to go on preparing the way for such a meeting, to be held whenever the right time may arrive, and we ask all Christians to join us in prayer for this object.

THE DISFRANCHISEMENT OF THE CONSCIENTIOUS OBJECTOR.

To the Editor of The Inquirer.

Sir,—The grave misgiving with which you view the triumph of logic over commonsense in the disfranchising of the conscientious objector is no doubt shared by many of your readers. Possibly, however, that may not trouble them as much as does the admission of the Home Secretary that these objectors, having been endowed by statute with the right to claim exemption from military service, could not fairly be penalised for exercising that right. Yet he pressed the amendment.

One is reminded of Bethmann Hollweg, who acknowledged that it was wrong to go to Belgium, and went. That gives cause for more serious feelings than misgiving at any failure in common-sense.

However, it is good to see you appreciate common-sense since common-sense tells us that the objectors are no worse citizens than Sinn Feiners, convicted criminals and profiteers who have the vote, that they are few in number, have proved their sincerity by suffering, and are not dangerous to the success of the war, or, if they are, that they can be kept in confinement without being exposed to useless suffering. The dignified paucity of your misgivings leads me to confine my remarks to the common-sense point of view.

BOOKS AND REVIEWS.

THE REMINISCENCES OF TAGORE.

MY REMINISCENCES. By Sir Rabindranath Tagore. London, Macmillan & Co. 7*s.* 6*d.* net.

SIR RABINDRANATH TAGORE is a mystic, an Oriental mystic. It is safe to say that for those who are impatient with either orientalism or with mysticism he is, and is likely to be, of small estimation. His very merits give offence. He is most desirous to understand not only the East, but also the West. He delights in taking in impressions from the Western nations, and particularly from Great Britain and from the United States of America. But he by no means falls down and worships those nations. Nor does he admire them for the solid reasons for which they are apt to admire themselves. Thus, Tagore is a mystic without being a recluse. His interest in Western civilisation must, in many cases, lose him the sympathy of the Eastern mystics, whilst his mysticism is a distinct hindrance to the warmth of his welcome by many of the British and American writers and readers. If an adjective is applied to him, he may be said to be "elusive." Yet it is possible to be attracted to Tagore, without being a mystic on the one hand or a prosaic scientist on the other. Perhaps the largest audience which Sir Rabindranath gathers together, either when he speaks or when he writes, is of the type which Dr. S. M. Crothers so delightfully describes in one of his essays in the volume, 'The Gentle Reader':—

"For myself, I like to have a general reception-room in my mind for all sorts of notions with which I desire to keep up only a calling acquaintance. But let them all be welcomed, good, bad and indifferent, in the spacious ante-chamber of my ignorance. But I am not able to invite them into my private apartments, for I am living in a small way in cramped quarters, where there is only room for my own convictions. There are many things that are interesting to hear about which I do not care to investigate. If one is willing to give me the result of his speculations on various esoteric doctrines I am ready to receive them in the spirit in which they are offered, but I should not think of examining them closely; it would be too much like looking a gift-horse in the mouth." So we readily feel interested in any speaker or writer who is simple and sincere; child, peasant, or the man of intellect who makes no pretensions to "unmitigated" knowledge, as Dr. Crothers so aptly describes one well-known type. Tagore claims to know "little more than we do." And yet he shares with us his wisdom gathered from the experience of life, as the courteous Spaniard, when we travel with him, abstains from eating unless he first asks the foreigner to share his food with him. Tagore confessed to a Japanese audience that people who see him with his grey beard and white hair and flowing Indian robe will insist that he is an old man, and give him "the higher seat," and show him all other marks of deference accordingly. But he disclaims any such honours, for he covets the distinction of child-likeness. "I am childish enough," he says, "to believe in things which the grown-up people of the modern age, with their superior wisdom, have become ashamed to own—and even schoolboys also. That is to say I believe in an ideal life. I believe that, in a little flower, there is a living power hidden in beauty which is more potent than a Maxim gun. I believe that in the birds' notes Nature expresses herself with a force which is greater than that revealed in the deafening roar of the cannonade—in fact, in 'the still small voice.'" Yet Tagore is no pacifist. He tells us that, in his view, the breaking up of the old ways is a matter for joy, not sorrow. "In Europe this war, which is robbing so many homes by death, is really the tearing off, on a vast scale, of the wrappings of dead habits of mind which have been cumulating for so many years only to smother the truth of our nation. The currents of life, which had become choked and stagnant, will once more become free to flow in fresh channels."

In both the East and in the West, Tagore sees that education might be a great reforming power. But to be effective it must be towards simplicity, not complexity of life. He is glad that he was brought up so that "many a trivial thing was for us (children) a rarity....what little we got we enjoyed to the utmost; from skin to core nothing was thrown away." He contrasts such training with that of the modern child who "nibbles at only half the things he gets." Many of his educational hints are as suggestive for the West as for the East. Whether home-work for the evening should be required from school-pupils receives at least an interesting comment when Tagore suggests "how fortunate the little birds are that their parents cannot light lamps of an evening. They have their language lessons early in the morning. How gleefully they learn them." "Of course," he adds with the Tagorean humour, "we must not forget that they have not to learn the English language." Those of us who remember the old type of text-book for Shakespeare in English, and for all the Latin and Greek authors, will side with Tagore when he says, "To employ an epic to teach language is like using a sword to shave with—sad for the sword, bad for the chin." As to rewards, Tagore is deprecatory. "There is no harm in making gifts to children, but they should not be rewards. It is not healthy for youngsters to be made self-conscious." In many respects, Tagore is an oriental Rousseau, but with the great difference that religion is throughout in the closest relation to life, for to Tagore religion is not "a fractional thing to be doled out ....it is the centre of gravity of life" for man and for child. Tagore, however, runs full tilt against some modern educationists when he argues that children should be introduced to what they understand and what they do not. Tagore's point is: "The child makes his own what he understands, while that which is beyond leads him on a step forward." Tagore could at any rate call in Charles Lamb on his side, for Lamb approved of turning the child out to browse on the books of a good library. Tagore is quite deliberate, and puts up a fight on the matter. "Children dwell in that primal paradise where men can come to know without fully comprehending each step ....If that (method) be barred, though the world's marketing may yet go on as usual, the open sea and the mountain top cease to be possible of access."

Illustrations could equally well be taken from Tagore to show his keen interest in other departments of social life besides education, in art, in politics, in social reform, in women's questions, in literature, and above all in religion. In self-revelation, Tagore is an oriental Montaigne. His sketches of his old tutors and teachers are quaint and genially humorous. His description of scenery in his own country and abroad show a real love of nature; forests and open fields are to him educational environment affecting character development, and he shows the effect of his father's taking him to live a few months under the Himalayas. But in a work varied in its details of spontaneous reminiscences over large shares of the earth, nothing is more remarkable than the revelations of child mind-activity, and lovers of children's minds should read this book. It suggests the coming of the time when education more in close contact with physical nature will be advocated by the combined thinkers of East and West. Tagore, on the whole, appeals to the class of "Gentle Readers." He is no self-conscious propagandist. No one need fear that he is endeavouring to convert his reader. In these 'Reminiscences' he is showing whomsoever may care to see them, from his portfolio of recollections, sketches of the mental inward light and colour of the incidents which spontaneously occur to his mind as having enlightened, enriched and intensified his personality. Not altogether unlike H. F. Amiel in his 'Journal Intime,' in his delicacy and charm of treatment of his inner life, he differs from Amiel, in his joyous, child-like outlook. Tagore is permeated with religious faith. In the background of all the gem-like sketches of incidents in his outward life, illuminated by the disclosure of the inner values of them to himself, much as he reveals, he finally declares: "I have not the power to disclose and display the supreme art with which the Guide of my life is joyfully leading me through all its obstacles, antagonisms and crookednesses, towards the fulfilment of its innermost meaning."

Very remarkable, on the whole, is the work of the translator of this volume. Tagore apparently left to him great freedom in the presentation of his work written in his vernacular. The result is wonderfully good, though sometimes we are not sure whether the exact wording is Tagore's or the translator's. But evidently both writer and translator are in fullest sympathy. MEMORIAL NOTICE.

LIEUT. S. F. JACKSON.

WE regret to announce that Lieut. S. F. Jackson, West Yorks Regiment, was killed in action on November 17, 1917. He was 35 years of age. He had been in the army ever since August, 1914, and had spent, in all, two years of that time at the front, first as private, and then as officer, being very popular with his men. He was the fourth son of Mr. and Mrs. G. W. Jackson, and, like all his brothers and sisters, had attended Mill Hill Chapel since early childhood, they being at least the fourth generation of the family to do so. He was educated at Leeds Grammar School, and in civil life was on the staff of the Leeds Branch of the Commercial Union Assurance Co. Two of his brothers are also in the Army. At morning service on November 25th, the preacher (Col. Bullock) paid an appropriate tribute to Lieut. Jackson's memory, and, in honour of the deceased officer, the anthem 'What would we give to our beloved?' was sung, while a Funeral March was played at the close of the service.

WEEKLY NOTES.

A NEW source of revenue has been found this week by a subscriber "Olwen," who has collected and sold waste paper and so realised ten and sixpence—I hope others may follow her example. I have had a letter from a nurse this week asking for more jig-saw puzzles; she says the men in her wards like them so much and keep asking her when she will have more. I should be very glad of some to send her. I should also be glad of more strong calico bags, 2 ft. by 3 ft., with a draw string.

Miss Grace Holmes returned to Calais this week (after being at home for a holiday), to continue her work at our Hut. I fear her life there this winter will not be at all comfortable, with shortage of coal and of food, and a good chance of air raids. Still, she very pluckily wants to do her bit. She is doing a really useful piece of work, and I know the men appreciate warmly her kindly and self-sacrificing interest in them. ROSE ALLEN.

SPECIAL WANTS.

Pyjamas, shirts, socks, and all sorts of men's underclothing.
Mufflers, cardigans, slippers.
Clothing for women and children.
Games, jig-saw puzzles.

The name and address of sender and list of contents should be enclosed in each parcel.

Contributions of money and clothing should be sent to Mrs. Bernard Allen, 14 Gainsborough Gardens, Hampstead, N.W.3.

GENERAL CONFERENCE OF UNITARIAN CHURCHES AT MONTREAL.

REPORTS of the General Conference of the Unitarian Churches held at Montreal at the end of September have now come to hand. We are indebted to Word and Work for the following account of the proceedings.

The Conference was a most significant one if only because it was the first meeting of the organisation to be held outside the United States. It was further peculiarly interesting because of the opportunity given at Montreal for the celebration of the One Hundred Years of Peace between the United States and Great Britain. A summary of the accomplishments of the Conference is not easy, because the main thing was the development of the spirit of courage and confidence and the drawing together of the bonds of fellowship and goodwill. By an overwhelming vote the Conference put itself squarely and emphatically behind the national administration in the conduct of a necessary and righteous war. A judicious and promising plan for the future conduct of the Christian Register was adopted, and hearty support pledged to the paper under its proposed new administration. Canadian interests naturally received much attention, and the American delegates learned a good deal from the experience of Canada during the last three years. Much valuable information was acquired in regard to the safeguarding of soldiers and sailors, the suppression of the liquor traffic and of vice, and the care of the wounded and convalescent. Important amendments were adopted in the rules for guiding the work of the Fellowship Committee of the Conference, which may well result in the more adequate protection of our ministry and churches from ministerial adventurers. Amendments to the Constitution of the Conference itself were also adopted, and the officers of the Conference were made voting members of the Council. The delegates received a new lesson in the value of beauty and order in the service of worship. Among many vitally interesting meetings, two particularly stood out. These were the vesper services held in the beautiful Church of the Messiah. At one of these the Conference Sermon was preached by Dr. Peabody; at the other the Tablet given by the American delegates to the Church of the Messiah was unveiled, with an address by Dr. Eliot and a response by the President of the Montreal Church. These meetings owed much of their impressiveness to the beauty of the surroundings, the appropriateness of the music, and the dignity of the service. The outstanding personalities at the Conference were those of the President, Mr. Taft, and of the Chairman of the Council, Mr. Holmes. Mr. Holmes's sermons on the Sunday preceding the Conference were of marked value. Mr. Taft's forcible addresses were listened to by great audiences, and vigorously expressed the principles and hopes which animate the Unitarian fellowship in these critical times. These two leaders differed absolutely in their convictions, and Mr. Taft was justified in feeling that the report of the Council, read by Mr. Holmes, did not represent the convictions and purposes of the Unitarian body. It was repudiated, as stated above, by an overwhelming vote, and the resolution offered by Mr. Taft adopted. During the discussion of the resolution the feeling was tense and the debate animated. It should be said, however, that Unitarians exercised their customary self-control. Not one word was said which anyone needs to regret. The opposing speakers did not deal in personalities but with principles. Complete courtesy was shown to the members of the minority, and they were given entire freedom of speech. There was ample evidence of the spirit of unity beneath diversity of judgment. The Unitarian people again demonstrated the reality of their belief in freedom, their tolerant goodwill toward even a very small minority, and their capacity to reach a practically unanimous and ardently patriotic decision.

THE UNITARIAN CLUB OF BOSTON.

THE Boston Unitarian Club, says The Christian Register, began its meetings for the season on Wednesday evening, October 10, at the Hotel Somerset. Echoes of the Montreal Conference furnished the themes of the speakers, coupled with the thought of the forward look for the denomination. President George H. Ellis introduced as the first speaker the newly elected Chairman of the Council of the General Conference, the Rev. Dr. Paul Revere Frothingham, who regretted that he could not, like Burton Holmes, show moving pictures of some of the incidents, amusing or thrilling, of the Conference. "I am sure you would be thrilled," he said, "if I could throw upon the screen the climax of the whole Conference, which came at the beginning of the session and cleared the air for many of us, and I think for the denomination itself—if I could show you our ex-President, Mr. Taft, leading that great gathering and insisting that this terrible business must be seen through."

Dr. Frothingham touched on the past history of the Conference, referring to the steps by which it had gone farther and farther afield until two years ago it reached the Pacific Coast. "But it was a greater step still," he said, "to go outside the United States. And what a time it was to go outside our own territory! A Montreal friend of mine, a prominent physician, told me that last summer, while motoring through Vermont to Massachusetts, as he would stop for luncheon and leave his car, some New England farmer would approach, and, seeing the insignia on his car, would say, 'You live in Canada?' The doctor would reply 'Yes,' whereupon a great horny hand would reach out and the old man would say: 'Grip! There's no line any longer between your country and mine!'

"Some of us have been working for years to develop this international spirit, to get countries working together and to feel that they had a common cause for humanity; and now, before we know it, a League of Nations has been formed, by which, as Mr. Wilson has said, four-fifths of the people of this world are united—for what? Not to crush a people, but to crush a system, and to establish in this world enduring peace. Now, thank God, we are united by the closest kind of bonds, so that the peace is going to be kept not only between our countries, but eventually between all countries, because of this great and holy alliance."

Dr. Francis G. Peabody spoke enthusiastically of the fine spirit prevailing in the Conference, especially as reflected in connection with the exciting episode of the opening session. "There was not a word spoken," he said, "in that great tension and excitement which was not praiseworthy; and the little group who dissented from the opinion of the vast majority expressed themselves in their turn in a noble, self-abnegating manner. The whole matter passed off in a way which made us all proud of our brethren and confident of our future."

HISTORICAL JUBILEE PAGEANT OF LIBERAL RELIGION IN CAPE TOWN.

A FEW words about our Jubilee Pageant may be of interest to members and secretaries of our churches and Sunday schools in Great Britain. The Pageant is likely to be of much greater educational and artistic value than the bioscope. The latter is simply pictorial, but the pageant requires much preliminary thought and study of history, biography, social and political life, and religion. It requires also intelligent and sustained co-operation on the part of those who undertake its presentation as well as some training in dramatic and artistic taste and ability. Yet there is no reason why every school, church, village, town, county, and nation should not have its annual pageant.

We were fortunate in having in our Church a member of the Municipal Orchestra, Mr. W. J. Pickerill, who kindly composed the whole of the music for the Pageant and acted as musical conductor. The motif of the musical prelude was the struggles and triumph of Liberal Religion. Miss Pauline Benning, representing the Muse of History, recited the versified Prologue. The scenes and tableaux which aroused the greatest interest and enthusiasm were those of the trial and condemnation of Servetus by the ecclesiastical council of Geneva, the arrest of John Biddle at a private meeting for worship, a short scene from Milton's 'Comus,' ending with a beautifully arranged dance, the reception of Dr. Priestley at the house of Theophilus Lindsey after the Birmingham riots, and Milton's recital of the sonnet on his blindness; Sir Isaac Newton and John Locke (tableau), John Pounds and his Ragged School (tableau), and Florence Nightingale in the hospitals in the Crimea (tableau). Every detail, from wigs and costumes down to the buckles on our shoes, was in keeping with the period represented, and added effectively to the artistic effect of the various scenes. The second half of the programme consisted of poems, songs, and selections from the works of Charles Lamb, Wm. Lloyd Garrison, James Russell Lowell, Sarah Flower Adams, Emerson, Longfellow, Oliver Wendell Holmes, Dr. Martineau, Joseph Chamberlain, Melt Brink (the Africander poet, and for many years our Treasurer), Wm. Porter, the Rev. J. J. Kotzé, and the Rev. D. P. Faure. Unfortunately, the programme as arranged was too long, and several items had to be omitted. The Pageant was a great success in every way and many people had to be turned away from the doors. We were greatly indebted to Miss Hermann for her effective stage management and for the many weeks of preliminary training.

On Saturday, August 4, the fiftieth anniversary of the founding of the Church, a party of members paid a visit to the Maitland Cemetery to place flowers on the grave of the Rev. D. P. Faure, the founder of the Church. The Rev. R. Balmforth gave a short address. On Sunday, Aug. 12, the Anniversary Service was held, and messages of greeting, congratulation, and goodwill were read from Dr. J. Estlin Carpenter and the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie, the President and Secretary of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, the Rev. W. G. Tarrant, of London, and the Rev. R. J. Hall, of Durban. I shall be glad to send a programme of the Pageant to any Church Committee which cares to go and do likewise

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Bury.—The December Calendar of Bank Street Chapel announces that 'Conferences of delegates from three neighbouring associations (viz., Manchester District Association of Presbyterian and Unitarian Churches, the North and East Lancashire Unitarian Mission, and the East Cheshire Christian Union), have been held in Manchester, in September, October, and November of this year, to discuss the question of stimulating, strengthening, and enhancing the religious life of our congregations. It was ultimately decided to organise a series of exchanges, and for this purpose all the churches have been divided into groups, each group consisting of four or five churches. The suggestion is that one group should exchange with another group. Thus it is proposed that our group, which consists of Ainsworth, Bank Street, Bury, Chesham, and Stand, should exchange with Ashton-under-Lyne, Mossley, Mottram, and Stalybridge. Ministers and lay speakers from our group will hold an evening meeting on Saturday, January 19, 1918, at a centre fixed by the group to be visited, e.g., Ashton, or some other place. On Sunday, January 20, our ministers will preach in their chapels, and their ministers will preach in ours. On Saturday, February 16, a return visit will be paid by ministers and lay speakers from the East Cheshire group, who will speak at an Evening Meeting at Bank Street Schools, Bury; and their ministers will again preach Special Sermons in our chapels—our ministers preaching in their pulpits—on Sunday, February 17. It is suggested that the Saturday Evening Meeting in February be held at 6.30 P.M., and be finished at 8 o'clock, to be followed by refreshments, and a short Social Meeting, if provisions are possible. All expenses of printing, advertising, and travelling in connection with these meetings are kindly defrayed by the British and Foreign Unitarian Association."

Chester.—The 217th anniversary of the founding of Matthew Henry's Chapel was celebrated on Sunday, November 18. The Rev. D. Jenkin Evans conducted both services, while the preacher was Lieut.-Col. C. Seymour Bullock, Ottawa. In the morning the preacher spoke on 'Things that remain, the Unshaken Things of the War days'; and in the evening his subject was 'Where no Vision is, the People Perish.' There were large congregations. The collections were for the Mayoress of Chester's "Prisoners of War Fund," and amounted to £5.

Ipswich.—The annual meeting of the congregation of the Friars Street Church, Ipswich, was held on Thursday evening, November 22, in the hall attached to the chapel, under the chairmanship of Mr G. J. Notcutt. The secretary, Miss Jellie, read the annual report, which stated that the church had held its own during the past year in a difficult time, and paid a tribute to the value of the ministrations of the Rev. J. W. Saunders, M.A., the pastor, and to Mrs. Saunders. Allusion was made to the recent death of the Rev. Lucking Tavener, a former pastor. The accounts of the church were laid before the meeting by the warden and treasurer, Mr. R. Hamblin, and showed an improvement of the position on the revenue account of some £14, and a reduction of indebtedness by £33, as well as increased offertories. A report was presented by Mr A. J. Hamblin on the proceedings of the Literary and Social Guild, and by the Rev. J. W. Saunders on the Sunday school. All the reports were agreed to, the Chairman remarking on their encouraging character. The committee and officers were re-elected, with thanks for past services, and thanks were voted to the choir and teachers. During the meeting feeling reference was made by Mr. Saunders and the Chairman to a recent and serious seizure suffered by Mrs. Ward, one of the oldest members of the congregation, and to the promotion by Mr. Saunders of a Young People's Church, to meet the needs of the younger members of families in the congregation.

Liverpool: Ullet Road Church.—The Rev. J. C. Odgers, preaching on Sunday, November 25, paid an affectionate tribute to Captain E. Stanley Russell, formerly assistant minister to the Church, who was killed in Palestine on November 6. They had had, he said, the happy experience of his charm and loveableness, his varied abilities and accomplishments, the many inspiring ways in which he had attached himself to the persons and activities of the church. The preacher took as his text "Greater love hath no man than this, that a man lay down his life for his friends," but, he said, he took it with diffidence. How should one venture to speak on that great theme who had not himself ascended to those heights of sacrifice, to whom the call to forsake all of life for right and freedom and justice had not come? How can those in security and comfort at home, unable to compass either in knowledge or imagination the dread reality of that experience, essay a tribute of praise to the great deeds they have not themselves done, the great sufferings they have not shared? Only in humble though high admiration could he speak of those who went forth to tread that path, animated by the greatness of their cause to a degree of intensity which made them forget self, forget all that life and youth promised; and so greatly and willingly died. Beside Stanley Russell the preacher placed his comrades whose names were on their Roll of Honour: seven heroes gone out from their midst, who had sealed, like him, their ideals with their lives. And of all the others of their number who were still immersed in the struggle, as well as of that other minister of theirs, Lieut. Harman Taylor, now starting out on his fine task of bringing skill and tenderness and comfort to the wounded, the preacher spoke words of loving remembrance. In the roll of heroism he included those who had given their best and stayed behind to endure and work, as well as those who had gone. He denied the apparent waste of the noblest things that some saw here; surely God was as careful an economist in souls as He was in atoms. The greater the promise of the life taken, the greater the hope of the continuance and fruition of that promise. The preacher spoke fine and comforting words of the unconquered power of Love. "If there were no other bridge across the river of death Love alone would be able to bridge it."

Manchester: Pendleton.—A very successful re-union meeting was held on Saturday, November 17, for the purpose of unveiling the portraits of Mr. J. Wigley, J.P., and the late Councillor J. Milner. Mr. E. Robertson presided, and in testifying to the splendid services both friends had rendered to the church and Sunday school, explained that the decision of the members and friends was taken before the recent death of Mr. Milner. The unveiling ceremony was performed by Mr. T. Fletcher Robinson, who for the last twenty years had been associated with Mr. Wigley and Mr. Milner in their work at Pendleton. Mr. Robinson said Mr. Milner had been a member of the congregation since the opening of the church in 1874, under the ministry of the Rev. J. McDowell, and remained an active member until his death last June. He early became morning Superintendent of the Sunday school and held this office for thirty-five years, resigning in 1909. He was a staunch supporter of the Temperance cause and had been an influential member of the Independent Order of Rechabites, as well as of the Band of Hope movement. He worked hard in North Salford for the liberal cause. He was a convert from Wesleyanism to Unitarianism in 1874 and was always a courageous advocate of his new religious faith. By his bright and jovial disposition, and his love for the children, he had endeared himself to all, and his example was an abiding influence for good. Mr. Wigley becam a convert to Unitarianism from Congregationalism in 1871 and joined the Strangeways Unitarian Free Church during the Rev. Brooke Herford's ministry. In 1882 he joined the Pendleton Church and school, and at once took up important work for both institutions, having been prominently associated with the work of the church and school and all the efforts to enlarge the buildings and clear the property from debt. He early became the afternoon Superintendent of the Sunday school and still held that position. He was chairman of the Church Committee for eight years. Mr. Wigley's strenuous work, and the high ideals he had maintained, had been an inspiring example throughout these long years to all connected with the church and school. Whilst doing this valuable work at Pendleton he had devoted himself to the general interests of our denomination, and had held the Presidency of the Manchester District Association of Presbyterian and Unitarian Churches; The Provincial Assembly of Lancashire and Cheshire; The Manchester District Sunday School Association; Manchester Sunday School Union. No other layman of our denomination had preached for so long and so acceptably, and for so many of our churches, helping our Sunday schools by addresses and by lessons to adult classes throughout the district. Apart from his work in our own churches, Mr. Wigley has been a leader in the social and political welfare work in the borough, and his services have been recognised this year by his appointment to the bench of magistrates. "Well read and of conspicuous ability," the Chairman said in conclusion, "he has worked strenuously to elevate the lives of all with whom he came in contact, and I am certain there is no other man in our ranks to-day who is so well known and has had so great an influence for good in our churches and Sunday schools. The members in presenting his portrait desire to testify their affection, and their appreciation of Mr. Wigley and his good work, and earnestly hope that he may be long spared to continue his influence for good."

Nottingham.—Under the leadership of the Rev. J. C. Ballantyne, Nottingham held a Flag Day on November 10 for the Armenian refugees (Lord Mayor's) Fund. The next day there were special sermons and collections in the various churches. £250 was raised. The collection at the High Pavement Chapel amounted to £30. The members of the congregation ran three stands, and in various other ways contributed greatly to the success of the effort.

Oldbury: Midland Guilds Union.—The second meeting of the Union for the present session was held at Oldbury on November 17. Five of the constituent Guilds were represented. After tea, provided by the Oldbury friends, an address was given by the Rev. Stanley Mossop on 'The Church and Kingdom of God.' Others taking part in the Conference were Miss Twist, Mr. H. Crabtree, and the Revs. H. C. Hawkins, A. H. Lewis, W. G. Topping, and H. Warnock. A vote of thanks to Mr. Mossop for his paper and to the Oldbury Guild for their hospitality concluded the proceedings.

Walsall.—Special services were held on Sunday last in connection with the Ninetieth Anniversary of the opening of the Unitarian Church. Many old scholars and past members were present, and letters had been received from others who were unable to attend. The Rev. H. Warnock conducted both services, which were well attended despite very inclement weather. At the Anniversary Meeting on Monday night the Rev. Lawrence Clare, of Birmingham, gave an impressive address on 'Religion in the Home,' which was much appreciated. The Anniversary was a success in every way, and the collections were higher than those of any recent year.

THE Memorial Tablet to the late Dr. Stopford Brooke which has been placed in Rosslyn Hill Chapel, Hampstead, will be unveiled on Sunday morning, December 9, by Dr. L. P. Jacks. The service, which will be at 11 o'clock, will be conducted by the Rev. Henry Gow.

THE Fifth Report of the Emergency Committee convened by the Society of Friends to aid innocent "alien enemies" in Great Britain rendered destitute by the war, records another year of active work carried on in conjunction with a similar committee, of which Dr. Elizabeth Rotten is the secretary, in Berlin. Over 5,000 cases of need have been dealt with in London alone, 640 having been added to the list during the past year; there are 17 local committees in Great Britain connected directly with the central committee, and Friends' Emergency Committees are doing work of the same kind in Ireland and Australia. Both the English and German committees have been able to do something to alleviate the lot of military prisoners in the respective countries, though their main object is to aid civilian sufferers, and in this country the chief military Prisoners' Camps have been visited. Country Homes for children and a Rest Home for women have also been provided and the Clothing Room distributes a quantity of boots and garments.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

The address for our Belgian Hospital Fund, to which cheques and parcels of clothing should be sent, is Mrs. Bernard Allen, 14 Gainsborough Gardens, Hampstead, N.W.3.

PRESIDENT WILSON has once again given noble expression to the immediate duties and the ultimate aims of the Allies. The phrasing and the particular angle of vision are his own, but the aims are common to us all. The war, he says, is one into which the American people have been forced in order to save the very institutions under which they live from corruption and destruction. Safety would be at an end and honour for ever sullied and brought into contempt were they to permit the triumph of the Central Powers. But the cause being just and holy, the settlement must be of like motive and quality. "For this we can fight, but for nothing less noble or less worthy of our traditions. For this cause we entered the war, and for this cause will we battle until the last gun is fired."

IN the course of his speech Mr. Wilson made two things quite clear. He will make no terms whatever with the idea of a peace by compromise. The issues at stake go too deep for any such thought to be tolerable. He knows that we must pay the full price of victory before we can have the peace which we desire. But he is equally emphatic that the peace for which we strive must have in it no elements of injustice or needless bitterness. "We intend no wrong against the German Empire, no interference with her internal affairs. We should deem either the one or the other absolutely unjustifiable, absolutely contrary to the principles we have professed to live by and to hold most sacred throughout our life as a nation....No one is threatening the existence, or the independence, or the peaceful enterprise of the German Empire."

IT is clear that Mr. Wilson clings still to his belief that a policy of openness and candour may succeed in detaching a large mass of peaceful German citizens from their militarist government. It is not easy to see upon what evidence this belief is based, apart from some abstract theory of the goodness of human nature; but it is well in all our propaganda to act on the assumption that it may be true, provided always that we do not set our hopes too high. Mr. Wilson faces the possibility quite frankly that after the war political conditions in Germany may make it impossible for us to admit her to the partnership of nations and force us to withhold free economic intercourse. "But there would be no aggression in that, and such a situation, inevitable because of distrust, would in the very nature of things sooner or later cure itself by processes which would assuredly set in."

IT is well for us to listen to these words, and to extract from them for our own use the last ounce of heartening idealism which they contain. But we could not do America a greater disservice than to speak of her as standing on a different moral plane from her Allies. Mr. Wilson speaks with the glow and enthusiasm of a man who has just set his hand to a gigantic task and is summoning all the moral forces of the nation to his aid. He stands where we did in 1914, and he has this signal advantage that he has been a close observer of the difficulties and mistakes of the intervening years. If we do not strike the resonant note of lofty principle quite as often as we did, it is because we fear the effect of mere repetition, and because our faith is pouring itself into the daily task, helping us to meet the staggering blows of war, to keep our hearts undismayed by sorrow or fear, and to bear the long strain without one thought of yielding. But that first vision of justice and freedom and of a duty laid upon us by God, is with us still as the secret of our strength. How grateful we are to President Wilson for closing his great speech with the appeal of religion. "The hand of God is laid upon the nations. He will show them favour, I devoutly believe, only if they rise to the clear heights of His own justice and mercy."

* * *

WHEN we wrote last week it seemed likely that a satisfactory compromise on the new regulation establishing a censorship of pamphlets and leaflets might be accepted by the Government. We regret that so far this has not taken place. It is most desirable that the War Cabinet should take the House of Commons a little more into its confidence on the matter and explain why they believe this grave infringement of the liberty of printing has become necessary. A meeting of members of Parliament and others specially interested in the question was held on Monday, when the following resolution was passed:—"That the meeting expresses its disapproval of the Order under the Defence of the Realm Act requiring leaflets to be submitted to the censor before publication or distribution, and protests against—(1) Any requirement that matter should be submitted to the censor before publication or distribution; (2) The practice of seizing and destroying papers and property without a previous judicial condemnation, and calls upon the Government to withdraw the regulation in question." Mr. R. D. Holt, M.P., was one of the conveners of the meeting, and Mr. R. M. Montgomery, K.C., Chairman of the Committee of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, was one of those specially invited to be present.

THE article on Zionism by Mr. C. G. Montefiore, which we published a fortnight ago, has attracted a good deal of public attention. To-day we are able to present the other side of the case in the form of a verbatim report of the address by the Chief Rabbi (Dr. Hertz) at the Zionist demonstration last Sunday, which he has courteously sent us for publication. Mr. Montefiore's line of argument appeals to us strongly, and it seems to us more in accordance with the liberal tendencies of the modern world than the aspirations of Zionism. But we are very glad to have the opportunity of hearing both sides and presenting our readers with materials for forming a reasonable judgment on a question of extraordinary interest. We consider ourselves very fortunate in being able to enlist the help of two writers of such high authority as the Chief Rabbi and Mr. Montefiore for the purpose.

THE war is taking a terrible toll of the membership of our churches. Week after week we have to record that young men bearing honoured names or some of the splendid boys in our Sunday schools, deeply loved in their own locality, have met a soldier's death. We do not grieve for them beyond the natural tribute of tears, or wish for a moment that they had stayed behind. Not till the war has become a memory shall we know how much they have helped to restore simplicity and directness to religion, and to keep our standards of duty high. To the homes, which have lost their bodily presence, only to keep them with unquenchable pride in the heart, we would express the sympathy and affection which spring from our common faith in God.

IT is announced that a Free Catholic Conference will be held on January 7-10, 1918, presumably with the object of giving greater definiteness to the movement and enlisting public interest in its aims. We need hardly say in this place that we have the deepest interest in every scheme of Christian comprehension. It is a cause to which THE INQUIRER and many of the noblest minds in the movement which sustains its life have long been pledged. The difficulties that beset the new movement are fairly obvious. It is easy to sacrifice breadth and charity on the altar of definition, or to mistake a temperamental preference for a certain type of worship for an essential demand of the Christian spirit. The fact that the Conference is to meet in the Old Meeting Church, Birmingham, with its Puritan ancestry, its manifold links of sympathy with every phase of liberal Christianity, and its particular and inalienable associations with our own religious movement, should protect it from these common forms of mistake. The secret of comprehension is to be found in no formula, for it is within, where the charity of Jesus Christ has fixed it for ever, in the affections and loyalties of the heart.

WE heard this week of a copy of the INQUIRER which took nine months to reach its destination. It was sent to one of our boys in France, followed him to Salonika, Egypt and India, and was finally delivered to him at Baghdad. A good many copies find their way into the trenches and the camps abroad. We should be glad if more of our readers would forward their copies to the boys in the Army from their own Church or Sunday School, or, better still, buy other copies for the purpose.

THE BIOGRAPHY OF STOPFORD BROOKE.

WE cannot begin to write about this fascinating book without congratulating Dr. Jacks first of all upon the masterly way in which he has accomplished his task. He has given us a noble essay in spiritual portraiture, steeped in an atmosphere of haunting loveliness. It has upon it the marks of close intimacy and revealing affection, and a nature like Brooke's cannot be described in any other way. For the man who passes his days on the stage of great affairs, bringing the whole weight of his personal judgment to the guidance of public policy, a more objective method may be wise; but much of the charm of this biography would be gone without the family interiors and the glancing light of casual remarks and changing moods, which only love can understand. In saying this we do not mean to imply that it suffers from fatiguing eulogy. Dr. Jacks is too good a literary artist, and his sense of humour is too keen for him to fall into that familiar trap. He is the strong, clear-eyed interpreter, whose insight gains in truth because his judgment is guided by affection. He has had the courage to allow Brooke to reveal himself even in his most candid moments, when the exhausting joy of life fell back into weariness or the spectres of the mind fled at the breaking of the day.

It is tempting to linger over the pages consecrated to the love of beauty, for it was as poet and artist that Brooke did most for his generation. It lives in his preaching no less than in his books. In his hands it was the master-key to the deepest secrets of life and religion; for to him Beauty and Love, as they exist in the mind of God and the fairness of His creation, are hardly to be distinguished. But few who felt the power of this note in his preaching can have realised before how rich were the stores of close observation and passionate joy laid up in his own heart. His observation was as keen as that of Tennyson. In lyrical joyousness he resembles Shelley. In imaginative vision he stood with Turner, whom of all painters he loved the best. His lasting service to religion is to be sought in this interweaving of the moods of Nature with all the passions of the human soul. Great as was the help which he gave to many people by placing the Christian story with its strange redemptive power in a new setting of human simplicity and appealing love, he was there one among the gifted teachers of his age, speaking a message which might be heard from other lips, though the light and colour were all his own. But as an interpreter of nature, for whom rushing waters and storm-driven clouds and the loneliness of the hills were full of the life of God, he walked alone. It is true that he owed much to Wordsworth, but Wordsworth had not the power of speaking of these things to listening crowds of men and linking them in closest intimacy with the emotions of Christian worship. It is for this realm, so fresh and untrodden, that the hearts of men are athirst, in the hurrying streets and beneath the leaden skies of great cities, though often unconscious of the reason of their discontent with many current forms of religion. In Brooke's letters and diaries they will find a new scripture of the religion of nature. For some men it may be pitched in too high a key. We are carried away into the wonderland where myths are woven into the living garment of faith, and the nymphs of the fountain and the glade whisper strange secrets to men.

> How the trees must love the wind! [he writes]. They cannot move from their place, they are bound to their neighbours for their lives; they are like monks in a convent, inevitably fixed and hampered. But the wind is the free Bohemian of the Universe, who goes over all the earth, and from north and south, east and west, from tropic to pole and from pole to tropic, it brings to the trees all the news of all the continents and isles of ocean, and of all the life of men and beasts. Every wood is educated by it, and half the music of the trees is made up of gratitude and of joy for all they hear.

This is the vision and language of a poet. But there is something in it which the plain man, who is in tune with the life of the world, can take with him into the worship of God.

From this close communion with nature we must turn for a moment to the human surroundings in which Brooke's life was passed, and especially to his position as a public teacher of religion. No man ever bore fewer of the marks of his profession. Devoted as he was to the work of a preacher he had no love of clerical society. During his ministry in the Church of England, and after his secession, it was a mere accident if any of his friends happened to be preachers too. From the discussions on doctrine and ceremony which occupy and often degrade the clerical mind he held entirely aloof. For this reason his withdrawal from the Church of England left no scar. It marked a stage in the natural development of his own personality and it cost him little struggle. There is an occasional note of wistfulness in the Diary, but never with any feeling of real regret, as in the following passage written in 1907 :—

> I listened [as I stood] outside the church to the hymns—emblem of my position in the religious world of England....But I, as I read the papers, and see that the Church has learnt nothing, but still goes on talking of certain debatable doctrines as realities, and persuading their world that these inventions are celestial truths, and not the mere rags of the lies they were of old, when alive and bold they were the tyrants of mankind —I wonder if men will ever, or can ever, on this earth, distinguish death from life, lies from truth, and the things that endure from those that perish. And I don't regret that I am out of it all, free as the wind on a mountain moor and as alone.

On the subject of veracity Brooke felt strongly. No falsity of position could be made possible to him by unreal compromises. "Theologically," Dr. Jacks writes, "he had abandoned the particular doctrine of the Incarnation on which the Church of England is founded, holding it in a universal form which could not be accommodated to the formularies he had subscribed. Morally his position admitted of a very simple definition—that of a man who week by week publicly declares that he believes what he does not believe; and it is no exaggeration to say that he found the position at this point positively hateful. He was well acquainted with all that had been said and written about the ethics of subscription; but he had a horror of sophistry, and was not the man to balance his soul on a pin-point of logic. He required a broad basis of plain rectitude, veracity, and common sense." It was perhaps natural that the warmest tributes to the significance of his action came to him from laymen. Except for some momentary excitement it made little impression upon the stolid clerical mind of the Church of England, but, as Dr. Jacks observes, "we shall get a truer measure of Brooke's action if we look away from its ecclesiastical bearings and consider it as an event in the moral history of the times." On his own character and influence the effect was as beautiful as it was profound. The surrender of moulds of thought, which the living mind had outgrown, resolved some spiritual discords, and with inward harmony gave him new power of helping men.

It is one of the virtues of this biography that there is so little about it which suggests the tiresome duty of imitation. It is not for that purpose that the strong sons of God are sent to dwell among us. Even the Christian disciple, who makes more of copying the example of Christ than of finding some new expression of his spirit, may miss the chief glory of being alive. Brooke helped to mould the life of his time because he was like nobody else and walked joyously in paths of love and power where we cannot follow. No one who ever heard his voice or grasped his hand can forget the virtue that went out of him to make us glad. These volumes enshrine his influence and do much to explain its secret. Wise men will not be content to read them rapidly and put them aside. They should be placed where they can be used for the soul's help in days of dejection and drought, for they have in them the music of living waters, the colour of noble passion, and the peace of a strong soul at rest in God.

ZIONISM.

ADDRESS BY THE CHIEF RABBI.

The Chief Rabbi (Dr. J. H. Hertz) has kindly sent us a verbatim report of the speech which he made at the Zionist Demonstration last Sunday. Lord Rothschild was in the chair; and the other speakers included Lord Robert Cecil, Mr. Herbert Samuel, and Mr. I. Zangwill.

The Chief Rabbi spoke as follows:—The epoch-making declaration of H.M. Government on Palestine is an assurance given by the mightiest of Empires that the new order which the Allies are now creating at such sacrifice of life and treasure shall be rooted in righteousness, and broad-based on the liberty of, and reverence for, every oppressed nationality. It is a solemn pledge that the oldest of national tragedies shall be ended in the coming readjustment of the nations which shall console mankind for the slaughter and waste and torment of this terrible world-war.

In the face of an event of such infinite importance to the Jewsih people, ordinary words of appreciation or the usual phrases of gratitude are hopelessly weak and inadequate. For the interpretation of our true feelings to-day we must turn to Scripture. Twenty-five hundred years ago Cyrus issued his edict of liberation to the Jewish exiles in Babylon, and an eye-witness of that glorious day has left us in the 126th Psalm a record of how our fathers received the announcement of their deliverance. They could scarcely believe the news. "When the Lord brought back those that returned to Zion we were like unto them that dream. Then said they among the nations: 'The Lord hath done great things unto these.' The Lord hath done great things unto us, whereof we are glad." Ours is a similar feeling of joy and wonder. With us likewise it is the astonishment of the nations, the reassuring approbation of statesmen and rulers that causes us to exclaim: "We will see it done, and done consummately, the thing so many have thought could never be done!"

The spirit of the Declaration is that of absolute justice, whether to Jews out of Palestine, or to non-Jews in Palestine. We especially welcome in it the reference to the civil and religious rights of the existing non-Jewish communities in Palestine. That is but a translation of the basic principle of the Mosaic legislation: "And if a stranger sojourn with thee in your land, ye shall not vex him. But the stranger that dwelleth with you shall be unto you as one born among you, and thou shalt love him as thyself" (Lev. xix. 33-34).

But it is the substance of the Declaration—the promise of the national home for the Jewish people—that fills our souls with gladness. For only on its own soil can the Jewish people live its own life, and make, as in the past it had made, its characteristic and specific contributions to the common treasure of humanity. A land focuses a people, and calls forth, as nothing else can, its spiritual potentialities; and the resurrection of the Jewish nation on its own soil will re-open its sacred fountains of creative energy. Remember the days of old. After the proclamation issued by Cyrus, the mass of the Jewish people still remained in Babylon. All told only 42,000 men, women, and children took advantage of the king's proclamation and followed Ezra back to Zion, the land of their fathers. But compare the contribution to civilisation made by these men with that of their brethren who remained in the Dispersion. That handful of Zionists and their descendants, because living on their own soil, changed the entire future of mankind. They edited and collected the Prophets, wrote some of the fairest portions of the Scriptures, formed the canon of the Bible, and gave the world its monotheistic religions. And as in the days of Cyrus, the overwhelming majority of Jews of to-day will continue to live where they now are, praying and working in absolute loyalty for the land of their birth or adoption, and ever beholding their peace in its welfare. Only a remnant shall return. But it is the national rejuvenation of that remnant that will open a new chapter in the annals of the human spirit.

Difficulties? Of course there are difficulties. The task of laying the foundations of a new Israel must be one of long toil and severe trial. But a people that for twenty-five centuries stood victoriously against the storm of time, possesses vitality enough, patience enough, idealism enough, with the help of God, to rise to the level of this unique, world-historic opportunity. In the same Psalm to which I have referred, which is sung in every Jewish home on Sabbaths and festivals, the sacred singer prays for Israel's deliverance to be completed "like the streams in the south." What does that mean? In the south of Palestine, in the Negeb, there are large tracts of bleak rock with empty ravines and dry river beds. For months the Negeb is a picture of desolation. One of the torrential rains, however, peculiar to this semi-tropical region, can convert its empty ravines into rushing streams; as if by magic a green vegetation is conjured up, and the desert changes into an Eden. Israel and its future have often appeared to many of its children as such a dry land, bleak and dreary and desert. Its seers and patriots, however, have known that, let but the dew of Restoration descend upon it, and a new people would rise on its feet, and the dry river beds of the Diaspora would be changed into living streams of faith and freedom and righteousness.

It is because the Declaration of H.M. Government brings Israel the message of peace—not the peace of a declining day, but, under Providence, the peace of the sunrise, the radiant dawn of a new life and a new hope in which all the families of the earth shall yet be blessed—that I consider it a rare privilege to swell the chorus of joy and gratitude at the broad humanity and far-sighted statesmanship of the men who wield the destinies of the Empire.

J. H. HERTZ.

CORRESPONDENCE.

PRISON OR FRIENDSHIP?

To the Editor of THE INQUIRER.

SIR,—The State Children's Association is deeply concerned at the number of boys between 15 and 18 who are being sent to prison for periods varying from 7 days to 6 months. The overcrowded state of Reformatories and Borstal Institutions—due to the tide of lawlessness which has risen amongst the young as a result of war conditions—is perhaps responsible in some measure for this state of things. Whatever its cause, it is deplorable that young persons should become familiarised with prison life and conditions and thus be thrust further into crime. For our prison system—as we know to our cost—is never reformative. Moreover, imprisonment is unnecessary, for the Justices have another method which they can employ for young delinquents whose desire for adventure and whose inexperience of life have landed them in the Juvenile or in the ordinary Police Court. In some London and Provincial Courts the system of probation is used with such admirable effect that numbers of young persons, after a probationary term, make no further appearance before the Justices. In others this method is employed but little and in a fashion which prohibits success.

In August last, the Home Office issued a valuable letter to Justices, calling their attention to the need for an increased use of Probation, and pointing out the advisability of securing voluntary helpers, to prevent Probation Officers being overburdened with cases, as some of them undoubtedly are. The letter emphasised the necessity of securing as probation workers "persons of intelligence, active and in real sympathy with those coming under their supervision," and stated that some of the existing Officers are too old or are wanting in a knowledge of modern reformative methods. It is undoubtedly true that the best help obtainable is not too good to be of service to eager and imaginative youth.

The purpose of this letter, therefore, is to appeal to such of your readers—men or women—as have sympathy with and understanding of the young, to offer their services to their local Bench of Magistrates as voluntary Probation Officers for one, two or more children, as their time and powers permit. There can be no more important work than that of befriending those boys and girls who are rapidly graduating for citizenship. It is confidently affirmed that the seeds of criminality are sown before the age of 16. We venture to affirm with equal confidence that under the influence of a steadying friendship the greater number of the juvenile offenders of to-day would become trustworthy citizens of to-morrow.—Yours, &c. To the Editor of THE INQUIRER.

SIR,—The Committee beg earnestly for help in aid of this Institution, which is greatly in need of funds. It is hoped that our many kind friends will assist in keeping open the Home, which is a safe refuge for young girls at this particularly dangerous time, especially for those whose fathers are in the Army or Navy, and who have no mother, or a bad home. A pound or pounds of anything useful will be gladly welcomed for our Pound Day on December 12.—Yours, &c.

MEMORIAL NOTICES.

MR. CHARLES HAWKSLEY.

BY the death of Mr. Charles Hawksley our community loses a friend who throughout his long career was devotedly loyal to the principles and ideals of his youth. Born in Nottingham in 1839, he received his earliest religious impressions at the High Pavement Chapel; and the value which he attached to them found beautiful expression a few years ago in his gift of choir stalls and a chancel rail to the present High Pavement Church in memory of his father, Thomas Hawksley. Mr. Thomas Hawksley was a water-engineer of high distinction, and London became the natural centre for his professional work. There as a young man Mr. Charles Hawksley shared his father's labours, and gained the wide experience which made him in after years so shrewd an adviser on so many important undertakings. His great abilities were sometimes veiled by a slow and somewhat hesitating manner. But his clearness of thought and firmness in handling detail rendered him a most valuable witness before innumerable Parliamentary Committees, and in the severest cross-examination by opposing counsel his imperturbable good nature enabled him to hold his own. His eminent qualities were recognised by his appointment some years ago as President of the Institution of Civil Engineers.

Mr. Hawksley's father had joined the congregation of Little Portland Street Chapel, and there, fifty-three years ago, he himself stood as a young man morning by morning at that superintendent's desk in the Portland Sunday School which was occupied in the afternoon by Dr. Martineau himself. The rapid increase of professional engagements prevented him from taking any active share in our denominational organisations till advancing years left him more leisure, and in 1911 he accepted the office of President of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association. Readers of this journal cannot have forgotten the tale of his pilgrimages to meetings and bazaars; churches in all parts of the country, north, south, east, and west, were cheered by his genial presence, his evident interest in their welfare, and his ever generous gifts. One of our venerated seniors, the beloved pastor of Rosslyn Hill Chapel, Dr. Sadler, once commended to the students of Manchester New College his own habit of the regular composition of sermons by remarking that if he could not say some thing inspired, he thought he could always say something sensible. That was the note of Mr. Hawksley's speeches. His sincerity and simplicity, his absolute freedom from any assumption of superior dignity, his loyalty to the principles of civil and religious liberty as he had inherited them from his father in his youth, his singular kindliness and goodwill, made him everywhere welcome.

That which he was at the council-board or on the platform he was still more in his home. Many of our ministers have enjoyed his hospitality, and felt his consideration for them as a host. He was so gentle, so interested in the comforts and the talk of his guests. Beneath his quiet manner there was an observant eye and behind it a quick brain. He read and thought for himself; he loved good literature, good humour, and good music. Tenacious of old associations his mind was naturally conservative; but it was open to unexpected influences, and no bitterness marked his political judgments. His countless deeds of secret helpfulness flowed from a gracious nature, incapable of ostentation or self-display. He was the warm friend of our Missions, a generous supporter of Manchester College, and a promoter of many a fund for the cause of "truth, liberty and religion." The tragedy of the war drew from him much personal concern for Belgian families, whom he placed and maintained in houses at his own expense or boarded in sensible homes. The circle of his charities was ever expanding. But the end was at hand. On Sunday, Nov. 25, he worshipped, as he frequently did, at University Hall, the present home of the congregation of Little Portland Street (he was also a member of Essex Church), and attended a concert in the afternoon. The next day as he sat at tea with his daughter and daughter-in-law he became unconscious, and he passed away the following afternoon. "Nothing is here for tears"; let us rejoice in the "memory of the just." J. E. C.

A memorial service was held in Essex Church, on Saturday morning, December 1, after the private cremation at Golders Green. There was a large congregation of public men, professional colleagues and private friends. In the course of his address the Rev. J. H. Weatherall spoke of Mr. Hawksley's eminence as a civil engineer, the ingenuity with which he applied his contriving mind to works of philanthropy, and his quiet and generous devotion to the religion which was the inspiration of his life.

An account of Mr. Hawksley's work as an engineer, with a portrait, appeared in Engineering on November 30.

CORPORAL L. OAKESHOTT.

WORD was received in London on Monday that Corporal Lewis Oakeshott died at Salonica on November 27.

Lewis Ewart Oakeshott was born in 1894 in London, the younger son of the late R. S. Oakeshott and Mrs. Oakeshott of Colville Gardens, Bayswater. He gave up his position in the Clement-Talbot Works when the war broke out to join the Motor Transport section of the Army Service Corps. He served in various places on the South and East Coasts till last February, when he was sent out to Salonica. After some months of hard service under trying climatic conditions, he had an attack of fever. He recovered sufficiently to rejoin his unit, but the recovery was not complete. A telegram last week from a Casualty Clearing station reported him dangerously ill, and this was followed a few days later by the announcement of his death.

Lewis Oakeshott was one of the many noble young men whose gifts and sympathies would have found their natural opportunities in civil and domestic life, but who have sacrificed everything to the claims of their country and its cause. He served faithfully and endured bravely. He was a Sunday school teacher in Essex Church, Kensington, and helped with the Boys' Brigade and other institutions, as well as in the Church itself. He was admired and loved by everyone who knew him. The influence of his refined idealistic nature must have been great and deep upon his army companions, as it was upon the young people of school and church. The deepest sympathy is felt in Essex Church for his mother, his brother, Lieut. Harold Oakeshott, Machine Gun Corps, now on service in France, and his sister, Mrs. Herbert Gimson.

A BOOK by the Rev. W. J. Jupp, entitled 'Wayfarings: a Record of Adventure and Liberation in the Life of the Spirit,' will shortly be published by Messrs. Headley Bros. It deals, for the most part, with the process of development from the bondage of superstition and dogma into the freedom of a liberal faith, and may be regarded as a story of the Inner Life. Those who wish to purchase the book are requested to send their names at an early date to certain friends of the writer, including Mr. Maurice Adams, Fairdean Cottage, Downs Road, Coulsdon, Surrey; the Rev. V. D. Davis, 2 Milburn Road, Bournemouth West; Mr. W. E. Dowson, Felixstowe, The Park, Nottingham; Mrs. Mabel Lawrence, 29 Storeton Road, Birkenhead; and Dr. P. H. Wicksteed, Childrey, Wantage, Berks. The price to subscribers will be five shillings post free.

THE December number of the Lawrence House Bulletin is full of cheery messages to the "boys at the front" from friends in England, including the Rev. C. J. Street, who occupies the first page, and speaks with confidence of the attempt to build up a better world which all will have to make when the war is over. The Rev. J. Vint Laughland, who is a munition worker at present, gives some personal impressions of Woolwich Arsenal, "with its miles of factories and its eighty thousand workers," and Lieut.-Col. Bullock contributes a greeting "from an Overseaman to Overseamen." There is an excellent photograph of the Y.M.C.A. Hut at Thetford, which is the gift of Mr. Ronald P. Jones; a group taken at Padiham when the representatives of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association were assembled there for the meetings in October; some snapshots from the Home Camps in England, and a portrait of Mr. R. Mortimer Montgomery, K.C., who was the initiator of the Hostel scheme. It is stated that Lawrence House has fully justified the efforts made to establish it, that it is continually being improved, and that the Matron—whose services are given voluntarily, as a piece of war-work—is untiring in her labour to make the men comfortable. It will interest those who receive the Bulletin to read the list of names taken from the Visitors' Book.

WEEKLY NOTES.

THE following is a letter from a little boy from an orphanage at Liège which has just been removed to France:—

"We were so glad to have the good boots which you sent. Please thank the English people who have been so generous to us little Liègeois. We were always damp there from morning till night, just as if we had our feet in cold water, which was very dangerous. We were allowed very little food, no potatoes, and only bad beetroots instead! The farmers had some potatoes but they cost 3 francs a kilog. Butter, meat, and boots were only to be had by very rich people....I will tell you now about our journey. We were at Liège station at 4 o'clock—but the train did not start till midnight. Before starting they gave us a cup of soup of beetroots, but it was not good, and we were nearly all sick after eating. We were locked in carriages like animals, with no light and no windows to open, so we could not sleep at all. When we got to Cologne next day they gave us soup and dry bread again, but the soup smelt very bad. At midnight the second day we arrived at Coblentz, where we had the same soup again. After three days we arrived at the Swiss frontier and we were so happy that we danced! They gave us rolls with ham, which we devoured like lions, and all along the route they gave us chocolate."

The children rested three days in Switzerland, and were fed up, and then came on to the north of France, where they are happily settled in a Colonie Scolaire. This letter is interesting as bearing out the statement made by the Chief Inspector of Schools at Antwerp that out of 17,500 children in his district 11,000 have lost weight to an alarming extent, and fall easy victims to the ravages of almost any disease. He says: "If this state of things continues, aggravated by famine and intense cold, our unhappy country will lose 25 per cent of its child population before next spring."

Extract from a letter from a Belgian chaplain (an old man, wounded six times, and four times decorated for gallantry). "Last Friday two English aeroplanes were injured and fell in the water before our lines. From half past ten till 4 o'clock I was in the water up to my waist and sometimes deeper. In spite of all our efforts we were only able to save one aviator. I was very sad about it. I had only a slight cold as a result! They tried to gas us also while we were there, but fortunately we had our helmets."

I had a delightful visit to Leeds last week on behalf of the Fund. The result in money was £151 11*s.* 6*d.* for our funds, and the Mill Hill Sewing League also undertook to collect £20 and send coverlets for the boys' dormitories at the orphanage at Wisques—probably about a hundred.

GENEROUS GIFT TO A SUNDAY SCHOOL.

ON the occasion of the presentation of the portraits of the late Councillor Milner and Mr. J. Wigley, J.P., at the Pendleton Unitarian Free Church, an account of which we published last week, the interesting announcement of the "Jonathan Milner Memorial Fund" was made by Mr. T. Fletcher Robinson, in the following words:—

"Affection finds many ways to express the love of those who are closest and dearest, but I know of nothing so worthy and so appropriate as the way Mr. Milner's family desire to perpetuate his memory, which I am privileged to be the medium to announce to you. Mr. Cowburn (son-in-law), in the largeness of his heart, on behalf of the family, has decided to give £500 as a "Jonathan Milner Memorial Fund," the income from which is to be devoted to the benefit of the Sunday school, especially to help the scholars and teachers to a brighter and happier life, and to enable more of them to take advantage of such institutions as the Great Hucklow Holiday Home, and otherwise for their pleasure and enjoyment, and for other purposes—a wide discretion being allowed to the Trustees of the Memorial Fund. Further, Mrs. Cowburn, in manifestation of her love and affection for her father and mother, has offered to defray the expense of painting and beautifying the school premises. So splendid a gift is in harmony with the magnanimity of Mr. and Mrs. Cowburn, of which they have previously given us many proofs, and this permanent helpfulness for the children's interests is a worthy and appropriate memorial of Mr. Milner, and is in accord with the generous natures of the donors, and will be a strong incentive to those at present engaged in the good work of the Church and school to continue in their praiseworthy efforts."

CHRISTMAS APPEALS.

BLACKFRIARS MISSION.

MR. A. A. TAYLER, Hon. Secretary of the Blackfriars Mission, writes from 110 Norfolk House Road, Streatham, S.W.16, as follows: "May I appeal to the generosity of your readers on behalf of the 'Blackfriars Mission Fund'? We are, at present, without a minister, but the Rev. H. W. Stephenson, B.A., commences his ministry at the end of the year, and we hope to hand to him a substantial sum to meet the numerous requirements of our work in these times.

"Although there are many to whom the war has brought abundant and well paid work, there are also those whom the doubled cost of living has reduced to great distress, and in assisting our friends thus circumstanced and in many other directions we have ample opportunity of making excellent use of all the help we can obtain. Contributions may be sent to me at the above address."

DINGLEY PLACE MISSION.

THE Rev. F. Summers writes from 4 Durley Road, Stamford Hill, N.16.:—

"Will you allow me to make my annual appeal to those good friends who at this season of the year so kindly help me? I am in need of money for the Poors' Purse, also of new and cast-off clothing, books, toys, &c. And may I add that, through scarcity and high prices, never have I known aged people so badly off as now? For them it is a most difficult time."

MANSFORD STREET MISSION.

THE Rev. Gordon Cooper writes from 117 Mansford Street, Bethnal Green, E.2.:

"You always allow me to appeal to your readers at this time of the year for subscriptions and donations to the various funds we have at the Mansford Street Mission. May I ask for their help again this Christmas? The Poors' Purse, the Window Gardening Society, and the Christmas Fund are all at the moment in very low water financially, and I should be very grateful for any contributions that your readers are able to send.

"I wonder if there are among your readers any ladies who could help us in the New Year with the work of our Provident Bank? We are in urgent need of some more collectors who can devote Monday mornings to this valuable and interesting work. I should be happy to send full particulars to anyone who thinks she would be able to help us, if she will write to me."

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Ashton-under-Lyne.—A Sale of Work which was held on November 30 and December 1, at the Richmond Hill Church, realised £108.

Birmingham: Newhall Hill Church.—On Sunday evening, December 2, a special musical service was held, the choir, which had been well trained under the direction of Mr. W. H. Summerfield, rendering Spohr's sacred cantata 'God, Thou art Great.' The minister, the Rev. Stanley Mossop, gave a short address on 'The Value of Music in Worship.'

Birmingham: Old Meeting Church.—The Week-night Devotional Service held on November 22 was made memorable by the exhibition of interdenominational goodwill which was given on that occasion. The vicar of the parish, the Rev. A. E. Heaton, and Canon Adderley of St. Gabriel's both took part in it, the former offering the prayers (with the exception of the first prayer, offered by the minister, the Rev. J. M. Lloyd Thomas), and the benediction before the hymn preceding the sermon, while the latter gave a discourse on St. Francis, offered the concluding prayer, and pronounced the final benediction.

Clifton.—A Memorial Service was held in Oakfield Road Church on Saturday, December 1, at 3 P.M., when the Rev. Dr. J. Estlin Carpenter delivered an address in memory of the late Philip John Worsley, J.P., of Rodney Lodge, Clifton. After referring to the heroism of our men in the field, who by their sufferings were building a new world order, Dr. Carpenter pointed to the less conspicuous but equally heroic virtues of civic and pacific life, which are but too easily forgotten, remarking that Mr. Worsley had eminently distinguished himself in this second category of virtue. Giving a survey of the life which had won the admiration and affection of countless hearts in Bristol, and which had borne rich fruits in industry, commerce, science, and religious devotion, above all in the city of his adoption, the preacher proceeded to unveil the memorial tablet to the late Mr. and Mrs. Worsley, a fine piece of bronze-work mounted on dark oak. In addition to members of the family a large and very representative gathering of friends had assembled, including the heads of many charitable and educational institutions in Bristol, whose presence testified to Mr. Worsley's generosity as well as to the affectionate regard which is felt for the bereaved relatives.

Ilkeston.—The service at the High Street Chapel was conducted on Sunday, December 2, by Miss J. Simpson, the matron of the Nottingham Electro-Medical Hospital. Miss Simpson gave an address on 'The Shield of Truth,' which was much appreciated. There was a good congregation.

Lewes.—An interesting ceremony took place in the Council Chamber of the Town Hall on November 30, when Miss Sybil Packwood, a member of the Unitarian Church, was presented with the Royal Humane Society's certificate on vellum for saving the life of a girl at Seaford in August. Among those present were the Deputy Mayor (Alderman T. G. Roberts), Mrs. Segrave-Daly (the mother of the girl who had been rescued), the Rev. Prebendary Poole, the Rev. W. H. Drummond, and other clergymen and townspeople of Lewes, including the Rev. J. M. Connell, who had made it his business to bring the matter to the notice of the Royal Humane Society. The Mayor, who presided, gave some account of the valuable work carried on by the Society, and Mr. Connell described the particular circumstances which had been the cause of their meeting that afternoon. Miss Marie Segrave-Daly, a girl of 14, was bathing with her father and two younger brothers when she got out of her depth, and, being unable to swim, was in danger of drowning. Her father made desperate efforts to reach her, and the elder boy, the only member of the party who could swim, attempted to save her, but was dragged under the water and forced to let go his hold. Miss Packard, who had been sitting on the beach, then rushed into the sea, fully dressed as she was, and swimming towards the girl managed to seize her and drag her to the end of a groyne, where she supported her with difficulty, as the waves were breaking over them, till other help was available. The act was a particularly brave one, as both in swimming and in attempting to rescue the girl who was drowning Miss Packhard would be impeded by her clothing, and the sea being rough added to the difficulty. It was a great satisfaction to all her friends, Mr. Connell added, that the Royal Humane Society had conferred this distinction on Miss Packard for a great act of courage which might so easily have cost her life, and they rejoiced to think of her as having taken her place with Grace Darling among the heroines of the sea. Mrs. Segrave-Daly, in the absence of her husband on active duty with the Red Cross, also spoke a few words and expressed her gratitude to Miss Packard. The Mayor then presented the certificate amid loud applause.—Anniversary services were held at Westgate Chapel on November 25, conducted by the Rev. J. M. Connell. The Rev. W. H. Drummond was the preacher for the day.

London: Acton.—The Rev. H. C. Horsley, M.A., has resigned the ministry of the Unitarian Church, having accepted a unanimous invitation to become the minister of the Moss Side Unitarian Free Church, Manchester, where he hopes to commence his duties at the New Year.

London: Essex Church.—The Rev. J. H. Weatherall is giving a series of five addresses on 'Natural Prayer' during the Sunday mornings of December. The subjects are 'The Evolution of Prayer,' delivered last Sunday, 'The Sphere of Prayer,' 'The Working of Prayer,' 'Some Laws of Prayer,' and 'Communal Prayer.' In the evenings Mr. Weatherall is taking five poems by William Watson, namely, 'England, my Mother' (December 2), 'The Things that are More Excellent,' 'The Unknown God,' 'The Dream of Man,' and 'The Father of the Forest,' as the subjects of his discourses.

London: Stratford.—The congregation of the Unitarian Church have learnt with deep regret that Private H. W. Edgar Noel, 30th London Regiment, 2nd Artists' Rifles, who has been reported as missing since October 29, is now believed, from further information received, to have been killed in action.

Manchester: Moss Side.—The Rev. H. C. Horsley, M.A., of Acton, who has accepted a unanimous call to the pastorate at Moss Side, will take up his new duties on the first Sunday in the New Year. The Rev. T. P. Spedding, who, by the kindness of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, has been in temporary charge at Moss Side for the past three months, recently left with genuine feelings of regret on both sides. His short stay has been productive of much good. At a Social Gathering towards the end of his brief visit, at which well over a hundred friends were present, a cordial vote of thanks to the British and Foreign Unitarian Association for Mr. Spedding's invaluable help was moved by Mr. J. Lord and seconded by Mr. J. White, and carried with much applause. Mr. Spedding in response said how much he had enjoyed his short sojourn there, and how convinced he was that there was a bright future in store for Moss Side. The Revs. C. Roper and H. C. Horsley, who were present as visitors, also spoke. On the last Sunday of his visit a small token of esteem and affection in the form of Morley's 'Recollections' was presented to Mr. Spedding by the congregation.

Mottram.—During November there have been three special events in connection with the Unitarian Church: a Social organised by the Adult Class to raise funds for Soldiers' Christmas Comforts, which cleared over £10; the Annual Congregational Tea Party, at which about 180 attended; and the Chapel Anniversary Services, when the Rev. Charles Travers of Ashton was the preacher, the collections being a considerable increase on the past two years. The minister is continuing his Wednesday Lecture Talks.

Sheffield.—The death is announced with great regret of Private George Shaw, as the result of wounds received in France. Mr. Shaw, who was not yet 20 years of age, had been one of the Sunday scholars at Upper Chapel from childhood, and is the eleventh member on the Roll of Honour to make the supreme sacrifice in this war. Recent collections for St. Dunstan's Hostel for the Blind realised £11 11*s.* 10½*d.*

The annual Church collections on behalf of the Red Cross will be made on Sunday, January 6, the day appointed by the King as the day of National Prayer. The recommendation that the offertories on that day should be devoted to the needs of the sick and wounded men of the King's Forces on the various battle fronts, signed by the Duke of Connaught, Grand Prior of the Order of St. John, and by the Marquess of Lansdowne, Chairman of the Council of the British Red Cross Society, has been addressed to clergymen of various denominations, and signed more numerously by the heads of such denominations on this occasion than in any previous year. It is scarcely necessary to emphasise the urgent need for funds for the work of the Red Cross, which is far greater than it was twelve months ago owing to the enormous increase in the number of the combatant forces. The expenses average over £60,000 a week, and it is gratifying to record that the churches of this country, in response to a similar appeal last year, contributed no less than £45,647. It is hoped that a still larger sum will be raised on January 6.

THE Public Worship Committee of the National Conference is preparing prayers for use in the Service of National Prayer and Thanksgiving to be held in the churches on January 6.

DEATHS.

CRAWSHAW.—On November 26, in hospital abroad, Harry Crawshaw, 1st Loyal North Lancashire Regiment, aged 37 years (son of Fred Crawshaw, Mayfield, Heywood Street, Bury).

OAKESHOTT.—On November 27, on active service abroad, Lewis Ewart Oakeshott, A.S.C., younger son of the late R. S. and Mrs. Oakeshott, 43 Colville Gardens, Bayswater, W.11, aged 23.

SPEARS.—On December 1, at 31 Crescent Road, Crouch End, N.8, Emily, widow of the late Rev. Robert Spears, in her 83rd year.

APPEAL.

The Committee asks friends for financial help in order to meet the cost of repairs to the Church and School buildings.

These had been postponed owing to the War, but the condition of the fabric has become so bad during the last two years, that further delay would have been disastrous.

Mr. Arnold S. Tayler, at the request of the London District Unitarian Society, inspected the buildings and submitted a report of such repairs as were structural and indispensable.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

The address for our Belgian Hospital Fund, to which cheques and parcels of clothing should be sent, is Mrs. Bernard Allen, 14 Gainsborough Gardens, Hampstead, N.W.3.

THE event of this week which will be long remembered has been the entry of General Allenby into Jerusalem. It was carried through with quiet dignity. Not a shot had been fired against the city, and report states that the population was well disposed towards their new master, who came not as a conqueror but as the herald of justice and civilisation. How much all this portends for the dawn of a new era of prosperity in the Near East we have suggested in our leading article.

IT is interesting to compare this simplicity befitting great events with the play acting of the Kaiser, as we are enabled to do in the humorous article which Mr. Spenser Leigh Hughes has contributed to The Times. It was in 1898 that the Kaiser made his memorable entry into Jerusalem. It was an elaborate performance excellently managed in all its details by Messrs. Thomas Cook & Son of Ludgate Circus. "The Kaiser had arrayed himself," Mr. Hughes tells us, "like a Crusader as seen in pantomime—helmet, silk robe, and the other usual trappings for the part. He appeared to be in a mood of exaltation, and saluted with almost epileptic fury. Indeed, it seemed to me that he imagined he had captured the city by the sword instead of arriving there, as was the fact, as one of Cook's personally conducted tourists." It was the Kaiser's complete lack of humour which struck Mr. Hughes more than anything else, a lack so complete as to be hardly consistent with entire sanity. When the performance was over a German officer confided this remark to the critical Englishman, "Whatever you may say about him this at least is true—he is the greatest commercial traveller in the world."

* * *

EVENTS in Palestine have naturally given a great impulse to the Zionist Movement. Whatever may be feasible at the end of the war, and wise men keep to moderate language while a campaign is still in progress, it is well that everything should be done to give the movement breadth of outlook. Unless it is a service to the world as well as a service to the Jewish people little that is good can come out of it. In the able and friendly speech which Sir Mark Sykes made at a Zionist demonstration in Manchester last Sunday he dwelt with force on this aspect of the question. He warned the Zionists that their ideals must be realised in contact with a new Arab civilisation, and disaster might overtake both Jew and Arab unless the Jews from the first looked upon the Arab revival in a spirit of co-operation and goodwill.

SIR MARK SYKES was quite explicit about the dangers which had to be avoided. The Arab feared, he said, financial corporations, pivoted on Palestine, controlling Syria and Mesopotamia. He feared the soil of Palestine would be bought by companies, and that he would become a proletariat working on the soil. He feared the Palestinian colonists might drop their colonies and drift into Syria and Mesopotamia as middlemen and crush him out of existence. It was essential that Zionists should realise and face these dangers. The Arabs should understand that the Jews sought no land not willingly sold; that all land would only be developed through Jewish labour; that the colonists would be bona-fide colonists, and that the Jews were out to win Palestine not by financial manœuvres, but by the sweat of their brow. The co-operation of the two races offered such prospects to mankind; hostility would mean such an unthinkable tragedy, that he felt it his duty to give the warning.

* * *

MR. ASQUITH'S speech in Birmingham on Tuesday with its fine plea for a "clean peace" has done much to dissipate the tangle of criticism and rather angry feeling which has been created by Lord Lansdowne's letter. We hope that the incident may be regarded as closed on both sides, and that there will be no more attacks upon Lord Lansdowne and no more attempts to prove that all his critics are rampant militarists. Public speech and writing are fraught with enormous responsibility at the present time. The context of every sentence and the emotional value of almost every word must be considered. Calm and balanced statements, with an undertone of deep anxiety, may only chill and discourage instead of rallying the mind to more strenuous thought. It is largely a question of atmosphere, and of never losing the glow of unshaken conviction which is the secret of courage. When President Wilson says almost the same things as Lord Lansdowne, but says them in a very different way, instead of bewildered questioning there is an instant rally to the ideal of a peace based on "generosity and justice, to the exclusion of selfish claims to advantage even on the part of the victors."

MR. J. H. THOMAS, the Secretary of the Amalgamated Society of Railway Servants, has shown great prudence and sagacity in many difficult situations since the beginning of the war. In a remarkable address which he delivered last week to the members of the Aldwych Club he revealed the deep spiritual impulses which are guiding the best minds in the Labour movement at the present time. He pleaded earnestly for a true spirit of co-operation and the subordination of all personal considerations to the general interests of the State. Let us realise, he said, that we must not prolong the war a moment longer than is necessary and do all we can to hasten the end, but only in such a way that will free the world and our children from having to suffer what we have endured. Let Capital realise its responsibilities to Labour and regard workers as something more than mere hewers of wood and drawers of water. Let Labour recognise that the only safe way to overcome difficulties on both sides is by coming together and working in harmony. Let us hope for the purifying effect of this ordeal of fire and for the taking to heart of an unforgettable lesson. Finally, he trusted that we might be able to look at a peace based on the greatest of all ideals —the brotherhood of man and the fatherhood of God.

WE have called attention more than once to the articles on religious topics which appear occasionally in The Times. They are informed with the breath of modern knowledge, and show how far the educated English mind has travelled from many of the old standards of belief. A recent article 'On taking the Bible seriously' has for its theme the need of forgetting other people's ideas about it, if we wish to read it with intelligence and enjoyment. The men who wrote the Bible "were in a state neither of invincible ignorance nor of invincible omniscience. They were not utterly right nor utterly perverse. You cannot see the immense value, beauty, truth, passion of the Bible unless you rid your mind of all those prepossessions that will destroy its alertness." To some of us this is quite familiar doctrine. Its wide acceptance marks the beginning of a new era of religious thinking, and it will be very different from the old.

* * *

FOR the first time for several years the Editor will not be able to send his greetings for Christmas and the New Year on the proper day. He cannot, however, leave for France without expressing his most earnest wish that there may be peace in our hearts and quiet happiness in our homes, as we remember God's presence with us and the immortal gladness of the Gospel of Jesus Christ. We shall keep the festival best by consecrating ourselves to a richer service of others' need. It will be a special pleasure to be the bearer once again of friendship and goodwill to our Belgian friends, who suffer so severely in their long exile and bear it with such heroic patience. Our hardships, even our personal losses, are small indeed compared with theirs and those of their countrymen at home, who endure all the horrors of German rule and do not yield.

FOR another piece of service let us also bespeak a renewal of ardent sympathy. The work of the Y.M.C.A. is too good for praise. The only way to praise it is to help it. Fresh demands are made continually upon its resources in men and money. Work is being opened up on an extensive scale in Italy. Huts are to be erected in Jerusalem. In the ministry at home there must be many men who could volunteer for a period of service who have not done so hitherto, and there is no congregation which ought not to be proud and happy to arrange for their absence. It is the best men that are needed, and it is from the large well-organised churches with their ample resources that ministers can most easily be spared. Is it our comfort, and our well-ordered ways, and the policy of "business as usual" so far as the churches are concerned, which make us a little slow to respond to this call, with its rich opportunities of human help and new experience?

JERUSALEM.

THE capture of Jerusalem is the most picturesque incident in the war. It appeals to the imagination more than any other victory has done. It is foolish to dismiss it, after the fashion of the superior person or the enemy apologist, as a minor incident in a subordinate field. In a war in which moral idealism is the guide of physical force we realise the value of symbols. Everything which appeals to the imagination and renews our allegiance to the vision of freedom and peace adds strength to our arms. Jerusalem is such a symbol. It is the sacred city of the Jews. It blends with the holiest memories of the Christian mind. To Moslems all over the world it is full of the wonders of faith and prowess, and its conquest without injury to the holy places is the end of a squalid and inept tyranny which has lasted for centuries.

"And when they heard the name of Jerusalem, the Christians could not prevent themselves, in the fervour of their devotion, from shedding tears; they fell on their faces to the ground, glorifying and adoring God, who, in His goodness, had heard the prayers of His people, and had granted them, according to their desires, to arrive at this most sacred place, the object of all their hopes." It is in these words that the chronicler describes the transport of the first Crusaders when at last they beheld the Holy City. With a gladness no less exultant the Jews see Jerusalem with the eye of faith. Not since the short reign of Julian the Apostate, who planned the restoration of the Jews to their own country, have they been so near the fulfilment of their hopes. Whatever political results may follow for themselves when the terms of peace are settled, the banishment of the Turk from the places which he has defiled will give a new appeal to the words of ancient faith, which in all parts of the world are still fraught with rich and poignant meaning. "If I forget thee, O Jerusalem, let my right hand forget her cunning. If I do not remember thee, let my tongue cleave to the roof of my mouth; if I prefer not Jerusalem above my chief joy."—"As the mountains are round about Jerusalem, so the Lord is round about his people from henceforth even for ever."

To the Moslem world the vision may be no less glad. The reason why its civilisation has been so stagnant, so poor in recent centuries in great men who have moved the world, has been largely political. It fell back exhausted after a brief period of splendour and a bitter struggle with its Christian foes and became a prey to the desolating rule of the Turk. Nothing has happened since except misgovernment and massacre. Noble cities have fallen into decay and its fairest fields have remained untilled. Asia Minor, Mesopotamia, Syria may become once again the home of happy industry and noble art and peaceful human happiness, rich in blessing for the whole world. Of all this the English army in Jerusalem and Baghdad is the symbol, a promise trembling on the verge of fulfilment.

For the Christian Powers of the West Jerusalem is not an object of eager desire, but its occupation is a call to noble service. The last Christian king of Jerusalem was Frederick II., who crowned himself in the Church of the Holy Sepulchre in 1229. He was excommunicate; he had defied the Pope; he was under suspicion of heresy. But in the temper of his mind he was the most modern man of the Middle Ages. Men marvelled at him and called him "Stupor Mundi." He was versatile, broadminded and full of keen intellectual curiosity. At his court at Palermo men of every school of thought were at home, and Christian and Paynim conversed on equal terms. He himself spoke Arabic, and discussed mathematical problems with the Sultan of Damascus. In Jerusalem he established a system of toleration too free for the persecuting spirit of his day; but he tarried only a few weeks, and the brilliant dream has been left for the modern world with its riper wisdom to fulfil. It is to this task that we have to set our hands wherever men are still the victims of fraud and fear, teaching them the art of harmonious life based on the practice of giving to others what they would exact for themselves. Of all this Jerusalem is the fruitful symbol in the field of practical affairs. If we are faithful to our trust and discharge it with courage and gladness, this real city of men set upon its hill of rock will lose none of its ancient appeal to our hearts. The sentiments which have gathered round it, and found undying expression in poetry and song, will be enriched by a breadth and charity such as the Christian mind in the days of its intolerance could not know. And still the vision of the urbs beata, the citadel of the soul, shall beckon to us from afar, and all nations shall come to the brightness of its rising. "Then judgment shall dwell in the wilderness, and righteousness shall abide in the fruitful field. And the work of righteousness shall be peace; and the effect of righteousness, quietness and confidence for ever."

A TALK WITH LIBELLUS.

Libellus and I had not met for a long time. He has been busy with the war-work which has claimed us all, and I have hesitated to intrude upon his scanty moments of leisure. But there are moods when I feel starved without the old familiar talks about books and the things of the mind, and so I found myself once again on the familiar doorstep the other evening. Besides it is near Christmas, and he has long been my mentor on the subject of presents to my friends, and of course there is no present like a new book unless it be an old one. I found him in his library amid the surroundings which become him best, a little tired it is true, but eager in his welcome and quite ready to give all his mind to a bookish talk. He is a strong believer in moments of ease, when the strain of thought is relaxed and the duty that has absorbed his energies is forgotten, because it is finished for to-day. "Men wear their armour all the more gallantly," he says, "if they know when to lay it aside." Clearly he had been browsing, his term for the art of desultory friendship with his favourite books, which for those who know how to practise it has many of the charms of good conversation. He was turning over a small volume of the seventeenth century, and when the first greetings were over he put it into my hands. It was the first edition of 'The Immortality of the Soul, so farre forth as it is demonstrable from the Knowledge of Nature and the Light of Reason,' by Henry More, printed in London in 1659.

"Have you made friends with the Cambridge Platonists?" he asked. "They are a source of healing and delight amid the noise and anxiety of the present hour. Whichcote, John Smith, Culverwel, Henry More, they live on that shelf ready to talk to me at any moment, when my spirit is in tune with theirs, of the life spent in harmony with divine Reason and the charity and loving-kindness which are incumbent upon all the followers of Christ. How often we mistake wild speech for deep conviction; but the men who really live with God are quiet. It requires far deeper faith to be gentle and broadminded than to be narrow and vehement for the truth. Heavenly wisdom has no need of rhetoric." He checked himself suddenly for he saw that he was falling into a soliloquy, and his quick instinct of courtesy told him that I had come to talk about the new books, which lay about in tempting profusion on his table.

"I see that you still find time to be a taster of new wares," I said after a pause, for his words had moved me, and I like my friend best of all in this meditative vein. "Yes," he answered, "c'est mon métier. I cannot quite forsake my craft even in these days, though criticism is poor work compared with creation, and I often feel like a ruthless vivisector when I dig into the delicate tissues of a book into which another man has put the glowing passion of his heart and brain. It is amazing how prolific the publishing houses contrive to be in spite of the scarcity of paper and the price of labour. Of course many of their books have no intrinsic value. They are among the luxuries we could do without, and not only in war-time. I have never had much taste for the exposure of the fraudulent claims of feeble and trashy books. Where there is nothing to praise, silence is often the best form of censure. Of course there are books of that kind here, for people will send them to me," and he pointed to certain well advertised volumes by third-rate writers. "Books by dead authors for dead readers," as he laughingly described them.

"No," I replied, "I don't want to hear about them. Tell me about the books that have appealed to your own mind, and especially any that are rich in human interest. I have read Lord Morley's 'Recollections' and Jacks's 'Life of Stopford Brooke.' They alone would redeem any publishing season from reproach. Are there others like them?'

"Yes," he said, "here are two volumes one a biography, and the other a brilliant piece of literary history, which you cannot possibly read without similar enjoyment." He handed me Sir Sidney Colvin's 'Life of John Keats,' and noticing that after glancing at its beautiful illustrations I seemed a little dismayed at its size, he continued: "I quite understand: you think that this is too solid a monument for a life of twenty-five years and its unfinished utterance in ethereal verse. My advice is, read it first and judge it afterwards. It tells the story of Keats's life for the first time with fulness of knowledge and sets him in the circle of his brilliant friends. But it is also a remarkable essay in poetical criticism, the kind of criticism which is interpretative and quickens the mind of the reader with new powers of enjoyment. For this reason it is a most welcome gift at the present time. Many of us find the best solace for anxiety and dryness of soul in the treasure-house of English poetry; and poetry now as always yields its divinest secrets only to those who will pay it the tribute of close thought and brooding meditation. Among our poets perhaps only Wordsworth gains as much as Keats by the method which Sir Sidney Colvin has adopted, of careful study of the sources of his inspiration combined with a rich vein of imaginative sympathy with the poet's own experience.

"Not less timely is the publication of the first part of Professor Saintsbury's 'History of the French Novel.' What a marvellous piece of work it is! It combines the rich stores of knowledge of old age with the rushing enthusiasms of youth. It holds you breathless with its swift movement, and then it baffles you with its allusiveness and its familiarity with all the by-paths of literature. How can one life be sufficient for these things! But running through it all, leaping and twisting and laughing, like some living thing, is the French spirit, speaking as it does all too seldom to English ears."

As I glanced round the room at the striking French portraits on his walls, and my eye lighted on volume after volume, many of them in old French bindings, Montaigne, Pascal, Fénelon, Molière, Montesquieu, Michelet, Flaubert, Sainte-Beuve, I knew that Libellus was speaking with warmth out of some strong partiality of his own mind. But I felt that he was right. English culture need not neglect the classical literature of Germany on account of the war, but if it is wise it will put it into its proper place, which is quite secondary to the much greater and more varied literature of France. And it is with the French people that we have to create closer ties of intellectual sympathy and spiritual understanding, if we are to guard the freedom of the human mind and its expression in living art.

But already my friend was claiming my attention for another book, 'New and Old,' by Edith Sichel, with an introduction by A. C. Bradley. "Of course it is the French interest in this volume which attracts me," he said. "It is a pleasure to learn something about the gifted author of 'Men and Women of the French Renaissance,' 'Marie de Medici and the French Reformation,' and the other volumes with which you must be familiar. It is a moving revelation of a devoted life which could read the hearts of English working girls as easily as French chronicles. Here are gathered together many of her literary essays, extracts from her letters, and a collection of 'Thoughts.' The latter are often brilliant and suggestive and reveal her mind at work. Let me give you a taste of their quality.—'Love is of little help unless you can draw small cheques upon it.'—'There are two conceptions of religion: that which adapts God to the needs of man; that which fashions man to the needs of God.'—'Sorrow does not really change people, it only develops what is already in them: that which they bring to it they will reap from it.'—'There are two kinds of literary creators: there is the creative writer and there is the creative reader. The creative reader is the true critic: he sees all he reads anew.'"

Libellus is a great believer in the educative value of biography. He says that it is the best cure for narrowness of mind. It enables the lonely man to live continually in good company. But he insists that we gain most by reading the lives of men who are unlike ourselves. Thus the quietist ought to read the lives of men of affairs, and poets ought to converse with engineers in an armchair by the fire, though they may seldom meet, in real life. Doubtless it was for this reason that, knowing the besetting weakness of the parsonic mind, with its tendency to run in narrow grooves of professional thinking, he pressed upon my attention the 'Life of Lord Lister,' by Sir Rickman John Godlee, as the best kind of present for my clerical friends. "It will open a new world to them," he said, "and purge their minds of the perilous delusion that God cares more about theology than he does about medicine and physics and all the secular pursuits of men. Some of us remember what the lives of Darwin and Huxley did for us in this way. Here is another great scientific biography, which will liberate the mind and enable us to enter into personal friendship with one of the chief benefactors of the human race. I dare not think what the agony of this war would have been like, if Lister had never lived."

We had not spoken so far on books dealing with religion and the problems of the spirit, but I was not to be entirely denied, and I asked Libellus whether he had avoided the subject on purpose. "Yes," he replied, "it is partly so There are many questions of criticism and speculation which have little food for my mind in these strange days. We are busy taking into our souls the treasure of new experience, and its interpretation must come later. Much of the theological writing of the day seems to me but feeble piping. When men are dying we do not want theories about death. But there are two books which have appealed to me, each in a different way. The new collection of Newman's 'Letters' belongs to a vanished world. How far away it seems, and how pale many of its figures. The effects of his movement which survive are at best second-rate both in religious impulse and mental power. And yet the old charm is there, and no one who has ever felt it can recover it without some heightening of feeling. The spiritual romance of the world is once again alive in the heart. The other volume is by one of Newman's severest critics, himself the most patient and undismayed of scholars, who in the volume of his work and his energy of mind reminds me of some of the greatest of the Benedictines. Dr. Abbott has completed the most massive book which English learning has contributed to the study of the four Gospels. Who that has ever tried to follow the intricate thread of his argument, and felt the pulse of deep religious faith beneath the smallest detail of scholarship, can withhold a reverent tribute of gratitude and admi ation. How well he has expressed his own aim in these words: 'It is quite right to study the words of the Gospels with all possible care, honesty, and diligence, but the student's object should be to reach the Word through the words. Small indeed would then seem many of the differences that divide Churches and theologians. They would be swallowed up in our apprehension of the "love of God which is in Christ Jesus our Lord" and "the peace of God which passeth all understanding"....In accordance with the Law of self-sacrifice the Son of Man passed through apparent defeat on the Cross to the real victory of the Resurrection, through the death of "the grain of wheat" to the life that "beareth much fruit." We are to do the same. This is the lesson of the Gospels.'"

These words seemed a fitting epilogue to an evening of rich enjoyment, and I rose to go, for the hour was late. As I did so, Libellus detained me for a moment. "Let us celebrate the taking of Jerusalem by our gallant boys," he said, "and the end of that age-long debauch of tyranny and dirt. Listen!" I knew his habit of reading Latin hymns for the stately music of the verse, and it was with a chant of triumph that he recited,

Urbs beata Hirusalem, dicta pacis visio,
Quæ construitur in cœlis vivis ex lapidibus,
Et ab angelis ornata, velut sponsa nobilis:

Nova veniens e cœlo, nuptiali thalamo
Præparata, ut sponsata copuletur Domino;
Plateæ et muri ejus ex auro purissimo.

"Don't you understand," he said as he grasped my hand and said goodnight, "why Latin is the language of Heaven!" W. H. D.

WAR BONUS TO MINISTERS.

To the Editor of THE INQUIRER.

SIR,—Through the Sustentation Fund and the British and Foreign Unitarian Association—the latter assisted by donations given in response to our appeal—the sum of £1,250 has this week been distributed as a small war bonus to a number of our ministers who are struggling to make a very meagre income go a long way in these hard times. Many of them have already by anticipation gratefully intimated what a boon this timely gift will be; and we desire in their name to thank the administrators of these two societies, and those friends who have kindly contributed through the Treasurer of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, for the assistance thus given. It should be mentioned that a few ministers whose ministerial income did not exceed the £200 limit waived their claim to a gift because their income was supplemented from private sources.—We are, yours, &c.

THE FREE CATHOLIC CONFERENCE.

To the Editor of THE INQUIRER.

SIR,—May we thank you for your kind note in your last issue and assure you that the concern you very properly express will not be disregarded by the Executive of the Conference? It is not for us or for any one to anticipate the findings and decisions of our various Sessions, but we believe we shall not be more afraid of "definiteness" than of vagueness and the paralysis of the non-committal mind. Our chief purpose in troubling you with this letter is to dispel a possible misunderstanding. The fact that the Free Catholic Conference will assemble on the Old Meeting premises has no kind of denominational significance. So far as that goes, it might just as well gather at the Cathedral, or at the Oratory, or at Carr's Lane. We tried to get the Hayes, Swanwick, but found it was already let to a school on both sets of dates which we submitted. A search for some central and commodious hostel proved unsuccessful, and Birmingham was chosen as the most convenient meeting place especially for our friends from Scotland, the North of England and the West. To save the expense of hiring halls, it was resolved to risk misunderstanding and to ask the Old Meeting friends for the hospitality of their beautiful Church and schools. This was cordially and unanimously granted.

In due course an advertisement of our full programme will appear in your paper among others. May we take this opportunity of inviting the attendance of such of your readers as hopefully and seriously seek to reconcile the individual and congregational liberties developed among the Free Churches with all that is essential to life, faith, worship, and order in the experience of the Catholic Church? Application should be made to the Secretary as below.—Yours, &c.

EMPLOYMENT AFTER THE WAR.

To the Editor of THE INQUIRER.

SIR,—In view of the industrial crisis with which this and other countries are sure to be confronted immediately following demobilisation, it is imperative that the Government should at once make provision for this coming emergency, by passing a bill pledging the Government to provide employment after the war, in Government factories, at district rates, for all who wish it. The effect of such an undertaking would be, in the first place, a tremendous increase in normal production over that preceding the war, and in the second place, the avoidance of acute rivalry between workers in the long waiting line, hitherto a prominent characteristic of our Christian civilisation. To leave this most difficult problem to private enterprise after the war will be disastrous to the domestic peace of this country, and a heavy responsibility rests upon us at home to make impossible the repetition of conditions such as awaited many a war-scarred hero after the Boer War. May I appeal to you to use your influence towards this end, if you are not already doing so.—Yours, &c.

MEMORIAL NOTICE.

MRS. SHANNON.

IT is with much regret that we have to announce the death of Mrs. Shannon, widow of the late Rev. John Shannon who was formerly minister of the old Bowlalley Lane Chapel, Hull. She was born in Hull in 1832, but after her marriage in 1879 she resided in London and became a member of Essex Church, where she was a constant worshipper up to the time of her death, associating herself intimately with the activities of the Church of which she was at the time of her death one of the oldest members. She never lost touch with the Hull congregation, and also interested herself greatly in the cause of the Acton Unitarian Church. Her mother was one of the first subscribers to THE INQUIRER and this connection has been unbroken up to the present day. Of a most active and sympathetic temperament, she interested herself intensely in all the modern movements for the betterment of the conditions of life, never allowing herself to grow old either in body or in thought. As late as December 2 she attended service at Essex Church and took the communion. Her end was sudden, following an operation; but though sudden it was full of peace and content, her mind being beautifully clear to the last.

WEEKLY NOTES.

THE monthly report for November from the Maternity Home shows that nine babies were born there during the month, of whom one, unfortunately, did not live. The mother of this last was not expected to recover for some days, but is now doing well. Owing to the terrible air raids many women have left the town and did not come to the home, as was expected. The sister in charge has also been recalled to the community, necessitating the finding of some one to replace her. Mme. Lageot was obliged to do her work herself for a few days, but now a successor is found. There are thirty names down for this month, but probably a good many of these will have left the town already. They would be glad of more white shawls for the babies. ROSE ALLEN

TOYS FOR BELGIAN CHILDREN.

MRS. W. H. DRUMMOND writes from 23, Cannon Place, Hampstead, N.W.3:—

Further gifts of toys or money have been received from: Miss Ackroyd, Miss Harding, Mrs. Long, Mrs. Harold Thomas, Miss F. C. Grundy, Mrs. H. Woodall, Dr. Hargrove, Mrs. J. Worthington, Mrs. F. E. Baines, West Grove Women's League, per Miss A. C. Fox, Mrs. W. Smith, Mrs. G. Titterton, Master P. Marten, Scott House, Hitchin, per Miss C. Scott.

Miss Scott has sent us a parcel of toys from Scott House, a school for mentally deficient children at Hitchin. These toys are most ingeniously made from materials that have cost practically nothing—beautiful rag dolls, among them a soldier in khaki, balls, and especially delightful are ducks stuffed with cork and sponge, so that they can swim in a child's bath. Miss Scott writes that it has given the children great pleasure to make these toys for the little Belgian refugees.

MEMORIAL TO MR. STOPFORD BROOKE.

UNVEILING AT HAMPSTEAD.

THE Memorial to the Rev. Stopford A. Brooke, which has been placed in the chancel of Rosslyn Hill Chapel, where he preached so often in recent years, was unveiled at the morning service on Sunday, December 9, by Dr. Jacks, Principal of Manchester College, Oxford. The minister, the Rev. Henry Gow, conducted the service, taking for the lessons the 103rd Psalm and 1 Corinthians xiii., and preaching from the words: "Worship the Lord in the beauty of holiness." Three hymns composed by Mr. Stopford Brooke were sung—'Immortal Love, within those Righteous Will,' 'Oft as we run the Weary Way,' and 'Arm, Soldiers of the Lord.' Goodness, Mr. Gow said, was not always associated with beauty, and, because it was sometimes a rigid and depressing thing, often failed to attract or win admiration. Nevertheless, real goodness must always be beautiful and joyous in its ultimate effect, and the greatest work of art in the world—more radiant, more inspiring than any picture or poem—was the life of a good man or woman. The pain and sorrow and effort which were part of our lot did not detract from it; the Greek and Shakespearian tragedies were the most beautiful as well as the greatest achievements of the poet because they showed the power to see beauty and glory in human life even in the midst of failure and folly and pain. To worship God rightly was to have a vision of the essential things, to worship the spirit of beauty and feel its joy in ourselves.

They were thinking that day, Mr. Gow continued, of one whose whole life and teaching were full of this radiant joy, this worship of God in the beauty of holiness, this faith in love as the secret of life and of death, and they were privileged to place a memorial of Mr. Stopford Brooke in the chancel of the church where he had so often preached to them this gospel. His message always was: "Rejoice in the Lord, and again I say unto you, rejoice," and this was not only the message of his sermons but of his life. A vision was revealed to him of the beauty of the world, and in the character of Christ he saw it focused. "Art and Christianity," he said, and he was almost unique in saying it, "are one." He had a wonderful power of evoking the dreamer and lover which often slumber in the breasts of men, and he made them feel that the poetry of life was far truer than the prose. He lived in a world revealed to him by his imagination, and knew, as all great poets and artists know, that it is through the imagination that we enter into the highest truth. He was not one of those preachers for whom faith in God comes first, and he did not try to explain the world as good when it was bad because he believed that God was good. He did not believe so much as see. He saw and worshipped beauty in nature, and art, and in the perfect life of Christ, not thinking of the latter as God, but as the ideal of humanity, expressing what God meant man to be. His religion began with the beauty of this earth, divine, mysterious, far beyond what any man can realise, and he felt it in the very depths of his soul. But beauty and joy were symbols to him always of something greater than themselves, glimpses of the eternal beauty and joy which is the love of God. He spoke to them of love tender and true, and stronger than death—of love pure, and deep, and passionate, counting no sacrifice too great. "Life ought to be ravishment," he had said, "but while we are weakened within ourselves we shall never get it so." Joy never failed him to the end, and in that sense he never grew old. As he entered upon old age there came to him a renewal of youth in the inner man. There was no contradiction between his teaching and his life. The latter was infinitely varied: he had seen and done so much, and had so many interests; but through youth to age his message and spirit were the same, only they deepened with the years. Writing of his mother when she died he said: "As I think of her now, some way it is of her old age and her youth together that I think, and they both mingle so much that I cannot isolate the one from the other. They are one to her now." That was true, they felt, of him. Stopford Brooke had lived a full and complete life; he was always the same—the truest friend, the wisest counsellor, the great passionate lover of beauty, the spirit of joy, the faithful follower of Christ, an influence of strength and peace to myriads amidst the storms and sorrows of life.

After the sermon an address was given by Dr. Jacks, and he then unveiled the memorial.

ADDRESS BY DR. JACKS.

STOPFORD BROOKE [he said] came very near to our lives: but he came from a realm that is far off. Most of us are the children of the age in which we live. We are moulded by the influences immediately around us, we reproduce the habits of thought and the modes of feeling which are current in our time. We need among us a few men who are not thus limited by their age. We need them to remind us of those high and universal things which are the same yesterday, to-day, and forever. Stopford Brooke was such an one. He was a universal man. He was of all ages, from the most childlike to the most mature. The shades of his prison-house never closed around his fine spirit. He blended the intuitions of the child with the wisdom that comes late in the history of the world, and each was made richer by its union with the other. He showed us that knowledge culture, civilisation, profit nothing unless they are motived by love. He showed us how love has need of knowledge and culture and civilisation in order that she may do her finest work. Thus, though he was not the product of his age, he left his mark upon the age and served it, as he would not have done had he stood aloof from his fellow-men. How deep was the mark he left many of us who are here can bear witness. He was a liberating influence in our lives; and it was thus that he acted on all who came in contact with his spirit, whether in his preaching or his literary work. He gave us access to a broader and better world than that in which we should have lived without him. He made us less the children of our age. And that was good for us.

Like his Master he lived in a house of many mansions, and he was at home in them all. He was at home among the things of the spirit; and he was equally at home among the things of sense. To many these two worlds seem absolutely different. But he made them one; or rather they were one in him. He brought the beauty of holiness into the things of sense; and brought the reality of the things of sense into the realm of the spirit. It was the aim of his life to unite them, and their union was seen not in his message alone, but in his personality. Hence his power, his passion, his tenderness, and his insight, which in him were so blended as to make him almost unique. Both as a man and as a preacher he had the secret of power. It was rooted in love, which, as he told us so often, is the source of everything that gives value, beauty, effectiveness to the deeds of men. Grounded on that theme, which he pursued through many variations, his life expanded into a great symphony.

Never was that note more needed than now. We may say of him as Wordsworth said of Milton, "thou shouldst be living at this hour." He would have led us straight to the root of our calamities. He would have served us with new weapons for the good fight. He would have shown us the kingdoms not of this world, for neglecting which the kingdoms that are of this world are coming to nought. His presence in our midst would have filled us with the hope of better days to come. His voice would have kindled our faith and renewed our courage.

The musician is silent, but the music sounds on. You will hear it whenever you look upon the monument you have erected to his memory. The true memorial of Stopford Brooke is neither this stone nor the words which are engraved upon it, but the response which your own hearts will make when you remember his living word and his loving presence. In no other way can this congregation, or any congregation, claim him as one of themselves. He was of no sect, no party, no Church. And yet he was of all sects, all parties, all Churches—save those, if there be any such, where love is dead. He belonged to the beloved community of the loyal, the faithful, the pure in heart, whose hands are joined across the centuries and across all lines of division; the only Church that is recognised in heaven; and no Church whose boundaries are less than these has the shadow of a claim to possess him. "His voice is on the rolling air; we hear him where the waters run." Let his monument remind you of those high and universal things. When they speak to our hearts we shall think of him; and when we remember him they will speak to us again.

The memories of such men reverberate through the whole of our lives. They give us anchorage in the storm. They shed radiance everywhere, even to the darkest spots of earth, even in the darkest moments of history. Their true memorial is with God. It is to one of them, to one of the best and the most beloved of them that you have erected this monument, which I now unveil.

DESCRIPTION OF THE MEMORIAL.

The tablet is made of translucent alabaster, and is framed in green Irish marble. Within the frame, between lines of moulded alabaster, is a border of gold, white, and blue mosaic. A cross, of Celtic feeling, carved in green marble rests on a background of pale blue mosaic, threaded with entwined branches of a wild rose tree, carved in translucent alabaster. The centre of the cross and the stamens of the roses are touched with gold. The stems of the rose tree frame the inscription which is incised in a slab of alabaster. The inscription is as follows:—

IN MEMORY OF
THE REV. STOPFORD A. BROOKE, M.A., LL.D., BORN 1832. DIED 1916.
POET, PROPHET, LOVER OF MANKIND
WHO OFTEN IN THIS PLACE PREACHED
THE GOSPEL OF LIFE AND IMMORTALITY.
THOSE WHO FELT THE POWER OF HIS MESSAGE HAVE ERECTED THIS MEMORIAL IN UNDYING GRATITUDE AND LOVE.

"THY VOICE IS ON THE ROLLING AIR
I HEAR THEE WHERE THE WATERS RUN."

The work, which is greatly admired by all who have seen it, has been designed and carried out by Messrs. Powell & Sons of the Whitefriars Glass Works, Tudor Street, E.C.

THE NEW ORGAN AT HOPE STREET CHURCH, LIVERPOOL.

It is expected that the opening of the new organ at Hope Street Church, which is a memorial to Sir W. B. Bowring, will take place this month. Dr. A. W. Pollitt, F.R.C.O., the organist, has written the following description of it for the Monthly Calendar in connection with the Church:—

"Doubtless many of our friends will be glad to know something about the new organ which is now rapidly approaching completion—its raison d'être, and its function in the service of the Church. There are some of our members who, while loyally supporting the scheme, have still held a mental reservation that the old organ sounded very well. With such an opinion I most cordially agree. The old organ certainly did sound very well: there are no finer diapasons anywhere: the fundamental tone was rich, dignified, and majestic. But all this remains! We shall still hear our glorious diapasons unaltered, but in addition we shall have every species of beautiful organ-tone that the art of the builder has evolved during the long period that dates back to the fifteenth century. It is desirable that this great fact should be realised. We might spend £10,000 and not add anything vital to the colour scheme of our instrument. The money would simply produce duplication, on a larger or smaller scale, of existing material. To the listener the outstanding features of our new organ will be:—

(1) Its varied colour scheme.
(2) The dignity and beauty of its tone.
(3) Its perfect adaptability to the building.

"The expert will find additional joy in the exquisite finish of the workmanship throughout the instrument.

"What, we may ask, is the function of music in the service of the Church? Briefly, it is to produce an atmosphere of beauty which may quicken and uplift the soul, intensify the effect of the spoken word, and impress the memory. Dr. Mellor has recently expounded to us 'the holiness of beauty,' and this is the keynote of our aspiration. We desire perfection of detail in every part of the service, whether it be the spoken word, the sung word, the winged word of organ-tone, or the voiceless word of silence, and we believe in the power of such a combination to hallow our lives to finer issues in the service of God and man. May the new organ prove to be the treasure I confidently anticipate. Then we can sing in unison with the old poet:—

But oh! what art can teach,
What human voice can reach
The sacred Organ's praise?
Notes inspiring holy love,
Notes that wing their heavenward way
To join the choirs above."

THE HUNGARIAN UNITARIANS.

In a letter dated November 5, Dr. George Boros of Kolozsvar, Hungary, said that on November 17 he was to read a paper at Budapest before the Francis David Association on the future of religion after the war, adding: "A very hard problem; is it not? Of course, all of us wish to see the end. Is it nigh or far: who knows? Let us keep up our good hope, and do our duty as well as we can." He says he has visited several of our Transylvanian congregations, to organise help for the widows and orphans of the war. "Our soldiers," he says, "are very daring fighters; consequently the losses are immense. We are planning for the orphan boys, and possibly for the girls too, a new school of mechanics and one of agriculture. I have been doing the preparatory work for them. We had some of our ministers' wives here, and put them through a course of practice for nursing. They will be doing their work in their own place in the country." Dr. Boros says that the venerable Bishop Ferencz is well, but his own daughter Rose has been seriously ill with typhus, but is beginning the slow process of recovery.

CHRISTMAS APPEALS.

BELL STREET MISSION.

The Rev. A. Golland writes from 46 Bell Street, London, N.W.1.:—

"A lady recently expressed to me her wonder that in these difficult times the very poor can manage to keep their homes together, and, outside the workhouse, continue to live. In many instances even a City missionary has to confess to similar surprise, and he knows that without such help as he and his fellow-workers are enabled on occasion to give the problem of living would, for many, most likely defy solution. In these gloomy times there are, too, other than the material interests of the poor that need attention, and the strength and comfort and cheer which our Missions radiate was never more necessary than now. As the need increases the means to meet it tend to diminish, and there is real urgency in this Christmas appeal to the charitable not to forget that, come war or peace, Bell Street Mission stands where it did, and continues its truly important national work. We need money for all our funds, and we should be grateful, also, for gifts of clothing, readable books, and toys."

RHYL STREET MISSION.

The Rev. W. H. Rose writes from 4 Rhyl Street, Kentish Town, N.W.5: "I shall be pleased if you will kindly allow me to make my annual appeal on behalf of the Rhyl Street Mission. I need help for the Poor's Purse especially, as there is distress amongst the aged and infirm, and the 'poor' are always with us. Parcels of new and cast-off clothing, toys for the little ones and books for the Sunday School Library will be gratefully received."

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Ballymoney (co. Antrim).—Capt. James McKay has been awarded the Military Cross for gallantry in France.

Chorley.—A Sale of Work in aid of the school renovation was held on Saturday, December 1. Mr. Arthur Karfoot, a local Congregationalist, presided, while the opening ceremony was performed by Mr. J. Percy Taylor of Bolton, a trustee of the chapel. The preparations for the sale and the proceedings of the day were of the heartiest character, and resulted in a return of £110. The oldest member of the congregation set an example by a donation of £20.

Colne.—A Gold and Silver Tree and Sale of Work was held in the Stanley Street schoolroom on Saturday afternoon, December 1. There was a good attendance at the opening, which was presided over by Mr. J. T. Bibby of Burnley, the opener being Mr. L. H. Clegg of Bury. In the evening the schoolroom was crowded. The whole effort was most successful, the proceeds for the day exceeding £86.

Ilford.—On Saturday last a well attended and successful Sale of Work was held on behalf of the Church Funds. Mr. E. R. Fyson presided at the opening ceremony, which was performed by Mr. B. V. Storr. During the evening selections were rendered by the orchestra, under the conductorship of Mr. Bartlett, and a musical and dramatic entertainment was contributed by the younger members of the Church and their friends.

Leicester.—The following letter, printed in the December calendar of the Great Meeting, has been addressed to the congregation by Dr. R. F. Rattray, the newly appointed minister: "Mrs. Rattray and I would like to express to you our sincere thanks for the kindness with which you have received us; we are indeed grateful. We, of course, regard it as an honour to come to the Great Meeting with its noble traditions, and it is our earnest desire to try to carry on these traditions, to help in making the church as deeply and widely influential as it can be—in the great and high things of the Spirit; in the deep joy of religion, the beauty and happiness and strength of a community bound together by affection, common beliefs and aspirations, common worship of God, and practical works of good."

Nottingham.—The High Pavement Chapel Chronicle for December contains as frontispiece a reproduction of the beautifully carved board, setting forth some details of the origin of the congregation and the freedom of their worship, which now stands in front of the Chapel. It is the gift of Mr. A. H. Woolley, and is said to be in every way suitable to its place and purpose. A postcard can be obtained with the same reproduction upon it. The work has been executed by Messrs. Hatch & Co., of Lancaster, who were also responsible for the oak choir stalls presented by the late Mr. Charles Hawksley, whose death is greatly regretted by his friends in Nottingham.—The death is recorded, with much regret, of Sergt.-Major H. C. Raistrick, who has succumbed to wounds received in France, and of his friend Gibson, another of the old scholars, who has been killed in action. Several others on the Roll of Honour have been wounded, some seriously, and Lieut. Cyril Blurton has been reported "missing."—A message from the congregation, which was approved at the Annual Soirée on October 30, and which is being sent by Mr. Ballantyne to the High Pavement men with the forces, is as follows: "That in the midst of the happy conduct of this Annual Social Gathering, our thoughts are with our men who fight for us and for the freedom in which alone our cause in this chapel and school can flourish in years to come. To them all we send our affectionate greetings, and every good wish for blessings in the New Year." The message is printed on a khaki-coloured leaflet, embellished with the Union Jack and Royal Standard, and bearing on the back a poem, 'Sons of the Motherland,' by the Rev. W. G. Tarrant. Each child in the Sunday school has written a letter, and by this means each man and officer has received one. Woollen comforts and other gifts have also been sent.

Nantwich.—The 229th Anniversary Services were held on Sunday, the 9th inst. at the Presbyterian Church. The preacher in the morning was the minister, the Rev. J. Park Davies, B.A., B.D. The evening service was conducted by Mr. D. W. Ross, M.A., of Willaston School, who took for the subject of his most instructive address, "Dr. Joseph Priestley, Minister of the Chapel, 1758-61." Solos were rendered by Miss E. Wright, and the services were bright and successful throughout.

MARRIAGES.

BOWRING—SMITH.—On December 8, at the Parish Church, Knutsford, by the Vicar, the Rev. Canon Evans, Captain Harold Bowring, R.A.M.C., fourth son of the late Charles Bowring, of St. John's, Newfoundland, and Mrs. Bowring, of "Chiselhurst," Sefton Park, Liverpool, to Margaret Doris, daughter of the late Sidney Smith, of Withington, Manchester, and of Mrs. Lowther, Knutsford.

SWANN—WILLIAMS.—On December 4, at the Parish Church, Wrexham, by the Rev. R. J. Hopkins, Vicar of Hatton, Warwickshire, uncle of the bride, and the Rev. Canon Davies, Vicar of Wrexham, Major Humphrey Swann, K.E.H., youngest son of Mr. and Mrs. J. F. Swann, of Oakfield, Wimbledon Common, to Ruth Nightingale, elder daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Williams, Egerton House, Wrexham.

DEATHS.

DARBISHIRE.—On December 6, at Plas Celyn, Penmaenmawr, Sarah Agnes, daughter of the late Samuel Dukinfield Darbishire, of Pendyffryn, Penmaenmawr, aged 78.

SHANNON.—On December 8, at Gidleigh House, Shaa Road, East Acton, Ester Westerdale, widow of the late Rev. John Shannon, aged 85.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

The address for our Belgian Hospital Fund, to which cheques and parcels of clothing should be sent, is Mrs. Bernard Allen, 14 Gainsborough Gardens, Hampstead, N.W.3.

NEVER a Christmas so bitter as this, we fear must be the verdict of countless people in many lands. If we in the British Isles have suffered less than others, we have undoubtedly suffered much, if not so much as we might have expected. No need in this place to describe the woes, privations, pains and anxieties that shadow the whole population—unless there be, indeed, selfish creatures among us not even yet roused to human feeling But there is need to stir ourselves from every disposition to sink beneath our sea of troubles. Especially upon those of us who have hitherto been brave to believe in goodness, to hope for its growth in the soul and in the world, and to endeavour to raise natural affections to their highest, there rests a responsibility of peculiar gravity. They, of all people, owe it to the gallant lads abroad to be gallant at home. "What shall separate us"—that must be the word for the hour—"What shall separate us from Love?"—from the love of God, everywhere and at all times sure, but to us most sweetly manifest in the love of dear souls, ay, and from us made manifest, let us humbly believe, to those to whom we are dear. "A bit of English holly," that was the one thing above all others that a Colonial friend decided he must bear away with him on his setting sail this week. Good for us if we see the truly sacramental meaning of the feast, shadowed as it must be, and discern the spirit within its material tokens.

SIR HENRY NEWBOLT has just published a book on the ever romantic theme of those knights and soldiers of by-gone ages whose fame is brought freshly from one generation to another before the admiring youth of our land. He tells of Bayard, Roland, the Black Prince, du Guesclin, and so on, brave and chivalrous heroes, who with the most eager passion for victory combined a scorn for foul means of obtaining it—preferring, indeed, to lose it rather than part with honour and self-respect. And this temper, Sir Henry maintains, we believe with ample justification, dwells in the breasts of our British army at the front, contrasting with the ruthless and savage conduct of their foes. Surely there is not a headmaster in our land but would wish to lay the impress of such examples on the young hearts entrusted to his influence; there can be no father in England who would not wish that his son should be a true knight after this model. We note, however, that Lord Rothermere, speaking as he claims for the whole of the Air Board, has declared its policy in respect of raids on innocent non-combatants to be that of "an eye for an eye." The plea of military sigrificance and effect is urged no longer, and we are now unequivocally committed, it appears, despite all the weight of the urgent remonstrances that have been made, to the brutal methods of the German air command. The pity of it—and the shame!

DR. ELIZABETH GARRETT ANDERSON, pioneer of women in the medical profession, and the first woman to be chosen mayor in this country, has passed away, full of years and of honours. The story of her valiant fight against the forces of ignorant prejudice should be read again, both by those who doubt the real advance of human society, and those who still have to contend with the same blind opposition. Like her great contemporary, Florence Nightingale, she refused to be relegated to the fruitless paths considered by a past generation the only proper ones for women to pursue, and her great mind and heart gave a rich harvest to the world. It is a little piquant to be reminded of these things just when wise heads have been gravely shaken in the House of Lords over the proposition to let women have a recognised share in the political life of the nation.

WE have just received the programme of the Eighth Congress of the National Federation of Religious Liberals in the United States, which was held in Boston November 25 and 26; Professor J. H. Holmes of Swarthmore College, Pa., is the President of the Federation, and our good friend and ally, Dr. C. W. Wendte, Secretary. Among the Vice-Presidents are leaders in various denominations, Friends, Baptists, Independents, and others. Services and meetings were held at the Unitarian Church, Arlington Street, the Central Congregational Church, Channing Hall, and the Church of the New Jerusalem; and the platform of speakers was correspondingly inclusive. Among other addresses was one by that grand old veteran, Dr. Charles W. Eliot, his subject being 'World Problems born of the War'; we shall be glad to have it in due time to add to the other important and strengthening utterances he has given in the years since the War began. Neither we, nor our aims, religious and international, have a more sterling friend than he. Next week we hope to find room in our columns for a letter by his son, Dr. Samuel A. Eliot which fully corroborates what we hear from other quarters as to the whole-hearted resolves with which the States are pursuing their task in the war.

IN The Liberal Christian for January, which, we observe, is edited by our friend Mr. E. Capleton, an interesting communication is printed from Mr. H. G. Wells on the subject of "God." It is in reply to a correspondent who put three questions to him relating to the views contained in his book 'God, the Invisible King,' and the substance is as follows:—

1. My idea is that while Man is God is. But I do not believe that Man or God will ever end.

2. I don't think the Veiled Being is God. It has, I admit, been thought of as God. But I restrict my use of the word God, to the God of the Heart, the Spirit of Mankind. Men are polytheists whatever creed they profess until they realise the unity and soildarity of mankind, and thereby the oneness of the God who inspires us all. I do not know whether the universe is ONE. The universe of any science certainly is. I think you are wrong in saying that all science proves that all things are inter-related. It assumes—how can it prove what it assumes? Anything not related is outside its cognisance. These are philosophic questions outside the scope of religion.

3. Certainly God is God in my heart. He is inseparable from the good in me. I have been a good deal bored (if you will forgive me) by that ancient quip, "Man makes God in his own Image." What use has man for anything but the humanity of God? Can man conceive of God in any other way? Writers on religion seem to keep that sentence on a rubber stamp nowadays. Did you expect me to proclaim the worship of a lobster multiplied by the cube root of X blended with a sewing machine?

All which is very characteristic, but whether helpful or not, the admirers and students of the novelist's theology must judge.

MR. DEBENDRA NATH MITRA, who came to this country in October last year, commended by the joint committee of the Brahmo Samajes as Indian student, and has held the British and Foreign Unitarian Association's scholarship at Manchester College, Oxford, and whose academic career has had to be shortened owing to the many difficulties of the present time, sailed for Calcutta this week. As may be well understood, there has been some trouble to get a passage just now, and at one moment it looked as if he was doomed to a rather lengthened postponement of his return. Happily this has been averted, and Mr. Mitra will, we trust, get home safely, to bear our good wishes to all our old friends in his native land. In no part of our Empire are there more interesting possibilities, or perhaps more serious problems, than in India; every friendly link between us will assuredly be a gain.

THE UNDERFLOW.

OH, blest the souls that see and hear
The things of God to-day revealed,
Of old, to longing saint and seer,
Within the future closely sealed:

The stir of nations near and far,
The wakened hearts that beat as one,
The flow of peace, the ebb of war,
The passing night, the risen sun!

Be ours the vision, ours the will
To follow, though the faithless ban,
The love that triumphs over ill,
The trust in God and hope for man.

And Thou whose tides of purpose bear
These mortal lives that come and go,
Give us to feel through toil and prayer
Thy deep eternal underflow!

KEEPING CHRISTMAS.

CHRISTMAS is with us once again. The contrast between what is going on in France and the spirit of the Christmas season seems intolerable. We are bewildered and dismayed by the apparent contradiction. On the one hand we see violence and destruction and armed hosts of men arrayed for mutual slaughter; on the other we are reminded of the words Peace and goodwill among men, and of the love and gentleness of Jesus. To some it seems that Christmas joy and peace are a mere mockery under such circumstances. They would deny us the right to it as some Churchmen would deny the sacrament to those whose lives were involved in sin. We are, as they think, engaged in two incompatible tasks, fighting our enemies and celebrating the birth of Jesus. We should be more honest, if we are determined to fight on, in suspending any Christmas celebration. Certainly mere lip homage to the Gospel of Love would be nauseous and hypocritical if we are acting all the time in flagrant violation of his spirit and his life.

But for those who are sadly convinced that no just and permanent peace can yet be made, there is at least no hypocrisy in keeping Christmas. The contrast between the actual and the ideal is indeed appalling, but it is not a contrast which should make us feel ashamed to think of the ideal.

The most awful mockery of worship which a man can offer is the incense of an ideal of which his whole life and spirit is a contradiction. To such worship the scathing words of Isaiah were spoken: "Bring no more vain oblations: incense is an abomination unto me. Your new moons and your appointed feasts my soul hateth: they are a trouble unto me: I am weary to bear them. And when ye spread forth your hands I will hide mine eyes from you: yea, when ye make many prayers I will not hear. Your hands are full of blood. Wash you, make you clean: put away the evil of your doings from before my sight. Cease to do evil: learn to do well."

These words were spoken by the Prophet in the name of God to men whose conduct was in flagrant opposition to their worship. Humbly but confidently we assert that this opposition between our actions and our ideals is not true for us. We believe that we are acting under the compulsion of our sense of right. We believe that to leave our task half finished through weariness or through despair would mean greater suffering and greater evil for the world in days to come. We are horror-stricken at the contrast between what is and what ought to be, but we are not ashamed.

For those of us who feel this, the Christmas ideal of peace and love and joy is more and not less precious, more and not less real and certain because of its contrast with the present agony. The Kingdom of God is not merely a distant dream. We want to feel the truth of these great words of Jesus, "The Kingdom of God is within you." Every great ideal truly held is not merely a distant hope, it is a present possession. It is not merely possible, it is capable of immediate inward realisation, however much outward circumstances may seem to contradict it. The Christmas spirit of love and joy ought to be ours to-day. We can rejoice in the affections and goodness of our friends. We can rejoice in the beauty of the world. We can rejoice above all in the confidence that men and nations have been made for peace and goodwill and that we are called to realise that ideal. To allow present conditions to kill that joy means that we have lost faith in it. To believe in it is to find beauty and good even in the darkest hours. It is not destroyed by sorrow or by pain. "Your joy no man taketh from you."

In the life of Jesus we see the ideal for man, and because we believe that his life revealed the will and love of God, we believe that the ideal of his life may be realised by all. In that faith there is inward peace and strength.

TOMMY'S RELIGION—NOW, AND THEN.

BY "EX-GUNNER."

"I'M not fighting for religion and not one man in the Imperial Forces sees religion or anything beautiful in war."

The statement was made to the writer in a base hospital in Mesopotamia, and the speaker was a 1914 man who had fought in France, Gallipoli, and the attempted relief of Kut. At first sight it gives the lie to the many who would forgive the evil of war and condone the immoral futility of it on moral and social if not strictly religious grounds.

Over and over again have we soldiers been told by clergymen, and others at the Back, that we are carrying on this sanguinary slaughter in order that future generations may be spared the bloodshed; that we are sacrificing the fathers in order that the children may be saved. In short, they would designate war as a species of justifiable homicide, and would pass sentence accordingly. Do these voluble comforters realise that it is the men who, like themselves, see nothing of War the Absolute Reality, who need the solace of this aspect of things? It is a delusion, from which many people suffer, that the soldier whilst actually at the front, and particularly whilst in the front line, is in a super-normal state of mind, and that, being in such a condition, he flies naturally to religion as the great comfort in all his sufferings. Why do we imagine, however, that the man who is non-religious when he is safely tucked away in a training camp will resolve into a sudden convert the first time he is subjected to the ordeal of shell-fire? Surely it is apparent that, on such an occasion, time for consideration has passed. This leads to a very important point and one on which the whole argument of the "religious optimists" pivots.

They say that at the front Tommy is brought face to face with dangers which "make him think." Such, undoubtedy, is the fact, but it is not when he is actually facing the danger that his mind is so occupied. It is during those long, awful hours of sitting in a trench waiting for no one knows what that the fighting man gets not only time to think but even to philosophise, and when a soldier has been at the Gates of Death for twelve hours and knows not how soon he may receive another summoning call, he does not sit down and think about politics! In every man that passes through the hell of war there is born naturally and spontaneously a spark of speculation.

I would not call it religion, for that term, for many, has come to mean the rules and commandments of a man-formed, man-ruled Church run on business lines, a strange mixture of mystic ritualism and ancient history; and yet I would have it that in its true significance this new sense—if it can so be termed—is religion in the truest and noblest meaning of the word. Strange though it may seem, the man's platoon serjeant is far more likely to discover its existence than is the chaplain; in fact, the latter would often and again disclaim its presence because an attempted "religious" discussion does not reveal it. Yet the "padre" must not be blamed—rather should the present army methods which govern him be censured. Under existing conditions the chaplain holds a commission, lives with officers, and the majority of his intimate friends in the battalion wear the Sam Browne belt. To a certain extent he comes into close contact with the men of the rank and file, but if he is to discover and encourage that seed of speculation he must live with them, and not only that, but he must lead their life. In every Englishman there is bred a feeling that to "hold forth" is bad form, and that the deeper feelings and emotions are not suited for topics of discussion. If the seeker, therefore, goes among the men and hopes to hear the things that will indicate this hidden spark he will be disappointed. Rather let him look into the face of that man who is "sticking it" in the muddy trench or the damp, unlighted dug out. For this thing is no myth but an all-important reality.

War is not so much now a conflict of men as an inferno of machinery. This being so, men say, war is stripped of its former glory. Is this so? If there be no glory in war how is it that it can still elevate men's nature? We are apt to forget that the man serving a 9-in howitzer in defence of England is doing work equally as inspiring as he who defends his child from an attacking animal. There is glory in the task even if the soldier be merely shoeing horses at a veterinary depôt. Yes, you say, but there is nothing ennobling in the act of releasing a high explosive shell for the purpose of exterminating a dozen men concealed half a mile away; armaments may be equal but the odds are not. True, but go and talk to those gunners. A few hundred yards in advance of them is a battalion of infantry. In ten minutes those men are going to take their lives in their hands by making an attack on the enemy lines. Until those ten minutes have expired those entrenched men have handed their lives over to their brothers behind the guns. There you have the source of the main stream of Mr. Atkins's religion. On every individual man depends the future of his comrades—life or death, restoration or bereavement. How could it do other than bring the noblest qualities from a human nature? As in the bigger things so the same spirit and ideal flows right through to the most trivial and commonplace details of war. The man in the armoury fitting rifles with the humble "pull-through and four-by-two" knows that if his sense of duty fails his pal up in the front line will have a dirty rifle which will "jam" at the critical moment, and then....?

Duty and discipline, you call it? Aye, but it is something far higher and nobler than that. That man has seen his comrade fall in a counter attack; he has seen his chum's face and has heard his last words; he has seen the flame of his spirit illuminate his eyes before it was finally extinguished—and, consequently, his religion is not of the mystical sort, to probe into which is to profane, but something built on a bedrock foundation.

At the front man, in the high sense of the name, meets man. All are thrown together as one large family. All learn the Great Lesson; there are no petty bickerings over conventionalities of denomination or ritual. Shrapnel does not discriminate between the Dissenter and the Churchman. The common ideal is of necessity, and later of desire—esprit de corps; and even that can be ennobled high above its own elevated standard. Tommy rapidly becomes a fatalist because he is driven to it, but, at best, this is a blind faith. Soon his intellect asserts itself and he asks: "Who or What is Fate?" and ultimately he answers his own query to the satisfaction of his own soul.

The churches are optimistic. They anticipate larger congregations and sincerer worship "when the boys come home," because the war has taught men to "think" and to realise their "spiritual obligations." Whether the Churches can conscientiously congratulate themselves as having achieved this end is another question, but do they realise that this sudden awakening of "thought" may prove a never-equalled danger to their own ideas and teachings? Have they considered that perhaps Tommy's religion, which is high, pure, and sincere, is not that of the Churches? They must not forget that the home-coming soldier has grasped ideals that to him are as real as his love for his wife, concealed by no "mysteries" and bound up in no ritual. He wants something tangible. The former ideas will not satisfy him; he will cease to be comforted by a "religion" which must be taken for granted because "it was so"; from his boyhood he was taught that to apply his reasoning powers in getting to the root of things was almost a sacrilege—this will no longer suffice. Remember that war has taken him down to a rock-bottom. Either the Church must change or the new spark of life born in the soul of Tommy Atkins. Which?

Obviously, then, it is the duty of the Church, and of all connected with it, to prepare for this great homecoming. No true soldier would for a moment discourage the good work that has been done among the men, and many a brave "padre" has fallen on the field of honour; but do not overlook the fact that a chaplain's duty is spiritual. At present it has a dangerous tendency to develop into something purely social. To arrange a whist drive in the Church Army Hut behind the line is excellent and very necessary work, but it cannot be called religion. Just recently the rector of a comfortable living has sacrificed all to join the ranks. Would that many more of our able-bodied clerics could do the same! If, instead of accepting chaplaincies, some of the clergy would follow the example of this man, they would, if only they could be brought to realise it, be doing far nobler work for their Great Commander-in-Chief than they could from under the protection of a commission. I repeat that one must live with the men, suffer the same hardships, endure the same privations, and face the same dangers both actual and moral; that war is not one long, exciting whirl of shells and machine-gun bullets; that it is during the tedious, monotonous days of waiting that Tommy "thinks"; and that he who would find and foster the newly ignited spiritual spark must "wait" also.

On His Majesty's Troopship C——, which carried vast numbers of troops to the eastern theatres of war, the chaplain was a lance-corporal. He wore no distinguishing uniform and followed exactly the same routine as the other men. He was popular and respected by both officers and the rank and file, and yet this was not because, in the absence of a commissioned chaplain, he conducted the parade service on Sundays. The reason for it would be difficult to define, yet I have seen many a man restrain an otherwise none-too-clean word because the "unofficial padre" was present. The moral is significantly obvious.

When the boys come home again it will be "roses all the way"—for a time! Hero worship will compensate many evils for weeks, even months; but after that the great struggle to live will re-commence, and with that struggle will return the ex-Tommy's philosophy on life itself. The spark will flare up, and it is the duty of the Church to see that it is not crushed and extinguished by a narrow-minded attitude of cold, severe, and formal sympathy.

THOREAU AS PIONEER.*

THOUGH there is no desire on the part of humanitarians to claim a larger share in Thoreau than is their due—and certainly it would be a rash act to attempt in any way to label him, many-sided, combative, and paradoxical as he was—it is safe to say that no reader of the numerous references to ethical questions in his journals, or of the remarkable chapter in 'Walden' entitled 'Higher Laws,' can doubt for a moment that Thoreau was, in the main, a very pronounced pioneer of the humanitarian movement. What, for example, as a statement of the central principle of humanitarianism — expressed by the League in its assertion that "it is iniquitous to inflict avoidable suffering on any sentient being"—could be clearer than the following passage from the Journal?

"Do we live inhumanely toward man or beast, in thought or act? The least conscious and needless injury inflicted on any creature is, to an extent, a suicide. What peace, or life, can a murderer have?"

Here we find an explicit adhesion to the belief in the universal kinship of all sentient beings; nor, when we pass to particulars, do we find Thoreau in any way untrue to this faith. The noble part which he played in support of the anti-slavery agitation has been dealt with by a previous speaker; so, too, has his practice of the simple life; and simplification of living, I would point out, is closely akin to anti-slavery, for its object is to avoid, on the one hand, becoming enslaved to the so-called luxuries by which many men are encumbered, and on the other to avoid enslaving the workers by whom those luxuries are produced. When we turn from the human to the lower races, we find in Thoreau's writings the same considerate regard for others. His views may be summed up in what he said in reference to sport, that "no humane being, past the thoughtless age of boyhood, will wantonly murder any creature which holds its life by the same tenure as he does"; and of the diet-question, that, "whatever my own practice may be, I have no doubt that it is part of the destiny of the human race to leave off eating animals, as surely as the savage tribes have left off eating each other, when they came in contact with the more civilised."

Of special significance was his appearance as a herald of the humaner study of Natural History, as distinguished from the clumsy old-fashioned method which killed in order to observe. Thoreau's position in this respect is well illustrated by one of the anecdotes related of him. "Do you mean to tell us, Mr. Thoreau," so someone said, "that you don't shoot a bird when you want to study it?" To which Thoreau replied: "Do you think I should shoot you, if I wanted to study you?" There, in a nut-shell, was the whole principle of the more modern Natural History—the recognition of the truth that there is no essential difference between human and non-human, and that what really concerns us is the study not of the dead specimen but of the living being.

It was this prophetic element in Thoreau—for he might well be called a prophet-naturalist as well as a "poet-naturalist"—that so long delayed his fame as a writer. He offended many prejudices; and the influence of the literary cliques, instigated by Lowell, was against him from the first. But personal force and integrity are bound to triumph in the long run over the bias of critics; and it is important to note how deep an impression Thoreau made both on the friends who knew him personally, and on later generations of readers. Emerson, Alcott, Ellery Channing, Blake, Ricketson, Higginson, Sanborn—there could hardly have been a more diverse set of men than those who called him friend; yet from each and all of them came the same testimony to his greatness of intellect and of heart. Mr. Blake wrote to me thus of the effect of Thoreau's letters:—

"As I re-read them, I am apt to find new significance in them; am still warned and instructed by them, with more force occasionally than ever before; so that in a sense they are still in the mail, have not altogether reached me yet, and will not, probably, before I die."

Strange stories are told of this magnetic influence of Thoreau's writings. It is said that a poor Russian Jew, who came across a few loose pages of 'Walden,' was so moved by what he read there that he emigrated to America, mainly from a desire to obtain the book, and if possible to translate it into his own language. In like manner, a few years after Thoreau's death, a student named Harrington came to Concord from a far western State to learn more of Thoreau, and told Channing that he, a stranger, had been more moved by the story of Thoreau's death than by that of anyone else, however near and dear to him. Such things do not, and cannot, happen in the case of anyone who, however talented, is "cold" and "misanthropic," as Thoreau has been represented by those who do not understand him. It is true that he did not "wear his heart upon his sleeve"; but an undertone of deep feeling runs through all his writings for those who have ears to hear it. There is a passage in one of his journals, remarkable equally for the beauty of its cadences and the depth of its feeling, which might well stand for his epitaph:—

"My greatest skill has been to want but little. For joy I could embrace the earth. I shall delight to be buried in it. And then I think of those among men who will know that I love them, though I tell them not."

There are some of us who do know it. I was once told by Mr. Sanborn of a scene he had witnessed, many years after Thoreau's death, when certain visitors at his house were repeating to Ellery Channing one of the many fretful criticisms of Thoreau, and received only this laconic reply: "I knew him." And this, in substance, must always be our answer to those who misinterpret Thoreau's message and belittle his genius: "We know him."

BOOKS AND REVIEWS.

A PRIEST OF THE IDEAL. By Stephen Graham. London: Macmillan & Co. 7*s.* 6*d.* net.

WE are among those who believe that Mr. Stephen Graham has never done anything so good as his early books on Russia. It is true that he had the advantage of an undiscovered land, and his tendency to mistake romance for reality could not be tested by most of his readers; but over and above all this there was the conviction of a man who sees and enjoys, which is absent from this fantasia about the spiritual condition of England. He is in agreement with Mr. Chesterton that the source of everything noble in English life is to be found in Christian legend. Glastonbury, St. Joseph of Arimathea and the Holy Thorn are for him the mystic seed of the future. But a writer who wants to make history after his own pattern in order to serve a pre-conceived theory needs a gift of more hearty assurance than Mr. Graham possesses. The fire of dogmatism must be in his blood. He must be able to bludgeon his readers into belief. A tepid stream of vague sentiment leaves them at the end listless and unconvinced. Nor does he seem to us more happy in his character-drawing of the people who go on a spiritual pilgrimage in a motor-car, with their experiments in platonic affection and their love episodes by the way. At the end Hampden, the voluble idealist, joins the army, and this is his epitaph: "Hampden died. He participated in three great movements, but in the first great rush he was killed. He killed no German, and like many another marshalled into the ranks against his will, he never intended to kill." Apparently, Mr. Graham does not see that he is branding his hero with indelible shame. To go quietly into the army without any protest, and then to betray the soldier's trust is not the part of a good man, and a sentimental religious pose will not save him from the contempt which he deserves.

THE WILL TO FREEDOM. By John Neville Figgis, D.D. London: Longmans, Green & Co. 6*s.* net.

DR. FIGGIS'S volume contains a series of lectures delivered in America on the Gospel of Nietzsche and the Gospel of Christ. It is eloquent, candid and incisive; but it suffers a little from prolixity, and from a tendency to take Nietzsche too seriously. Many people will find in it what they want, for it is neither a tirade of hostility nor an attempt to explain away what is violent and repulsive in his teaching. He analyses the sources of Nietzsche's popularity with great care, and mentions among other things his "electric style," his fondness for "switching on bright lights," and his gift of epigram, qualities of which Dr. Figgis, remembering the mannerisms of his own writing, is likely to be an indulgent judge. Whether the subject is worth this elaborate treatment is open to question, for the popularity of Nietsche in certain intellectual coteries has upon it the marks of a transient fashion. Colossal egotism, full of sound and fury, even when it is combined with some elements of genius, can make no permanent impression on the world. When the shouting has died away a few snatches of poetry, which shine with a strange lustre in the barren tracts of modern German literature, and a clouded life which ended in madness, will supply Nietzsche with very faint claims to a place among the immortals.

WEEKLY NOTES.

MISS HOLMES writes: "The aeroplanes which flew over on the 5th did much more damage than on previous visits. There were more wounded than your numbers, but reports vary. The windows of your usual room were not broken though the neighbouring ones were, but you would have had a very lively time and I am thankful you were not there. All the windows of the big building opposite were broken and all down the narrow street. The shops are boarded up but are gradually opening and selling by the light of the doorways. Here we were all calm and quite lively in the cellar—we did not know how much was going on, but we smelt sulphur and knew the Place was full of smoke. We have had two false alarms this week."

A letter from a chaplain this week says: "The Sisters of —— have been obliged to leave their convent at last owing to the bombardment. They had heroically stayed there ever since the war looking after the wounded. These sisters are now taking charge of a Colonie Scolaire in —— and have seventy to eighty boys in their charge. They are greatly in need of knickerbockers, stockings, and shirts for their boys of 12 to 14 years. If you can possibly send them any of these garments you will be doing a real service to these children."

We have sent off several packets of shirts and stockings by post, to save time, and we shall send more as soon as we can. The transport of goods for civilians is very slow now, as all military goods take precedence in the boats, so we often send urgent small things by post, as we can be sure then of their arriving within a week.

THE DAY OF NATIONAL PRAYER AND THANKSGIVING.

THE following letter has been sent to the ministers and congregations of the National Conference, signed by the President of the National Conference and the President of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association:—

DEAR FRIENDS AND BRETHREN,

It is known to you all that our King has issued a Proclamation calling upon all his subjects to observe the first Sunday of the New Year as "a special day of Prayer and Thanksgiving." It is not necessary that we should exhort you to a loyal and hearty compliance with His Majesty's command, but it seems to us desirable, as representing the group of Churches to which we all belong, that we should welcome the call of our good Sovereign and engage ourselves to join with our fellow worshippers throughout the British Dominions in giving effect to it. We may hold different views as to the nature and efficacy of Prayer, but there can surely be no difference among us in accepting it as a spiritual force, a communion with God, which strengthens all that is highest and best in us and animates us to effort and self-surrender. And, whatever our views may be about the present war, one thing is certain, that we are all alike involved in the tremendous catastrophe which has overwhelmed the whole world, all share in the mourning and horror, and, to some small extent, in the privations and sufferings which war has brought with it.

We are as men at sea, overtaken by a fierce storm. "They are carried up to the heaven and down again to the deep; their soul melteth away because of the trouble. They reel to and fro and stagger like a drunken man and are at their wit's end. Then they cried unto the Lord in their trouble." It is the irrepressible instinct of the human soul. If we are wise we shall not expect the intervention of the Divine Potentate—that he will send His Angels to fight for us or send out His lightnings and scatter our enemies—but it remains true as of old that our "help cometh of the Lord," that by spiritual, not by material forces is the issue determined.

You will have observed that the King does not ask us to pray for victory. Our enemies, equally with ourselves, all who have retained any faith in a God of righteousness, appeal to Him. But He makes no answer while the battle rages on and victory sways from side to side. It is not so we think that Prayer works. "We pray and have not—because we ask amiss," ask for what God does not give, for what Prayer cannot attain. What our King asks of us is to pray for spiritual gifts, "for clear-sightedness and strength," "that we may be enlightened in our understanding and fortified in our courage." In this we are surely at one, as we are in the longing for peace. We may differ about the terms on which we ought to accept it, on the way we should go about to attain it, but none of us desires that it should come in the end because we have grown tired and faint-hearted and dull. Let us, then, be at one on the appointed Sunday to offer to God our prayers that we "may be strengthened with might by his spirit in the inner man." Let us lay aside, at least, for that one day our conflicting views, and seek God's help and guidance for ourselves and all mankind in the sore straits in which we find ourselves.

J. ESTLIN CARPENTER,
President of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association.

CHARLES HARGROVE,
President of the National Conference.

INDUSTRIAL PROBLEMS OF TO-DAY AND AFTER.

ADDRESS BY LORD LEVERHULME AT HUDDERSFIELD.

ON November 4 Lord Leverhulme delivered an address, under the auspices of the Fitzwilliam Street Social Union, in the Town Hall, Huddersfield, on 'Industrial Problems of To-day and After,' defending the proposition that "To make good the wastage of this war....all able-bodied men and women, from school age to dotage, of all ranks and stations, shall be workers for six hours each day for six days each week." The Rev. Robert A. Dickson, who presided, emphasised the fact that any scheme of reconstruction upon which those in authority embarked would, in future, have to provide for the development of the "human element" if an improved condition of things was to be looked for, and deprecated strongly the attitude of antagonism now existing between the workers and the employers, which promoted industrial war rather than the spirit of brotherhood and of the family.

Lord Leverhulme, who was very warmly received by the crowded audience, said they all had their ideals, and he was one of those who believed that life was only sweetened by ideals. There were many problems to solve, the greatest of which was to end the war victoriously. When the war was over there would be an enormous debt, which now totalled towards £5,000,000,000—if it was prolonged many more years it would be £10,000,000,000—and whatever problem we had to face we could not omit to realise the burden of taxation that would hang round our necks. One of the solutions suggested was the confiscation of wealth. He had always voted for the graduated taxation of wealth up to the requirements of the State, and graduated death duties, because in the first case he held it was a stimulus to increased production, and in the second the contribution was in exchange for the protection the maker of the wealth had received from the State to enable him to produce his wealth. But the confiscation of wealth would act in the opposite direction, as a discourager. If they confiscated plant and machinery to-day it might require renewing in twenty years. They could not ask the workmen to provide the new machinery without wages. Having done away with capital, the only way in which they could pay these wages was out of the produce of the mill that was being built. As workmen must have their wages each week, they came back again to capital, and would have to raise it in one way or other, whether that capital was held by the State or private individuals. Quoting from the income-tax returns, he arrived at the conclusion that if they eliminated salaries and the earnings of professional men the confiscation of wealth would amount to only 1*s.* per head of the population per day. It was estimated that three out of every five were workers, including the wives. The non-workers were children and what the Americans called loafers—both rich and poor. The three workers would therefore be entitled to 1*s.* 8*d.* per head per day. This would not abolish poverty.

Lord Leverhulme went on to say that the workers had done much better through their trade unions by bargaining since the war broke out than they could have done by the confiscation of all the wealth of the United Kingdom. There was only one way in which the country's indebtedness could be met, and that was by working. Recent investigations had proved that work that fatigued was not economic, and that there was a point beyond which as human beings they could not possibly go. If they were going to increase their products they must do it by machinery which could be renewed. In those countries where the money invested in plant and machinery was the greatest wages were the highest, and vice versa. Capital was not the enemy. The Indian cotton spinners, who paid 9*d.* for a twelve hours day, where cotton was one of the staple products of the country, appealed for protection not from some country where they paid less and worked longer hours, but against Lancashire, where the hours were less, and the operatives received as many shillings per day as the Hindoo received pence. At the beginning of last century sixteen hours per day were worked by the cotton operatives of Lancashire and Yorkshire. On every attempt to improve these conditions and decrease hours by Lord Shaftesbury and others they were told the country would be ruined, and England would lose her trade. But, on the contrary, industry became more prosperous, output increased, and the cost of production decreased. If they decided upon shifts of six hours each they could work the mills twelve, eighteen, or even continuously twenty-four hours a day instead of eight and a half or so as at present. They would then find this great change, that with increased output all the ordinary reasonable increases of wages could readily be given. It must be a sine qua non that the wages paid for six hours would be the same as were paid for eight hours, otherwise it was obvious that the proposal only meant working short time. If Sir George Newman's committee on the health of munition workers and industrial fatigue was right it was shown that the workers could produce from 40 per cent to 120 per cent greater output per week in consequence of lessened fatigue. But they wanted only 33⅓ per cent in order to get the same produce during six hours as during eight hours. On present lines, unless he was seriously misleading them, they were travelling along beaten paths that their forefathers had travelled. They wanted to rise higher; they could not do it by any redistribution or confiscation of wealth. They could do it by always working reasonable hours in industry and producing more at less cost whilst paying higher wages to the producers.

The final and crowning advantage of all would be the education of the children. Why should not the children of the working man receive the same education as the children of the higher classes? From 14 to 18 there should be compulsory higher grade education; from 18 to 24 compulsory technical and university education for men and women, and still further physical training; and from 24 to 30—and here many people would quarrel with him—training for national service, military service, and the duties of citizenship. He believed a standing army and professional soldiers were a menace to peace, but he believed that a trained citizen army, following peaceful occupations, but in case of emergency prepared to fight and defend their own land, was a guarantee of peace. After that course of education and training there would be a people who did not talk glibly of government by the people for the people, but were capable of governing themselves, and of taking a sound and right view of the laws relating to production and distribution, a people who should make this great Empire continuously prosperous.

A few questions were asked at the close of the address, and Lord Leverhulme received a hearty vote of thanks on the proposal of the Mayor.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Accrington.—On Saturday last a Sale of Work was opened by Dr. Greenhalgh, in connection with the Unitarian Free Church, Mr. J. R. Cameron presiding. The next day an afternoon recital was given by Miss Gladys Barnes, a well-known elocutionist, assisted by Madame Jessie Fulton as vocalist, and Mr. H. Oakton Pickard (organist of the Parish Church) at the organ. In spite of very unfavourable weather the church was well filled, and, as a result of the two efforts, about £40 was raisod. Mr. Greenhalgh is the son of one of the founders of the Church, and Miss Barnes is the granddaughter of another. To both of them tho congregation is frequently indebted for valuable assistance.

Horsham.—The annual Sewing Circle Sale in connection with the Free Christian Church was held on December 6, when a sum of over £23 was realised. A concert was given in the chapel, the programme including two readings by Mrs. Rodger Smith, in addition to various items by members of the choir.—The Band of Mercy concluded its session with a "Pound Night," members bringing fruit, &c., which was divided among the children, who played games in the schoolroom.

Leeds: Holbeck.—The Rev. A. Cobden Smith has resigned his ministry at the Domestic Street Unitarian Chapel, Holbeck, and will terminate his duties there at the end of February next.

Leeds: Hunslet.—The Rev. H. Bernard Hannah has accepted a unanimous invitation from the congregation of the Unitarian Church, and expects to commence his ministry there on the first Sunday in February.

Leytonstone.—On Sunday last a Toy Service was held at "Haydn House," Fairlop Road, in connection with the Leytonstone Free Church, the proceeds of which are to be given to the poor children of Hoxton, a district which contains some of the worst slums of London and has the highest percentage of infant mortality. The service was conducted by Miss Maud Burtt, who emphasised the absolute importance of all work in connection with children at the present time, both nationally and internationally. Immediately after the declaration of peace, she said, thousands of tons of steel, iron, and bricks would be sent across to the Continent for the purpose of reconstructing cities laid waste by the war; but what is of even greater importance is the building up of the human souls who are to inhabit these cities. Carols were sung by the children of the Sunday school, under the direction of Miss Dorice Peterken, and solos were rendered by Miss Joan Bonner and Master F. Peterken. Mrs. J. Peterken presided at the piano.

Lincoln.—On December 16th the High Street Church received a visit from Dr. J. Estlin Carpenter, who lectured on 'Religion in War Time and After.' The lecturer dealt with the many manifestations of the true religious spirit, albeit not identified with any form of organised religion, amongst our fighting men and the civilians. He pointed out the unique opportunity which the war afforded us of realising and combating an evil which was of the same nature, although more vividly presented to our imagination, as the ever-present evils of our social system. He also spoke of the new spirit which must prevail in the Churches of the future, and of the new problems which they must face. The New Year's Social is to be held on January 2nd.

Manchester: a United Group Meeting.—A scheme for a series of United Group Meetings, with ministerial exchanges, was formulated some time ago, at a joint meeting of delegates from the East Cheshire Christian Union, the North and East Lancashire Mission, and the Manchester District Association of Presbyterian and Unitarian Churches. One of the first meetings of the series was held at Pendleton on Saturday, December 8, when Monton and Swinton united with Pendleton at a joint rally, and delegates from Rochdale, Heywood and Todmorden were present. The object of the special group meetings was to stimulate interest in the free faith, and the general subject of the addresses and sermons on Saturday and Sunday was 'The Reconstruction of the Religious Life of our Churches.' In the afternoon a service was conducted in the Pendleton Church by the Rev. F. Munford (of Heywood), the preacher being the Rev. J. Evans (of Rochdale). After the service tea was provided, to which about 100 sat down. A meeting followed presided over by Mr. Hugh J. Broadbent (President of the Manchester District Association). Mr. Ernest Robertson welcomed the delegates on behalf of the Pendleton congregation. Following the Chairman's opening remarks and prayer by the Rev. N. Anderton (of Monton), the Rev. Arthur W. Fox (of Todmorden) delivered an address, in the course of which he reminded those present that they stood for the divine unity of God—a very important thing. There were not three portions or aspects of God—one part creative, another part loving, and another part in-dwelling. God was one. He was a loving Father, not sometimes loving, sometimes wrathful, but always loving. That was their Unitarian faith. Let them be proud of it. Let them be loyal to it. Following Mr. Fox, Alderman Wadsworth (of Todmorden) spoke, and after a short interval for general conversation the Rev. F. Munford continued the consideration of the reconstruction of our religious life. He thought the word reconstruction ill-chosen in this connection. He preferred the word re-vivify. He was told when he left the South that he would find Unitarianism stronger in the North, and on the whole that had been his experience; but there was still room for improvement—for re-energising, or re-vivifying. Alderman David Healey (of Heywood) spoke from the standpoint of a Sunday-school worker, and said that some of the most treasured memories of his life were bound up with the Sunday school. The Rev. G. Randall Jones (lately settled at Pendleton), emphasised the extensive side of the work of reconstruction as being as important as the intensive side, with which other speakers had dealt. What was wanted was a church which should go out to the great masses of the unchurched, seek to understand their needs, and try to win them for Christ. If they wished to make their religion a power in the land they must try to understand the point of view of the masses—the vast millions who were outside all the churches. Most of these were not indifferent to religion, but were bewildered by the many conflicting theologies. Let it be the task of our Free Churches to preach the Gospel to those who to-day hunger and thirst for a faith which shall satisfy the needs of the heart and soul without outraging the dictates of reason and conscience. A vote of thanks was proposed by Mr. J. Wigley, J.P. (Pendleton), seconded by Mr. W. Stott (Swinton), supported by Mr. G. H. Leigh (Monton), and carried unanimously. On Sunday the ministers at Monton, Swinton and Pendleton churches exchanged pulpits with the ministers of Rochdale, Heywood, and Todmorden respectively.

Moira: Co. Down.—The treasurer of the Non-Subscribing Presbyterian congregation, Mr. W. J. Agnew, Quay House, Moira, has been appointed to the Commission of the Peace for Co. Down. Mr. Agnew has been an energetic member of the Moira Rural Council since its formation, and the appreciation of his services is shown by his unanimous election, year after year, as vice-chairman of that body. He also takes a keen interest in the concerns of the Lurgan Board of Guardians, and in all matters affecting the sick and poor of the Union. He is a member of the Moira School Attendance Committee, and the local War Pensions Committee, and gives much time to the work of these bodies.

Newport, I. of W.—The Rev. J. Ruddle has resigned the ministry of the Unitarian Church, and his resignation is expected to take effect at the end of April.

BIRTHS.

BREWITT-TAYLOR.—On December 15, at Inglefield, Potter's Bar, Evelyn, wife of Captain R. Brewitt-Taylor, R.A.M.C., of a son.

STRACHAN.—On December 15, at 15 Salmon Grove, Hull, to Dorothy (née Partington) and Charles Maxwell Strachan a son.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

The address for our Belgian Hospital Fund, to which cheques and parcels of clothing should be sent, is Mrs. Bernard Allen, 14 Gainsborough Gardens, Hampstead, N.W.3.

THE Poet Laureate, in a Christmas Eve poem, gave melodious welcome and "many happy returns" to the "sweet Babe" who came to save the poor, and to sow good seed in the world; and, despite war, pain, filth, and wrong, refused—on the part of the Babe's folk—to be "quell'd in dead dismay." He has a vision of England's gentle children, not only bent on conquering the ills that afflict the poor at home, but as the Christ's "simple apostles" of the world to come, carrying abroad the living seed of the living bread, so that at last his Peace and Love shall "hallow all our care and teen" and "bind in fellowship all the folk of the earth." To all which let all good people say "Amen," and, with Dr. Bridges, refuse to be dismayed even when confronted by such a year as is about to open. Our King, happily, is of that kind that leaves prophecy to the appointed prophet; not caring to emulate the style of his Kaiser relative, whose Christmas utterances must surely be an added affliction to any of his subjects possessing a remnant of humour, modesty, or reverence.

IN the address of the Premier last week on the eve of the parliamentary recess, a note of unmistakable gravity was blended with the firmness of resolution which we rightly expect from the head of the British Government. A great many of the most thoughtful in our land, and not in ours only, have undoubtedly read his latest words with deep attention; and the general verdict is one of more reassurance than such people have been able to gather from some utterances presumably representing the views of the War Cabinet. Of his discussion of the military situation there is no necessity to speak here. The matter which most concerns us, as touching the very centre and mainspring of our share in the vast efforts we are called upon to make, is the clearing up of our position with regard to the aims of the Allies. If there are still questions of high importance which remain unanswered, at any rate, to the satisfaction of some of the critics, native or foreigners, of British policy, the main points appear much more definite than a little while ago; and, as outlined by Mr. Lloyd George, and substantially approved by Mr. Asquith, they should have a useful influence in the councils of Europe and America. In particular, the Premier's insistence on restoration and reparation to the small States that have been victims of German and Austrian invasion, and his support of the proposal for a real League of Nations, together with his moderate tone in discussing the future of territories now in Allied possession, have been accepted with wide-spread welcome.

HOWEVER deep our disappointment, and however serious our burdens, in connection with the Russian collapse, there are some considerations which should be borne in mind. We must remember, for it is deeply true, that "Russia" is an inclusive name for a very wide diversity of races, hitherto held together by a despotic system inimical to the development of the powers of self-government. There have been revolutions in much more compact areas which have taken long to subside into a new and stable order; only a very sanguine and ill-informed mind could expect the speedy emergence of an orderly and balanced democracy from the ruins of the imperialist downfall. It has to be remembered, also, that the losses and sufferings of the Russians in the war have been very great; that facilities for economic organisation are chronically deficient, and now more than ever so; and that the chances of tiding over winter without direst famine are tragically small. In our political discussions we are always too apt to talk of a nation or an empire as if it were a soulless entity, like a gigantic piece on a chessboard, forgetting the real men, women and children whose lives are involved. Something more human in our attitude towards these brothers and sisters in the East would become all those of us who still believe in the underlying unity of all mankind.

* * *

THE formidable question of alcoholic drink continues to divide us, and to weaken us concurrently; meanwhile the great populations of the West regard us with an astonishment mingled, it must be granted—in view of the risks to their young soldiers—with a very unpleasant degree of reprobation. In the States and in Canada, whatever be the real proportion of abolition sentiment or the degree of its practical success, there are the strongest possible evidences of an alertness to the perilous conditions inevitably attending the use of strong drink. One of the latest signs of the times is an Order in Council that throughout Canada, as from the end of November, no grain or foodstuff of any kind is to be used for distillation of potable liquors. The saving to the food of the Dominion is estimated at a very high figure.

SIR ARTHUR YAPP, whose efforts to promote economy at every table are most praiseworthy, knows well that vast quantities of nutritious material are being perverted weekly into drinks which are admittedly of slight food value, if any; but he believes the munition men and others would "down tools" if further restrictions on the trade were made. Perhaps; but there was a time when these men were thought more patriotic. There certainly was a time when Mr. Lloyd George thought drink the most dangerous of our enemies. As some set-off to these disturbing elements in our present position we are glad to hear that despite an increase of one-and-a-half millions in women workers, with something like two hundred millions of money earned by them, there has actually been a decline in female drunkenness of 73 per cent since the war began. So reports Lord D'Abernon, Chairman of the Liquor Control Board.

AT a conference held on December 14 by the British Council of the World Alliance for Promoting International Friendship through the Churches, the Bishop of Peterborough presiding, the following resolutions were passed:—

1. That in the opinion of this Conference a just and lasting peace can be secured only by the Christian principles of reconciliation and the brotherhood of mankind being applied to all relationships between nations.

2. That it is essential that justice and fellowship should rule in all international dealings, and that for this purpose international machinery for administering justice and conciliating differences should be set up and accepted by all the nations.

3. That in regard to these matters there should be throughout all Churches a common waiting upon God to ascertain his will, and a continuous effort to bring all public sentiment and action under the control of the mind and spirit of Christ.

The speakers included the Deans of St. Paul's and of Worcester, Dr. J. Scott Lidgett, Dr. A. Ramsay, and Dr. E. Griffith Jones. All agreed in maintaining that the Allies had done right in entering and carrying on the war, much as they deplored some of the steps that had been taken in its course; but the prevailing feeling was one of eagerness to promote, now and after the war, such an atmosphere of justice and goodwill between nations as should prevent the rise of the war fever in future.

THE Warden of Keble College, Oxford, Dr. Wood, also spoke, and in the course of an admirable address expressed his conviction and satisfaction that the spirit of Christ was to be found at work far beyond the confines of organised Christian bodies, and indeed outside Christianity altogether. While profoundly grateful for this inspiring thought and for the rich fruits of the Christ-spirit in fields afar, those who distinctly avowed their faith in Christ and their discipleship to him, were clearly under the imperative obligation of abounding in the aims and efforts that were required if the lives of men and of nations were to be in accord with the mind of the Lord.

BY AND BY.

OH, the days to be hereafter,
When the War is done!
Oh, the singing and the laughter,
When the War is won!
When the flags of Peace are flowing,
And the fruits of Freedom growing
In the harvest of our sowing,
When the War is won!

There's a Comrade watching near us
Till the War is done;
With a steady smile to cheer us
Till the War is won.
'Mid the toiling and the sleeping,
'Mid the fighting and the weeping,
There's a chorus He is keeping
Till the War is won.

For He'll set the world a-singing
When the War is done;
When the bells of home are ringing,
And the War is won;
And a glory shall be o'er us
Of the comrades gone before us,
AND WE'LL SHARE THAT GRAND FULL CHORUS,
WHEN THE WAR IS WON!

W. G. TARRANT.

For New Year, 1918.

THE COMMON PURPOSE.

—at this day,
When a Tartarean darkness overspreads
The groaning nations; when the impious rule,
By will or by established ordinance,
Their own dire agents, and constrain the good
To acts which they abhor; though I bewail
This triumph, yet the pity of my heart
Prevents me not from owning that the law,
By which mankind now suffers, is most just.
For by superior energies; more strict
Affiance in each other; faith more firm
In their unhallowed principles; the bad
Have fairly earned a victory o'er the weak,
The vacillating, inconsistent good.

THESE lines from 'The Excursion,' may well be pondered by those among us who, while they are still confident of the justice of our cause, are perplexed and troubled at the slowness of its victory. They reveal to us the sources of the strength of our great enemy. They provoke inquiry into our own failures. Who has shown superior energy, most resolute holding together and most firm faith in the principles they have adopted? Looking back over the past fifty years must we not give the palm in these matters to the Germans? If so, need we seek further for the sources of the tremendous strength they are now displaying? They have set an object, great if not good, before themselves, and have striven towards it with an energy, a mutual loyalty and an unquestioning faith far surpassing anything we have shown in pursuit of any national ideal. It is hardly too much to say that while they have had a national ideal we have been rent by the conflicts of sectional and party ideals. They have steadily and unitedly worked for the ideal of a Germany powerful and wealthy and dominant over the other nations, and for the sake of that ideal have been willing to subordinate sectional differences and personal comfort to a degree which is not even yet paralleled in this country.

Some people are fond of picturing the Germans as a down-trodden people, groaning under the oppressions of a military caste and the restrictions of a ubiquitous officialism. Whatever he may be feeling now, that seems to be a profound misreading of the mind of the average German before the war. He submitted to very many things which would have been absolutely intolerable to us because he viewed them as a necessary means to the attainment of the ideals in which he shared. Our great political ideal was, perhaps, the liberty of each man to make the best he could of his own life, but we kicked at every restriction designed to secure that liberty for the greatest possible number among us.

It is not to the purpose in this connection to insist that the German ideal is a false one the realisation of which could only in the long run have brought evil results to the whole world, including themselves. There it was, a dazzling prospect ever before their eyes, and it is not too much to say that they lived by admiration, hope and love of it. In so living they grew strong as a people because for its sake they were willing to subordinate all private interests. However much we may find to condemn in the Germans of to-day we cannot write them down as either fools or cowards. That being so, we must assume that if the vast majority of them had not approved the lines on which their national life was moving they would long ago have found means to alter them.

Even to-day can we say that as a whole people we are inspired by an equal admiration, hope and love for ideals of a loftier type? It is true we have our millions of heroes, men and women, in military and in civil life, for whom no sacrifice is too great and no devotion too extreme, and in whose credit and glory we are all very ready to claim a share. But we have also our profiteers and our strikers; our devotees of party and personal antagonisms still bent on sectional successes; our newspapers more intent on making their power felt and in finding fault with our leaders than on quickening the spiritual life and stimulating the energies of their readers; our unnamed thousands careless whether or no they eat themselves into defeat. The awful fire through which we are passing has not yet purified us all.

Meanwhile let us thank God that there was sufficient virtue left in us to enable us to make a great fight against the false ideals that threatened the world and the evils that the attempt to realise them brought to light. And let us pray that when the victory of which we dare not doubt is ours we may be left with sufficient energy, loyalty and faith to make the triumph of a nobler ideal of national and international life secure; that our admiration, hope and love shall prove to have been so "well and widely fixed that in dignity of being we shall ascend." Only if that is so will some future orator be able to say, as John

Bright said of that other great war for moral and spiritual ends, "the ground reeled under four years of agony, until at last, after the smoke of the battlefield had cleared away, the horrid shape which had cast its shadow over a whole continent had vanished and was gone for ever." "Ignotus."

THE CHRIST SPIRIT AND THE WAR.

Jesus was having a heart to heart talk with his friends. Hear what he said :—

"This is my commandment, that ye love one another as I have loved you. Greater love hath no man than this, that a man lay down his life for his friends." And again: "This commandment received I of my Father." The little group of common people to whom he spoke believed him; nobody else, at the time. But a little later this that he said found acceptance by one of the finest intellects and loftiest souls of any time. We know how like a flash of lightning the Christ-Spirit forced itself upon Paul and how it sent him hither and thither preaching Christ, and him crucified, amongst other places, to Rome. Later the apostle writes to his friends there, and discourses freely of the conflict between the old order of things and the new. And to make his meaning absolutely clear he tells his personal experience: "I find then a law," he says, "that when I would do good"—meaning that when he would act in the Christ-Spirit—"evil is present with me. For I delight in the law of God after the inward man; but I see another law in my members warring against the law of my mind, and bringing me into captivity to the law of sin which is in my members." And he cries: "O, wretched man that I am, who shall deliver me from the body of this death?" Who, indeed! Note carefully the answer: "I thank God through Jesus Christ our Lord." Only the Christ-Spirit could deliver him.

This, then, was Paul's case. He saw the sublimity of the Christ-Spirit, realised the truth and the intrinsic value of the law of love as that which should govern the relations of men, but found that he had constantly to fight against a contrary law, the law of his members. And this is every man's case. Every man knows that to be the man he knows he ought to be he has to fight continually against the law in his members. He knows that sainthood has to be earned. You may inherit wealth and social position, but true manhood you cannot inherit. That you must earn by patient, often painful, labour of your own. And that is the true glory of life. There is no value in anything that costs nothing. Easy come, easy go. Hard won, held tight. Why is life a conflict? The answer is simple. Life would be death otherwise. If you would be a man worth calling a man you must fight with all your might against the law in your members, and find delight in the law of God after the inward man—that law of love of all things pure and of good report which God commissioned Christ to declare to be the true law of life.

And the same is true for families. We all know the difference between family life ruled by selfishness and family life ruled by love; how poor and mean is the one, how divinely beautiful the other

And the same is true for nations. Nations are but collections of families. Is it in any way strange, then, that nations should have a law of the mind and a law of the members, and that in order that the national life should be of good quality a nation should have to maintain a constant struggle with the law of its members? Do we not see such a struggle going on every day? Now and then, however, we see this conflict in other nations more clearly than in our own, for it is easier to see the merits of a conflict in which we are not ourselves engaged. The struggle against slavery in America is a case in point. When that great wrong was going down in blood, what do you think was the hymn that rang through the land :—

In the beauty of the lilies Christ was born across the sea,
With a glory in his bosom to transfigure you and me;
As he died to make men holy, let us die to make men free!

What happened? The law of the mind prevailed. The great American nation was cleansed of the iniquity of slavery. The men who died in the struggle died in the cause of God and His righteousness. As Christ "died to make men holy," so they "died to make men free."

And what is true of men and families and nations is true of the world. The world is a collection of nations, and as they have, so it has, a law of the mind and a law of the members. The Allies in the present war represent the law of the mind. The Central Powers, with Germany as chief, represent the law of the members. The Allies stand, and are fighting for God and His righteousness. They stand and are fighting for this—that the law that shall govern the relations of nations shall be love as opposed to hate, good-will as opposed to ill-will, liberty as opposed to tyranny. Germany stands and is fighting for the dominion of brute force. The dastardly deeds that Germany has done are all the testimony we need as to that. We have seen the deliberate adoption of a policy of frightfulness with the calculated purpose of terrifying the world into submission to the rule of the Kaiser. A cause so promoted cannot be a holy cause, and there can be but one end to the struggle with it. The law of the mind must win in the conflict with the law of the members. The testimony of history as to that is clear, convincing, and conclusive. The poet truly says :—

O, sometimes gleams upon our sight,
Through present wrong, the eternal right;
And step by step, since time began,
We see the steady gain of man.

The law of the mind is designed by God to win, and win it will. The struggle may be severe, it may be prolonged, but it can only end in victory for the law of the mind. The world will fight this fight to a finish, and the end thereof shall be glorious. Mankind will breathe more freely and press on to nobler life when the demon of the Prussian menace is exorcised.

Thus may all who have cause to mourn find comfort in the thought that their dear ones have become shining examples of that love of which Christ spoke when he said: "Greater love hath no man than this, that a man lay down his life for his friends." The day may come when a little girl will ask her mother, "Why did father die?" and the answer will be, "He died to protect your innocence"; or a little boy will ask the same question, and the answer will be, "He died to save you from slavery." For the German people are virtually slaves. They have no will of their own. The Kaiser's will is supreme in Germany, and he would have it supreme in the world. But we, at all events, have not entered into the liberties our fathers and we have won to surrender them now. And we must never forget that the Kaiser's aim in this war is the destruction of the cluster of Free Commonwealths that comprise the British Empire. That Empire is nauseous to him, because it is free, and stands in the way of his ambition of world-dominion. Therefore, let those who mourn take comfort in the thought that their dear ones have died in the self-same cause as that for which Christ died, that as he died to make men holy they have died to keep and make men free.

And so with those who have yet to go, and, perhaps, to die! What a magnificent rally of men to the glorious cause have we not witnessed—a magnificent rally of men here at home. But how fine has been the rally of men from all quarters of the globe! Why have men come from Canada, Australia, New Zealand? They have come to offer their lives if need be for their dear old home. Here is a cottage home in the country where father and mother and brothers and sisters dwell, and the boy who has gone overseas to seek his fortune hears that that home is in danger. "What!" he cries in unconventional, Colonial fashion. "What! there's a blackguard about? Down him! Here!" he calls to friends in like case with himself, "Come along—get busy." And they have come in their hundreds of thousands, leaving the fortunes to take care of themselves. They have leapt back across the Continents and the seas to give their lives for the dear home land, and to safeguard her liberties and the freedom of the seas and the sanctity of their adopted homes. It is simply ludicrous to think that the blackguard can win in this fight. God is against him in every chivalrous and noble soul, and in every throb of a loving heart.

I say to those who have yet to go to the fighting line, "Go with the clear consciousness that you are fighting for the victory of the law of the mind over the law of the members. You go to win for all mankind the victory of the law of the mind, that law that the apostle saw in the Christ-Spirit. You are, indeed, the apostle reincarnate in this business. We, who must needs remain at home, pray that God may have you in His keeping. We pray that you may come back to us safe and sound, but you need not fear to die. It is good to die in a noble cause. The law in your members may have had its way with you so far. Still, I say, you need not fear. Forget it all. Let the dead past bury its dead. Leave it behind you. Have no thought of fear. Be strong and of good courage, and God shall be with thee whithersoever thou goest. So quit you in this Divine enterprise that whatever befall God shall say, 'Well done, good and faithful servant, enter thou into the joy of thy Lord.'"

HAROLD RYLETT.

MYSTICISM.

MYSTICISM has been often misunderstood and misinterpreted. Robert Browning has been called a Mystic, not because he has the Mystic's large point of view, but because he is often obscure. But this does not make him a Mystic. For a Mystic may be as simple as possible, like Blake now and then. But his simplicity does not make him a Mystic. His connections, his references, his standing grounds are many, and he magnifies nature and sees God everywhere in nature. But his Pantheism does not make him a Mystic. He may be, he often is a Panentheist, because he sees everything in the light of God, in the light of eternity, sub specie aeternitatis. But his Panentheism does not make him a Mystic. The pathetic fallacy as it has been rightly or wrongly termed, irresistibly appeals to him, because he possesses "the Vision and the faculty Divine!" If he believes that nature sympathises with our griefs and joys, our fears and hopes, it is only that he is assured heaven lies about us everywhere, and God reveals Himself in everything great or small: in the sun or the daisy, "wee modest crimson-tippit flower." He finds miracles of sound and sight, mysteries in all possible and impossible places,; he expects to see them and therefore does see them. He has the faith, like that of Columbus, which would have created America had it not existed. The riddle of the Sphinx is none to him, since it is his business to read riddles, and to discover the soul of things, and to discern secret symbolisms in the common as well as in the uncommon coin. He has his own currency. For him the cosmos is saturated with the sacred and the spiritual, all is a religious mystery, and the very dust at his feet is divine. The greatest, if not the first Mystic, was the Lord Jesus Christ, and so the more we study Him, the more we shall comprehend the Mystic. Perhaps we may boldly say at once, that his differentia lies in his attitude towards God and nature, and especially in the Immanence of God. For not only does he detect the creativeness and evolution of Divinity in all that is good and true and beautiful and noble and great, but in their extreme opposites. He, like our Lord, understands all because he loves all. Sometimes he makes poetry his medium of expression, and sometimes and more frequently prose. But he accepts nothing quite au pied de la lettre. The letter may be his symbol, but the spirit is his substance. He builds for eternity with Cyclopean walls and measurements, as a wise architekton, bringing beauty and order out of confused phantasmagoria as Tennyson describes it:—

"When Ilium like a mist rose into towers, drawing music from discords and something out of nothing, master alike of himself and of his materials. The form he gives is final, to it nothing can be added and from it nothing can be taken away, except at a tremendous sacrifice. That which he says may not be uttered again. Magister locutus est. He is intensely positive, and deals in cosmic affirmations, even when he uses his favourite modus negationis. For to deny is, in the same breath, to posit some principle or fact. But he rarely explains or defines. "Le Dieu défini est le Dieu fini." And none of the supreme centralities can be explained, but they can be understood or sufficiently apprehended.

We are now in the midst of a grand revival in Mysticism, and it seems a healthy sign, because Mysticism is a spiritual attitude and it is absolutely fundamental. To it all is religious, all is sacred, all is edifying and tends to constructiveness. We are turning now with something akin to nausea from the Teutonic outlook, which has no insight and therefore no foresight, from a purely critical or hypercritical posture (and imposture) to something far more vital and creative, a dynamic interest rather than static. We are beginning, but only just beginning, to see God at home in His workshop, which is the human heart, the spirit of man. Psychology, though much too artificial and absurdly didactic, shows we have entered a new period, we are on the threshold of new and vast discoverings. In the present awful cataclysm of universal war, God and man come nearer to each other, and it is the Mystic who discerns the approach, the relationship, and in some respects the identity. Science, a mere geographical expression, as it appears to be more or less confined to Europe, or the West, will never decipher the signs of the times, the language of events, the enigmas offered by the revolutions in every department of life. It can tell us perhaps that there are one hundred and seven useless or rudimentary organs, survivals of the past or prophecies of the future, in the human body, and there it stops. It never realises the Divine Moment, it never suspects, as Plato and Verulam did, the inexhaustible riches of Wonder—the mother of metaphysics. Is not one of the alleged sayings of Jesus in the same strain? "They that wonder shall reign." We are told, on the contrary, that the blue sky is but the effect of light falling on the particles of dust suspended in the air.

But even the arid Aristotle knew better than this, when he said poetry was a more philosophic fact than history, and possessed a higher seriousness. And now, by the Grace of God, poetry together with Mysticism seems coming into its own again, and about to enter its kingdom. It perceives and portrays the many aspects of things, veiled away from the common vision, and revealed only to the pure of heart. "Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God." Even the Hebrews long ago knew there was a Female Deity that they called Sophia. And indeed the Incarnation would have little meaning unless Jesus embraced both the complementary factors of man and woman, which alone make the perfect man. He has a distinctly feminine side as well as a distinctly masculine side, and yet in absolute harmony of Divine energy.

We do not now divide God into the Masculine and the Feminine, but we recognise them as different aspects of one sublime unity. To be entirely human we must consubstantiate both man and woman, and appeal to both alike. This and this alone gives the key to the perpetual paradoxes in our Lord's pre-eminently contradictory character and procedure—at once so gentle or feminine and so severe or masculine, now using the violence of a scourge and now uttering gracious words that fall softer than flowers, here invoking the sword and there advocating non-resistance, courting publicity and then seeking the utmost privacy. His acts and his words were for ever denying each other. But this constitutes the essence of Mysticism, that it sees all things only in the light of opposites, and by antithesis alone is the final synthesis made intelligible. If the man's nature and the woman's nature, which agree to disagree, had not cohered in Jesus and been reconciled in him, he could have been Divine but not Deity itself. He came to make incompatibles compatible, and to show us that nothing lay outside his Love and his Will. Were he as mythical as some theologians profess to believe, he would have been artficially correct in every possible way, He would have been as logically regular in all he said and did. But it is his sweet unreasonableness, his impossible adventurousness in conduct which rendered him so accessible to each with such an infinite hospitality of Heart and Mind—the ever-open mind, the ever-open heart, transforming and transvaluating all.

FIELD AMBULANCE NOTES.

BY THE REV. MORTIMER ROWE, R.A.M.C.

IX.—AN OASIS IN THE DESERT.

AMID all our warm discussions, there is one proposition concerning which it is impossible to raise an argument: viz., that life in the trenches is a dog's life; because there are no two opinions.

And yet I sing the praise of many things, because they spell emancipation from a host of perishing delusions. It is much, e.g., to learn that sound and healthy sleep can be obtained on the bare boards of a barn or the hard clay floor of a "funk-hole" in a trench; that a complete and invigorating toilet can be performed without the aid of expensive furniture; that the plainest of food, carelessly cooked, and not "served" at all, can be eaten with eagerness; and that to have a lodging in an underground cavern, with a stretcher and one blanket for bed, can fill one with a sense of luxury and ease.

One may certainly allow that it is good to have a luxurious experience occasionally. One of our posts has attained fame amongst us for this reason. It lies in a ruined village half way up towards the front line, and is reached by leaving the trench and walking some little distance along an open road, in the childlike faith that "Fritz" will not object to just two or three of us doing so. On my first visit he appeared to be raising a protest, but I am still convinced that the shells were not meant personally against ourselves. As for the dug-out, it lies deep beneath a heap of bricks, tiles, and staircases which was once a house; "Fritz" kindly made it for our use before he hurried away, and one of its external charms lies in the fact that as you enter or emerge or walk about "on top," you may reflect that his malevolent eye is quite possibly upon you through a telescope in some observation post concealed on yonder low ridge. But perhaps because you are the sole inhabitants of the village, and therefore not worth while (or can it be that he has recognised you for a stretcher-squad working under the Red Cross?), you may stay up above in peace—as a rule. Downstairs, however, is the secret of this dug-out's fame—a cosy room, canvas lined, with a mirror and some pictures of sorts, three armchairs and a table! Beyond, another short flight of stairs leads up to the old cellar beneath the house, where are facilities for plain cooking. What wonder that if a quiet night occurs, when the candles are lit and the door is closed, a sense of reposing in the lap of luxury steals over us?

But I set out to write in praise of a severe simplicity. If and when I return home, I cherish the intention of making a clean sweep of nine-tenths of the domestic customs and possessions which make for unnecessary work and slothful ease. Yet at the back of my mind is a lurking dread that a certain someone else, who is also concerned, may succeed in diverting me from my perfectly rational and praiseworthy design!

DR. HORTON'S AUTOBIOGRAPHY.

An Autobiography. By Robert Forman Horton, M.A., D.D. London: George Allen & Unwin, Ltd. 7*s.* 6*d.* net.

No doubt this book was published primarily for Dr. Horton's personal friends and the members of his congregation. A great deal of it takes the running form of a diary in which the most trivial incidents are chronicled, but it contrives to give a living picture of a man, whose mind and temperament have had a wide influence upon modern evangelical religion. Many readers will be impressed by the way in which all the interests of a richly stored and cultivated mind are subordinated to the Christian passion for souls. It is this all-controlling aim combined with the habits of his early home and training which enables Dr. Horton to use religious language with a childlike simplicity, and to refer the most trivial incidents of his life to the direct nte rvention of God, in a way that will appear startling to men whose faith tends to be more reticent. Many interesting figures flit across these pages, and it is interesting to note that Oxford left a permanent disposition of kindliness towards the Church of England in Dr. Horton's mind, in spite of his stout independency and the unfortunate act of intolerance which closed his University career. "I never felt anything but love for the Church of England as a whole," he writes. "Lancelot Andrewes, George Herbert, William Law, if not Richard Hooker and Frederick Robertson, keep me always true to the National Church, of which I always feel myself a member, though, to my sorrow, a non-conforming one." It is only here and there that there is a glint of humour and a sense of the laughter in mortal things, but golfers (or their friends!) will appreciate the following passage: "Nothing gives me a higher estimate of human nature than the fact that some men can play golf without using bad language. And when I am tempted to rebel against the awful distance between man's lofty aspirations and his poor achievements, I rebuke myself by thinking how easily, after all, men are satisfied. Give them a ball and a stick and let them knock it about on a prepared ground and they ask no more—except to talk about the way they did it for the rest of the day."

Of the intimate personal friendship which has been the strength of Dr. Horton's life, it is not for the stranger to speak. But we venture to quote some words written after the death of his friend, for they may bring solace and help in this time of general sorrow: "The thought of communicating through a medium in arranged séances is unutterably repulsive to me. I could not ask her to stoop to those dubious and suspicious ways. But in the glorious faith of Christ she seems always to be one of His ministering spirits sent out on her unreluctant errand, to help and encourage me as she used to do. The loss, which at first seemed to shatter my life and make the grasshopper a burden, has resulted in giving me a sense of communion with the unseen world, a confidence in the eternal life, a joyful expectation of entering within the veil, which has not only blessed me but also enabled me to succour others in the dread time of bereavement."

WEEKLY NOTES.

A very pleasant feature of this Christmas week has been the number of greetings sent to me by the Belgian children in orphanages and schools in France. These are very charming because they are quite unsophisticated and spontaneous, but they should have been directed to the subscribers of this Fund generally rather than to me personally. On Christmas Eve there arrived quite unexpectedly an officer bringing me a beautiful trophy made from a shell case in the trenches by Dixmude, and sent, with a bouquet, from the largest Belgian hospital in Calais. There was also a letter describing a Christmas fête at Port Villez, where there are over two thousand mutilated men in training for trades. This fête was organised by an English nurse who is working there. She says: "The tree was lovely with coloured electric lights, stars, tinsel, and 150 silver roses (sent me by a lady who worked with me at my last hospital). We had the full military band, which played during the distribution, and twice played the English National Anthem in my honour! When the General told the 2,025 men who had received gifts to cheer me didn't they just? I thought their Salle de Fêtes would collapse! Luckily I didn't break down in the little I said. Afterwards a very good concert was given and I was given a seat of honour on the General's right hand. My cupboards are now quite bare, and I have not even a mitten left."

There was to be a fête on Christmas Day in our hut at Calais, and I only hope the raids, which have been so frequent there lately, did not interfere with it. I expect to have an account of it for next week. ROSE ALLEN.

A LETTER FROM DR. ELIOT.

THE following extracts from a letter written by the President of the American Unitarian Association to Mr. Ronald P. Jones will be of interest to our readers:—

I thank you for sending me the photograph of the tablet which you have set up in the "American Room" at Lawrence House. I am delighted that the Hostel proves to be so serviceable. You will appreciate that we are experiencing now the need of just such things on this side of the sea. I have spent the last two hours in conference with the administrators of our new United Service Clubs hereabouts. The buildings of the Boston Young Men's Christian Union are now made into an Army and Navy Club, and our churches are providing the hospitality and entertainment therein.

Of course all of us in these days are absorbed in the various employments which can be grouped under the name "War Work." I spent most of the summer and fall visiting and speaking in the camps and cantonments of our new army, a very interesting but moving experience. Much of my time must be given all winter to the various problems connected with the moral and spiritual welfare of the men in training. My house in Cambridge, as well as all of our public buildings, swarms with these splendid boys; for we have at Cambridge not only the Officers' Training Corps in connection with the University, but also an Aviation School, a School for Ensigns in the Navy, and the Naval School for Wireless Telegraphy, in all three or four thousand boys. Outside of these schools, at college, as at Oxford and Cambridge, the attendance is most pathetically reduced.

Our draft age is from 21 to 31, so that the two lower classes at college continue at a normal size, but the upper classes and the professional schools hardly exist. Not far from us is one of the big cantonments of the new National Army, with some thirty-five thousand boys, and Boston has not only a Navy Yard but a Recruiting Station for the Navy, where young men are coming and going in great numbers. The spirit of these boys is as fine as anyone could desire, and their military training is going forward satisfactorily. This call to sacrifice life and treasure for an ideal and for the safety of free institutions is really a great spiritual experience for a nation.

We had a fine conference at Montreal. I had there the pleasant function of presenting to the Church in Montreal the tablet given by the American members to commemorate the first meeting of the Conference on Canadian soil and the One Hundred Years of Peace.

GOING INTO ACTION.

IMAGINE a comfortable-looking farmhouse in the hop country, with an open space hard by, containing a well-appointed camp. The little wooden huts flanked a sort of pavilion in the centre, and behind this was a parade ground which did excellently well for cricket. Whilst my Battalion was in the Line I had settled here with the Orderly Room and a number of Reserves. The night of relief arrived and I welcomed back our Headquarters officers, all dirty and tired after their work. Then followed a short period of rest and recuperation and preparation. After holding the Line, the Battalion was next going to advance it. The C.O. being unwell, the second in command, Major J——, D.S.O., "a very gallant gentleman," was designated to lead the attack. Could you have entered the Headquarters' Mess, you might have seen a youngish man, wearing spectacles, closely studying maps and plans and dispositions. The thin face and quiet voice suggest the student rather than the man of action, but we who know him recognise him as the embodiment of courage and efficiency and success. Happy the troops of such a gifted leader! The fateful morning arrived and the Battalion was duly drawn up. There rode along the front our youthful Adjutant taking the numbers present, so as to report "All correct, Sir," with a smart salute, when Major J—— should appear. Noble S——, aged 19, standing 6 ft. 2 in,. the fine fruit of Uppingham and Sandhurst, his body riddled with machine-gun bullets, now lies under the battlefield! The salute was duly given, and so was the order that set the Battalion in motion. First the two mounted officers, next Headquarters' Company, led by a young officer who won the encomium "he isn't afraid of shells"; then the four companies. "A" Company marched behind Capt. W——, D.S.O., a good-natured Lancashire man, who stepped aside to shake hands with the Colonel. Poor W——! He passed away three days later in a Casualty Clearing Station. As my old Company Commander the only complaint he had against me was that I was too "d——d sympathetic." It was pleasant to be addressed as "Professor" by such a man. Officers and men alike carried their heads high conscious of fine traditions behind them, and great work ahead. Then there followed a period of suspense, succeeded by heart-rending news. It was something like the messengers of Job, except that the worst news came first. The earliest witness declared our beloved Leader and the Adjutant were dead. It was simply terrible. I remarked "The Battalion has lost its soul." Report stated that every officer save one, who was "going strong," had been either killed or wounded. That one now wears the D.S.O. ribbon, and a V.C. acts as his batman! Noble pair! At last the Battalion came back, and God be praised, its Leader still unscathed. There were great gaps, but considering the work done, the casualties were not considered heavy. Now we were in tents, and all animation in telling and hearing of Trojan deeds. Men praised their officers and officers praised their men. Individual acts of bravery gleamed through the story like stars, but radiating the whole action was the personality of the Chief. He it was who, after the first objective had been taken, actually went forward with the Battalion and calmly assigned their places to the several groups under his command, and so secured the second objective—a shepherd bringing his sheep in his hands. May his life still continue to be a charmed one, and now he is C.O. and I his Adjutant, may I acquire power like his in efficiently leading men and winning their devotion!

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Birmingham, Small Heath.—The Rev. A. H. Lewis, minister of the Waverley Road Church, writes as follows:—"It cannot have been the lot of many of our ministers to work among a people who have a fine church but no school or lecture-hall. Until I undertook my present charge I had no adequate idea of the importance of school premises to the work of a church. Most congregations have such buildings, and use them constantly, but half knowing how highly favoured they are! Since the total destruction of their former schoolroom by fire eighteen months ago, the Waverley Road congregation has pluckily carried on its work, despite the continual discouragement and frustration that have followed upon the loss, not of the building only, but of books, seating, organ, piano, and much else which goes to provide the necessary apparatus of religious work. These losses we are now trying to replace. A serviceable, if not a large, building is now approaching completion. The cost of this can be met from funds already in hand, but we are now faced with the expensive task of providing seating accommodation, heat, light, and many other things essential to the utility of the hall. The church building was erected in 1898, largely from the money resulting from the sale of the Church of the Saviour, so that materially as well as spiritually we can claim a filial relation to the notable work of George Dawson. Were he with us to-day how eloquently he would have pleaded our cause!"

Dundee.—A successful Sale of Work was held on Saturday, December 15, in the Foresters' Hall, in connection with the Free Religious Movement. The proceedings were opened by Miss Agnes Husband, the chair being occupied by the minister, the Rev. Henry Dawtrey. The Treasurer named £35 as the sum to aim at. The amount actually realised, after all expenses were met, was £37.

Horwich.—By a regrettable error it was announced last week that the Rev. H. Bernard Hannah had accepted an invitation from the congregation of the Unitarian Church, Hunslet, instead of Horwich. He will commence his ministry at the latter place on the first Sunday in February.

Liverpool.—The Rev. J. C. Ballantyne has accepted an invitation to take charge of the Mill Street Mission.

London: Kentish Town.—A very successful Sale of Work, held in connection with the Unitarian Church last month, was opened by Mrs. Edmund Grundy of Hampstead. The sum taken at the stalls amounted to £47 10*s.* and the donations to £51, making a total of £98 10*s.* Parcels of goods were sent as offerings to the John Pounds' Home, The Belgian Hospital Fund, and the Sales of Work at the Stratford and Kilburn Churches.

Mansfield.—On Sunday, December 23, the Rev. C. M. Wright, M.A., brought his five years' ministry at the Old Meeting House to a close. On the previous Tuesday evening he and Mrs. Wright were the recipients of £40, given by the congregation as a tangible token of appreciation of the services which they have rendered. Among those present were Mr. J. Harrop White, who presided, the Rev. W. H.

Proudlove (United Methodist Superintendent), Mrs. Harrop White, Mr. C. J. Vallance, Mr. W. A. Royce, Mr. and Mrs. J. E. Mitchell, Mr. and Mrs. A. L. Hare, and others. Miss Vallance of The Ridge made the presentation. The Chairman, in expressing his warm appreciation of Mr. Wright's services as minister of the Old Meeting House and of the valuable help given to all their institutions by Mrs. Wright, said they had not had the congregations they might have hoped to have had, but undoubtedly there had been reasons for that. Mr. Wright had been their minister during the most awful period it was possible for any minister to occupy that position. During three years, and more, of his ministry this terrible war had been going on, and they, like every other congregation, had suffered. But he should think few congregations had sent more, in proportion to their numbers, to join the colours than they had. Something like eighty had gone, and a number of them had lost their lives. Amongst those who joined the forces had been many of their best and most energetic workers, and most regular and consistent attenders. They included members of the choir, teachers in the Sunday school, the secretary of the congregation, the secretary of the Sunday school, and many of those to whom they looked for assistance in carrying on the work, and when they withdrew a number like that of their best workers it could not fail to have a prejudicial effect. As every congregation knew, although at the beginning of the war there seemed to be a revival of religion, and places of worship were better attended, that seemed to have died away. The enthusiasm seemed to have abated, and unfortunately there was not that strong, earnest feeling and devotion to religion which there ought to be in a country which was passing through such a crisis as ours was to-day. If ever there was a time in the history of the country when church-going, and what it led to, was necessary it was undoubtedly to-day. If ever there was a call to devote themselves to true religion it was now. The Revs. Arthur Briggs (Congregational), and J. Leonard Webber (Wesleyan), who were unable to be present, had both sent cordial letters, the latter speaking of the happy relations which had existed between Mr. Wright and his fellow ministers in the town. Mr. Knape, speaking on behalf of the Sunday school workers and scholars, conveyed their good wishes to Mr. and Mrs. Wright in their new sphere of activity in Liverpool. The Rev. W. A. Proudlove said that especially at this time the churches ought to come closer together. He did not disguise that there were differences between them, but there was a common ground for all. Whenever he had come there he had found the spirit of reverence, true worship, the passion for common humanity, and the desire to be influential for good in the town. All the churches ought to realise the bonds which should to drawn ever more closely, and through their association with Mr. Wright it had become easier to feel and say that than it had been before. Mr. Wright replied in suitable terms, and expressed his great regret that he would not be there to see the soldier boys come home, especially those he had known in the Sunday school.

Mottram.—As the result of a Cake and Apron Sale held recently in connection with the Unitarian Church, the Ladies' Sewing Society have been able to hand the sum of £10 to the Church Funds. The school has just sent a letter and six shillings to thirty scholars and former scholars who are on war service.

Nottingham.—As the Rev. W. E. George has concluded his national work for the present, the Rev. J. C. Ballantyne's services at Derby on Sunday evenings have been brought to a close, and he has resumed his evening duties at the High Pavement Chapel. It is with very great regret that the congregation have received his resignation on his acceptance of an invitation to take charge of the Mill Street Mission, Liverpool. They owe much to Mr. Ballantyne for his devoted work among them for the last four years which has been marked by so much energy and enthusiasm, and for his labours in the North Midland District generally, and they recently presented him with a cheque for 150 guineas as a mark of their affection and regard. They are glad to know they will have him among them for several months to come. On December 13 Dr. J. E. Carpenter delivered a lecture on 'Religion Before the War and After' in the Circus Street Hall, Nottingham, to a good audience, among whom were several clergymen of the Church of England and othes denominations.
